STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendants to recover a judgment for money. Although the plaintiffs' complaint is out of the ordinary, it may be said to be a complaint as for money had and received. The plaintiffs had judgment in the trial court, and the defendants have appealed, bringing up papers which they claim to be a judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. No motion to dismiss has been made, neither has a suggestion of the diminution of the record been made, and we therefore treat the record as sufficient.

[1] It was the theory of the plaintiffs in the trial court that they were called upon to pay, and that they did pay, without authority of law, a penalty of 50 per cent. to redeem from a sale had in a street opening proceeding. The appellants claim the right to collect the penalty by reason of some language contained in section 16 of that act (St. 1889, p. 70) read in connection with section 3779 of the Political Code as that statute was formerly worded. That part of section 16 referred to reads as follows:

"All provisions of the law in reference to the sale and redemption of property for delinquent state and county taxes in force at any given time, shall also then, so far as the same are not in conflict with the provisions of this act, be applicable to the sale and redemption of property for delinquent assessments hereunder, including the issuance of certificates and execution of deeds."

Section 3779 of the Political Code at the same time was worded as follows:

"On filing the certificate with the county recorder, the lien of the state vests in the purchaser, and is only divested by the payment to him, or to the county treasurer for his use, of the purchase money and fifty per cent. thereon."

But section 3779 of the Political Code was repealed by Statutes of 1895, c. 11, § 8, and by chapter 218, § 59. However, the appellants claim that the appellants' rights to the penalty were saved by Statutes of 1895, c. 177, which provides:

"Section 1. All sales, and redemptions after sale, of any real property upon which the assessment levied and assessed to pay the damages, costs, and expenses of or incident to laying out. * * * any street, * * * shall be made and had in the same time and manner as such sales and redemption were required by law to be made and had on the first day of January, A. D. 1895."

It will be noted that the saving statute does not mention penalties at all. It will also be noted that the language used by the Legislature is quite different from the language used in the street opening act of 1889. The appellants make the claim as though the saving statute were worded as follows:

[2] But there is a patent difference between the language used and meaning which the appellants would attach to the language. The saving statute saves the procedure as to "time and manner," but does not purport to save a penalty of 50 per cent. It must at all times be borne in mind that tax proceedings are in invitum and purely statutory and afford no opportunity for invoking any of the principles of equity. City of Petaluma v. Hughes, 37 Cal. App. 473, 475, 174 Pac. 336. In the instant case the penalty is not specifically mentioned in the statute under which the appellant claims. In the case of Collier v. Shaffer, 137 Cal. 319, 70 Pac. 177, the court construed the provisions of sections 3756 and 3817 of the Political Code as those sections stood in 1889. Section 3756 expressly provided a 5 per cent. penalty. Section 3817 referred to a "twenty-five per cent. penalty, which may have accrued by reason of such delinquency and sale. * * *" The court held that section 3756 was the declarative law as to what penalties were imposed and that section 3817 misused the number 25 for the number 5. The case shows that the courts have not gone out of their way to adopt a construction imposing penalties. That we should not do so in the instant case is further strengthened by provisions of section 16 of chapter 76 of the Statutes of 1889, which we have not heretofore referred to. The greater part of that section is taken up in providing for a 5 per cent. penalty which is imposed by the terms of the statute on each delinquent assessment. If the Legislature had meant to impose other penalties certainly apt words would have been used to express that meaning. On the other hand, it used language excluding such an intention. Having provided a 5 per cent. penalty, it then adopted statutes concerning delinquent state and county taxes, " * * * so far as the same are not in conflict with the provisions of this act. * * *" The two expressions are not harmonious. The appellants were not entitled to charge a 50 per cent. penalty and are not entitled to retain the same.

[3] The appellants in this court take the position that, whether the judgment of the trial court was just or otherwise, it should be reversed for certain alleged errors. They claim that the plaintiffs' complaint did not state a cause of action, that they raised the question by demurrer, and that their demurrer was improperly overruled. Their point is this that the complaint does not flatly allege that the defendants received the money. The complaint is certainly not very clear in this behalf, but after the demurrer was overruled the defendants filed an answer in which, among other things, they pleaded as follows:

"Defendants allege that the said sum of $9,065.53 referred to in said amended complaint has never come to the possession of said defendants or to the possession of any official of said defendant, the city of Petaluma, or into the possession of any one for or on behalf of said defendants or either of them. * * *"

After the trial was had, the trial court made findings:

"That the said sum paid by plaintiffs to said defendant E. S. Shaver as such official, on said 22d day of October, 1915, to wit, the sum of $9,065.53, was paid by them under protest and duress, and to prevent the clouding of their title to said lots; that all sums and amounts in excess of $5,727.64 exacted by defendant E. S. Shaver as such official, of plaintiffs, and paid under protest by them to said defendant, were and are illegal."

And thereupon the trial court awarded judgment for the difference, to wit, $3,337.85. In the bill of exceptions there is no showing or attempt to show that the trial court prevented the appellants from making a full and complete showing on the question of receiving or not receiving money. Conceding that the plaintiffs' complaint was not as broad as it should have been, the defect was cured by the answer of the defendants, and the record shows that the defendants were not prejudiced. Code Civ. Proc. § 475.

[4] The record shows that the money was not received on October 22, 1915, but that it was received on July 6, 1918. The record does not show when the action was commenced; but it does show that the action was commenced before July 6, 1918. The appellants strenuously contend that the action was prematurely commenced, and that the judgment should be reversed. Conceding that the action was prematurely commenced, but examining the whole record, it is patent that the rights of the appellants were in no manner prejudiced because of that fact. We think that the judgment should not be reversed because of alleged errors which were not prejudicial. Mahony v. Standard Gas Engine Co. (Cal. Sup.) 202 Pac. 146.

[5] The appellants assert that the evidence does not show that the money alleged to have been deposited in bank ever came to the hands of the defendants, or either of them, or was ever claimed by them or either of them. In so far as E. S. Shaver, or E. S. Shaver, as superintendent of streets, is concerned, the contention is well founded. As to the city of Petaluma, the contention is not sustained by the record. The certificate of deposit was offered in evidence and on it appears the indorsement, "Paid 7/6/18," and also the indorsement, "James A. Potter, Superintendent of Streets and Street Superintendent of the City of Petaluma and Successor in Office to E. S. Shaver." During the second hearing the question of the payment of the certificate being under discussion, Mr. Hall, attorney for the appellants, admitted that the certificate of deposit had been paid after the judgment in the Hickey suit, which judgment held that the tender was good. It is therefore clear that the city of Petaluma received the money although it is equally clear that the defendant E. S. Shaver did not receive it. He had gone out of office and his successor in office received the money, but the successor in office has not been made a party to this litigation. As he has not been made a party, he has not had his day in court and no judgment should have been entered as against Potter. As the record does not show that Shaver received any part of the money, no judgment should have been entered as against him.

[6] The appellants claim that the deposit was not made under duress. We think they are mistaken. True, the title of the plaintiffs had already been clouded at the time of the tender. But in the absence of the payment, the plaintiffs' title would have been permanently lost.

[7, 8] The appellants claim that the trial court had no jurisdiction to grant a new trial. In making this contention we understand them to rely upon the rule stated in Gray v. Cotton, 174 Cal. 256, 162 Pac. 1019, and Stow v. Superior Court, 178 Cal. 140, 172 Pac. 598. We think that this case is not controlled by either of said cases, but that the latter case is more nearly in point, and in that event the trial court did not exceed its jurisdiction in granting the so-called motion for a new trial. It might be better said that the trial court was merely remarking that it took a different view of the pleadings than it entertained on a previous date, and was hearing the case for the first time; or, to put it another way, that it had inadvertently exceeded its jurisdiction on the former occasion when the plaintiffs were not awarded a trial, and that the matter was being cured by having a formal trial on the latter date. The first step in the proceedings is, by one of defendants' attorneys, called a motion for judgment on the pleadings; by another of defendants' attorneys it is called a motion for a nonsuit. It is not clear that the first trial was not a trial on the merits. True, the plaintiffs had not alleged "that the defendants had and received" any money; but the defendants, in their answer, inserted an allegation that they had not "had and received the money." The averment of the answer was deemed denied by virtue of the provisions of section 462, Code of Civil Procedure. In the face of such a record the defendants had no right to move for judgment on the pleadings. McGowan v. Ford, 107 Cal. 177, 40 Pac. 231. To avoid the rule in that case the defendants at the hearing on April 11, 1918, made certain statements to the trial court which were taken and acted on as evidence. The trial court so considered the record as appears from the record. These, and other matters, tend to show a trial of the case on its merits. Code Civ. Proc. § 582. Moreover, we are of the opinion that the appellants are not in a position to press this point. It is shown by the record that on April 11, 1918, the cause was called for trial. At that time the appellants took the position as stated by the judge of the trial court:

"Shaver has never gotten it and he says he has never gotten it, does not want it, would not have it. It appearing that the defendants each and all disclaimed any interest whatever in the fund," etc.

Judgment was thereupon ordered in favor of the defendants. Before the judgment was signed or filed, to wit, on July 6, 1918, the city officials proceeded to collect the money and have ever since retained it. In view of the acceptance of the moneys by the defendant city, we think the city is not prejudiced when it is denied permission to change its position back to where it originally stood.

The foundation was very imperfectly laid for the introduction in evidence of the certificate of deposit, but the objection to its introduction was equally faulty. The proceedings were as follows:

"Mr. Mooney: I have also here a certificate of deposit which was made by the plaintiffs in this action and which has since been cashed in by the city. Is there any objection to that? Mr. Dole: That is objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial and hearsay. * * * The Court: I do not think it is hearsay."

We find nothing in the record as to the proof of signatures on the certificate, but such objection was never made nor called to the attention of the trial court. The appellants therefore are not entitled to have this court consider matters which were never before the trial court.

No other points are made which call for our consideration. The judgment as to E. S. Shaver and E. S. Shaver as superintendent of streets is reversed, and the judgment as to the city of Petaluma is affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court, in Bank, Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. Hearing denied.

WILBUR, J. (dissenting). I dissent from the order denying a transfer, on the ground that the 50 per cent. penalty provided by section 3779 of the Political Code is still applicable to sales for delinquent assessments for the opening of streets under the street opening act of 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 70). Section 16 of that act provides for the sale of the assessed property in the same manner as is or may be provided for the collection of state and county taxes. It is also provided:

"All property sold shall be subject to redemption in the same time and manner as in sales for delinquent state and county taxes; and the superintendent of streets may collect for each certificate fifty cents, and for each deed one dollar. All provisions of the law, in reference to the sale and redemption of property for delinquent state and county taxes in force at any given time, shall also then, so far as the same are not in conflict with the provisions of this act, be applicable to the sale and redemption of property for delinquent assessments hereunder, including the issuance of certificates and execution of deeds."

Section 3779 of the Political Code as it existed at the time of the enactment of the street opening act, supra, provided:

"On filing the certificate with the county recorder, the lien of the state vests in the purchaser, and is only divested by the payment to him, or to the county treasurer for his use, of the purchase money and fifty per cent. thereon."

Section 3780 of the Political Code fixed the time for redemption as 12 months from the date of purchase "or at any time prior to the giving of the notice and the application for a deed, as provided for in section thirty-seven hundred and eighty-five of this Code."

Section 3785 provided that in order to terminate the right of redemption the purchaser must give 30 days' notice before he applies for a deed, in which he was required to state, among other things, the amount then due. This amount included the 50 per cent. authorized by statute. Reed v. Lyon, 96 Cal. 501, 502, 31 Pac. 619. The redemption must be made in gold or silver coin. Pol. Code, § 3781. "The redemption is effected by the payment of the money, and the taking of the receipt." Cooper v. Shepardson, 51 Cal. 298.

It would seem clear that the manner of making a redemption is by payment to or for the purchaser of the amount for which the property was sold, plus 50 per cent. and such costs as were authorized by law. Assuming for a moment that the statute of 1895 revising the whole system of sales and tax redemptions (Stats. 1895, p. 19), containing the express repeal of section 3779, Political Code, so affected the street opening act of 1889, that the law of 1895 (page 204), intending in part at least to make the new system of collecting taxes inapplicable to the collection of delinquent assessments under the street opening act of 1889, is the only basis for charging the 50 per cent. penalty, the question is whether this and the saving statute of 1895 (Stats. 1895, p. 204) still required the payment of the 50 per cent. penalty for redemption. That statute provides (Stats. 1895, p. 204):

"All sales, and redemptions after sale, of any real property upon which the assessment levied and assessed to pay the damages, costs, and expense for or incident to laying out, opening, extending, widening, straightening, diverging, curving, constructing, or closing up, in whole or in part, any street, square, lane, alley, court, or place within municipalities in this state, shall remain unpaid and become delinquent under the provisions of any act or law regulating such matters, shall be made and had in the same time and manner as such sales and redemption were required by law to be made and had on the first day of January, Anno Domini eighteen hundred and ninety-five."

Thus, as applied to redemptions the statute provides that all redemptions "shall be made and had in the same time and manner as such sales and redemption were required by law to be made and had on the first day of January, Anno Domini eighteen hundred and ninety-five." The question then is whether the manner of redemption included the payment of the 50 per cent. penalty. It would seem fairly clear that, as the redemption was affected by the payment of the amount due to the purchaser, if the manner of redemption was to be the same, both before and after the amendments to the law relating to collection of state and county taxes, such payment would still be required notwithstanding the repeal and amendments to the various sections of the Code involved in the new scheme of tax sales.

We have so far assumed that the statute of 1895, repealing section 3779, Political Code, affected the right of the purchaser under a sale made for an assessment for the opening of a street; but the logical result of the decision of this court in Ramish v. Hartwell, 126 Cal. 443, 58 Pac. 920, is that the statute of 1895 did not affect the street opening act of 1889 in so far as it adopted the provisions of the general system for the sale for delinquent taxes. It will be observed that the statute of 1889 adopts and makes a part of that statute the general scheme for the collection of delinquent state and county taxes. The exact language of the provision will be considered later. The case of Ramish v. Hartwell, supra, dealt with a similar provision of the bond act of 1893 (Stats. 1893, p. 33), which statute provided in section 5 for the adoption of the general plan for the collection of delinquent bonds "in all respects the same as are provided by law for the collection of delinquent state and county taxes." Thereafter the general law was amended by the statute of 1895 (page 19), now under consideration, and the city treasurer refused to proceed in accordance with the provisions of the Code concerning the collection of state and county taxes in effect before the amendments of 1895. The court held that the amendments of 1895 were inapplicable to the proposed sale for delinquent bonds and for that reason the revised statute with reference to the collection of state and county taxes did not apply to the collection of delinquent street bonds. In that regard the court stated:

"In 1895 (Stats. 1895, p. 327), section 3771 of the Political Code was amended by providing that, instead of selling the land at auction, the property upon which the taxes are delinquent 'shall by operation of law and the declaration of the tax collector be sold to the state, and said tax collector shall make an entry "Sold to the state" on the delinquent assessment list opposite the tax.' It is contended by the appellants that by this amendment to the Political Code its provisions are ipso facto incorporated into the act of February 27, 1893, and that the city treasurer can proceed only in accordance with the provisions of the Political Code, as thus amended.

"It is a rule of statutory construction that the adoption in one statute, for the purpose of carrying its provisions into effect, of the provisions of another statute by reference thereto, does not include subsequent modifications of these provisions in the statute referred to, unless a clear intent to do so is expressed. This rule is subject to a qualified exception in cases of the adoption into a special act of the provisions of law then in force by virtue of general laws. In such cases, subsequent modifications of the general law will be deemed to be within the intent of such adoption, so far as they are consistent with the purposes of the particular act. (See Kirk v. Rhoads, 46 Cal. 403.) A repeal of the adopted statute will not take from the adopting statute the operative force of these provisions, so far as they may be necessary to carry the later statute into effect, but these provisions will be regarded as if they had been originally incorporated therein at length. (Spring Valley W. W. v. San Francisco, 22 Cal. 434; People v. Clunie, 70 Cal. 504; Collins v. Blake, 79 Me. 218; Darmstaetter v. Moloney, 45 Mich. 621; Sutherland on Statutory Construction, § 257.) Under the same principles, any amendment of these provisions of the statute thus adopted, whether it be a particular act or a general law, which so far modifies them as to subvert the purpose of the statute by which they were adopted, will be regarded in the same light as a repeal. The main object of all statutory construction is to ascertain the legislative will, and, as it is to be assumed that the legislature intends its acts to have effective operation, such amendments will not be construed as depriving the adopting statute of all effect, unless there is a clear necessity for such construction.

"A comparison of the act of 1893 with the provisions of the Political Code, as amended in 1895, shows that the provisions in the latter as thus amended are entirely inapplicable to the former, and ineffective to carry its objects into effect. The provision in section 5 above quoted was to enable the contractors to receive the amount of the assessment as the several installments should mature, and to provide means for enforcing its collection in case of delinquency. The provision for a sale of the land at public auction to any one who would pay the assessment, with the right in the contractor to become such purchaser, was an efficient mode of securing such payment, but if, instead thereof, the land should be struck off to the state with no power for its sale within five years, and no fund from which to pay the amount for which the sale was made, there would be no means by which the contractor could receive his payment, and the entire purpose of the act would be frustrated. We hold, therefore, that the above amendments to the Political Code in 1895 are inapplicable to the provisions of the act of February 27, 1893, and that the sale of land for delinquency in the payment of the bond is to be made according to the provisions of the law for the collection and enforcement of taxes at the date of the act." (Italics ours.)

It follows then that the express repeal of section 3779, Political Code, imposing a penalty of 50 per cent., if theretofore applicable to the proceedings for the sale of property for delinquent street opening assessments by reason of the incorporation by reference of such Political Code provisions in the street opening act of 1889, did not operate upon or render inapplicable its provisions as affecting sales for delinquent street opening assessments. It seems to be conceded that section 16 of the street opening act of 1895 as originally enacted (St. 1889, p. 73), provided for the penalty of fifty per cent. in cases of redemption. If so, the authority for its imposition is contained in the following sentences of section 16:

"All property sold shall be subject to redemption in the same time and manner as in sales for delinquent state and county taxes; and the superintendent of streets may collect for each certificate fifty cents, and for each deed one dollar. All provisions of the law, in reference to the sale and redemption of property for delinquent state and county taxes in force at any given time, shall also then, so far as the same are not in conflict with the provisions of this act, be applicable to the sale and redemption of property for delinquent assessments hereunder, including the issuance of certificates and execution of deeds."

If the first sentence requires the payment of the penalty it is because the "manner" of redemption incorporates the idea of the fifty per cent. penalty, and if that is true there is no difficulty in concluding that the penalty is still imposed, because, as already stated, the saving act of 1895 (Stats. 1895, p. 204) expressly provides that as to the manner of redemption the statute in force January 1, 1895, remains in force with relation to the street opening assessments.

If the requirement for the payment of the 50 per cent. penalty is found in the next sentence, "All provisions of the law, in reference to the sale and redemption of property for delinquent state and county taxes in force at any given time," etc., incorporated by reference section 3779, Political Code, we have to determine whether upon the principle stated in Ramish v. Hartwell, supra, the amendment of 1895 renders inapplicable the 50 per cent. penalty. It is true that the street opening act (section 16), above quoted, differs in the terms by which it makes applicable to the street opening assessment sales the general scheme for sales for delinquent state and county taxes, and that interpreted in the case of Ramish v. Hartwell, supra, for the reason that the provision for the sale for the street opening assessments provides that the scheme for "the sale and redemption of property for delinquent state and county taxes in force at any given time, shall also then, so far as the same are not in conflict with the provisions of this act, be applicable," etc. (Italics ours.)

It would follow that the new scheme for the collection of state and county taxes would apply "so far as the same are not in conflict with the provisions of this act"; but, as stated in Ramish v. Hartwell, supra, the new scheme for the collection of delinquent state and county taxes by a sale to the state is thoroughly inconsistent with the system of sales at public auction to the highest private bidder for cash. In the one case the entire property is sold to the state for the tax, subject to a five-year redemption, in the other case only so much of the property as is necessary to pay the delinquent assessment is sold and then to the private bidder who accepts the smallest part of the property and pays the assessment. The new scheme of tax sales in its entirety is inapplicable to and inconsistent with the scheme of sales to private individuals provided by the street opening act (Ramish v. Hartwell, supra), and for that reason under the express terms of the statute of 1889 is not applicable to the sale and redemption of the property for delinquent street opening assessments.

PEOPLE v. JOHNSON. (Cr. 1025.)

1. Burglary § 41 (5)—Evidence held to sustain finding offense was committed in nighttime.

Evidence that the burglary was committed while the occupants of the house were absent for several days, and that on the night before the door of their apartment was discovered to have been broken open, a neighbor heard sounds as of some one pounding, held sufficient to sustain the jury's finding that the burglary was committed in the nighttime.

2. Criminal law § 1035 (3)—Remark of trial court which could have been corrected is not reversible, in absence of assignment made at time.

Where defendant's counsel, in objecting to a statement by a witness for the prosecution on cross-examination, said that what the witness stated was not an identification, a remark by the court that the court did not say it was an identification, but it was the fact, was not of such a character as to preclude the possibility of obviating a harmful result if an assignment of misconduct had been made at the time, and therefore the remark does not require reversal of the conviction, where it was not assigned at the time as misconduct.

3. Criminal law § 1044—Answers made before objection to question cannot be reviewed without motion to strike.

Answers, made by witnesses before objections were made to questions asked them, cannot be reviewed on appeal from a conviction, where there was no motion to strike out the answers.

4. Criminal law § 1166½ (8)—Unless some objectionable juror sat, prejudice in disallowing challenge for cause if juror subsequently peremptorily challenged not shown.

Accused was not prejudiced by the disallowance of his challenge for cause, directed against a juror whom he subsequently excused on peremptory challenge, where he exercised all his peremptory challenges, but did not show that any one of the jurors who sat at the trial of the case was objectionable to him.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Frank Johnson was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Edmond H. Lomasney, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. Defendant was convicted of burglary in the first degree and appeals from the judgment. It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict of burglary in the first degree under the provisions of section 1097 of the Penal Code that—

"When it appears that the defendant has committed a public offense, and there is reasonable ground of doubt in which of two or more degrees he is guilty, he can be convicted of the lowest of such degrees only."

Mr. and Mrs. Clifton, the occupants of the residence in San Francisco from which the silverware, jewelry, and clothing were taken, were away from home from August 5, 1921, until after August 11th, and the house was unoccupied. Before leaving they had carefully closed and locked the doors and windows. On the morning of August 11th a neighbor discovered that the kitchen door in the rear of the house was open. An examination disclosed that entrance had been gained by chopping a panel out of the kitchen door and removing a bolt which fastened the door on the inside, and that silverware, jewelry, and clothing of the approximate value of $2,500 had been taken from the house. Shortly after 12 o'clock noon of the same day defendant was arrested by police officers, who saw him come out of a certain San Francisco hotel, in which he was registered. His room was searched and in a closet thereof were found eight suit cases containing the articles in question. There appears to be no question raised on appeal as to the sufficiency of the evidence to show that defendant committed the burglary. Therefore a particular recital of the evidence on this phase of the case is unnecessary.

[1] Regarding the time when the crime was committed, the evidence shows that appellant rented the room in which the stolen articles were located about noon on August 9th, and that at the time he had with him two or three suit cases or grips. At about half past 3 in the afternoon of that day he was seen by one of the witnesses standing on the corner of Broderick and Green streets looking towards Union street, the Clifton residence being on Broderick between Green and Union streets. One Mrs. Ernst testified that she lived on Union street right below Broderick; that her house stood on the key lot, and her yard and the Cliftons' yard met in the rear; that on the night of August 10th she was sleeping in a room in the back part of her house on the second floor with the windows wide open; that she was awakened from a sound sleep by a noise as if some one was pounding—that it sounded like a rock pounding, as if some one was grinding something and pounding; that she thought it was in her place; that she listened, and then pulled the window up and down and the noise stopped; that she went back to bed, and almost immediately she again heard the noise; that she got up again and opened the window screen and looked around and just then she heard a door, and somebody said, "Sh!"; that it was a very dark night, and she did not see any one; that she then went to bed and thought no more about the occurrence until the next day. As heretofore stated, the evidence showed that the kitchen door was found open the following morning, and that a panel had been chopped therefrom in order to reach within and withdraw a bolt which had been placed on the inside of the door. The burglary was committed some time between the 5th of August and the morning of the 11th, and whether in the daytime or the nighttime was a matter for the determination of the jury. People v. McCarty, 117 Cal. 65, 48 Pac. 984. A disturbance of its verdict in that respect does not appear to be justified in view of the evidence here.

[2] During the cross-examination by appellant's counsel of the witness who testified he saw appellant in the vicinity of the Clifton residence on August 9th, the following occurred:

"Q. Did you ever identify this man? A. I identified him after I saw his picture in the paper.

"Mr. Lomasney: I ask it go out.

"The Court: That is what you asked him.

"Mr. Lomasney: That is not an identification.

"The Court: I am not saying it is an identification, but it is the fact."

Appellant now complains that this remark constituted prejudicial misconduct on the part of the trial court. The remark was not assigned as misconduct at the time it was made, and the trial court's attention was not in any manner directed to its alleged impropriety. Neither does it appear that the remark was of such a character as to preclude the possibility of obviating a harmful result had an assignment of misconduct been made at the time. Under these circumstances, the rule is that a claim of misconduct will not be considered on appeal. People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 551, 140 Pac. 256.

[3] Appellant next contends that the admission of certain alleged hearsay evidence constituted prejudicial error. The answers to certain questions went into the record before objection was interposed, and no motion was made to strike out. This point, therefore, requires no consideration.

[4] Appellant also complains that the trial court erred in disallowing his challenge for cause interposed to one of the jurors on the ground of bias. The juror was not sworn and did not serve as such on the trial, having been subsequently excused by appellant on a peremptory challenge. It appears from the record that appellant exhausted his 10 peremptory challenges, but it does not appear that he had occasion or desired to exercise an additional peremptory challenge. There is nothing to indicate that any of the jurors who served were objectionable to appellant, or that each and all of the 12 jurors finally accepted and sworn were not entirely satisfactory to him. Under these circumstances it is unnecessary to determine whether or not the ruling was erroneous, as it did not amount to prejudicial error and would not warrant a reversal. People v. Kromphold, 172 Cal. 512, 519, 520, 157 Pac. 599; People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 576, 119 Pac. 920. Judgment affirmed.

DE CARLI v. ASSOCIATED OIL CO. et al.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 11, 1922.)

Jury ⚡19(1)—Master and servant ⚡347—Workmen's Compensation Act constitutional as applied to injuries due to willful disregard of duty.

Const. art. 20, § 21, authorizing the Legislature to create a complete system of workmen's compensation irrespective of fault, does not limit the Legislature to injuries caused by negligence as distinguished from willful disregard of duty, and St. 1917, p. 834, § 6b, providing for compensation for serious and willful misconduct of the employer, is not unconstitutional as denying the constitutional right of trial by jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by Joe P. De Carli against the Associated Oil Company and others. From a judgment for defendants on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jay Monroe Latimer, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Action for damages for personal injuries. Plaintiff alleges that he was employed by defendant Associated Oil Company and that, while engaged in his duties as such employee, he received severe personal injuries through the gross and willful carelessness and negligence of defendant company. Defendant Ocean Life Insurance Company was the insurance carrier of defendant oil company and was made a party defendant solely for that reason. Both defendants demurred generally to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state a cause of action, and upon the further grounds of lack of jurisdiction of the court, misjoinder, and uncertainty.

The ground relied upon below was that the superior court had no jurisdiction, it being claimed that the matter of employers' legal liability for injuries to employees was vested in the Industrial Accident Commission, which body had sole power to determine and assess any compensation to which a plaintiff might be found to be entitled. It appears from the record that plaintiff was paid $730 pursuant to the terms of the compensation act. After collecting this amount, he brought this present action. The demurrers of the different defendants were sustained without leave to amend. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and in support of his appeal contends in substance that article 20, § 21, of the Constitution as amended in 1918 does not by its terms justify the provisions of section 6(b) of the Workmen's Compensation Act in so far as said section 6(b) seeks to deny the right of trial by jury in a court of law granted to one by the Constitution. It is argued that article 20, § 21, merely vests the Legislature with plenary, unlimited power to create a complete system of workmen's compensation for injury, disability, or death incurred or sustained by workmen in the course of employment "irrespective of the fault of the party"; that, giving to the word "fault" the meaning attributed to it by the decisions, it is merely synonymous with "negligence"; and that, this being so, a workman is, by the Constitution, impliedly left his common-law right to trial by jury, in that different class of cases where injury results from a willful disregard of duty by the employer. This question has been put to rest in this state by the Supreme Court through numerous decisions.

The Workmen's Compensation Act as originally enacted provided for an election of remedies by an injured employee where such injuries were caused through the gross or willful misconduct of the employer. Section 12(b), c. 176, Laws 1913. In 1917 the act was amended, and this election was eliminated, and in lieu thereof it was provided that when an employee was injured through "the serious and willful misconduct of the employer, etc.," that the amount of compensation should be increased one-half. Section 6(b), Laws 1917, p. 834. The remedy here provided for has been held to be exclusive of all other statutory or common-law remedies, and the constitutionality of the provision has been upheld in numerous cases. E. Clemens Horst Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 184 Cal. 180, 193 Pac. 105, 16 A. L. R. 611. See, also, Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 156 Pac. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390; San Francisco Stevedoring Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 321, 149 Pac. 586; Do- minguez v. Pendola (Cal. App.) 188 Pac. 1025; Helme v. Great Western Milling Co., 43 Cal. App. 416, 185 Pac. 510. As pointed out in these cases, the Constitution authorizes a complete system of workmen's compensation, and the language employed is comprehensive enough and was intended to include all injuries, irrespective of the manner in which they might occur. The contention of appellant, therefore, that the language employed in the Constitution is a limitation on the power of the Legislature, is without merit.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

HESSE v. MERCED SECURITY SAV. BANK.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 20, 1922.)

Banks and banking — 227(3)—Evidence held insufficient to prove bank's agreement to pay depositor's creditor certain sum on bank's receipt of certain fund.

In action by assignee of installments due on trucks sold highway contractor against a bank, which was supplying the contractor with the money to enable him to perform the contract and had taken assignment of moneys to become due under the contract as security, for breach of the bank's agreement to pay certain amount due on the trucks on contractor's deposit in bank of amount then due from the state under the contract in consideration of assignor's agreement not to retake possession of trucks, evidence held to sustain finding that the bank did not make the alleged promise to pay such sum.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by R. E. S. Hesse against the Merced Security Savings Bank, a corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Earl A. Bagby, of Visalia, for appellant.

F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The complaint alleges that the defendant agreed to pay plaintiff's assignor $1,500 "from a special fund, then and there being by said defendant and one J. E. Lee provided for that purpose, said payment to be made by the said defendant immediately upon receipt by defendant of said fund which said fund was * * * in the amount of $7,000 or thereabouts"; that the defendant thereafter received such fund but refused to pay plaintiff the sum promised and converted the fund to its own use; "that the said special fund consisted of moneys then due and payable by the California State Highway Commission on account of the contract of said J. E. Lee with said commission for the construction" of a certain highway. The answer denies the allegations of the complaint. The court found the foregoing allegations of the complaint to be untrue and rendered judgment for the defendant.

The defendant was supplying Lee with money to carry on his highway contract and had furnished him large sums for that purpose, taking as security a mortgage on his personal property, tools, and equipment and an assignment of moneys due and to become due under the contract. Lee had purchased two trucks from plaintiff's assignor on the monthly payment plan, and several installments were due and unpaid on May 22, 1920. On that day A. Woods, representing the seller, indicated to the officers of defendant that it would be necessary to take the trucks, which were being used on the work, from Lee's possession unless arrangements were made for payment of part of the overdue installments. Certain payments were then due on the highway contract, and Woods called up the state engineering department to ascertain the amount thereof and the time when payment would be made. From this point forward the evidence is conflicting.

Woods testified that he informed the bank officials that he had received information from the state engineering department that checks would be mailed to Lee that afternoon for payments due. He further testified:

"I asked Mr. Stoddard if he would pay a check on Mr. Lee of $1,500 on the arrival of the money * * * coming from the state at that time, and he said he would pay it and that would not put Mr. Lee's overdraft any higher than it was at that time, and I * * * did secure a check of Mr. Lee. * * * They (the bank officials) informed me, in those estimates, I think they called them, there was approximately $7,000. * * * Stoddard made the statement at that time that he did not wish to carry Mr. Lee for any more money at that particular time, but would pay a check of $1,500 or pay the amount of $1,500 when these estimates that were presumably coming from Sacramento arrived."

H. B. Stoddard, defendant's cashier, testified:

"He (Lee) was overdrawn on May 22d, $3,345.26. * * * Mr. Woods assured us that a check was being mailed from Sacramento for $7,000; at one meeting he said the check had been mailed. * * * We agreed to pay that check if we got the money from the state that he said had been mailed to us at that time. * * * The promise was conditional, that if we received that money from the state that he said was being mailed to us, that would put Mr. Lee's account in such shape we could pay his check."

M. D. Wood, vice president and manager of defendant, testified:

"I stated to him at that time that we would recognize a check of Lee in his favor or his firm's favor when Lee had the money to his credit to pay it. * * * At the time Mr. Woods was there, he said the money was coming from the state right away, which would take up the overdrafts. * * * I did not tell him anything except what I have already stated, that we could not recognize any checks against Lee's account until he had the money to pay outside of the labor proposition. * * * I mean preferred claims, anything that was a preferred claim. * * * Such claims as can be filed against the job, before the labor commissioner, for instance. * * * I did not know, as a matter of fact, what money was coming from the state to Mr. Lee, because the money always went to Lee; it did not come to the bank."

The anticipated payment by the highway commission was not received and deposited with the bank until May 28, and then only in the sum of $3,565.33. In the meantime the bank had continued to pay Lee's checks for labor and material, so that on May 28, after crediting Lee's account with the $3,565.33, it showed an overdraft of $1,068.02. The $1,500 check was not presented to the bank for payment till about the middle of June, and at that time Lee's account was overdrawn. While Lee later deposited other sums with defendant, at no time after May 22d did he have sufficient funds to the credit of his account to pay the check.

From the foregoing evidence it is clear that the court was justified in finding that the defendant did not make the alleged promise to pay plaintiff's assignor $1,500 or any sum.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LEE MON. (Cr. 618.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 20, 1922.)

Prisons ⇨ 17½, New, vol. 19 Key-No. Series —Statute prohibiting taking of opium into prison is valid.

Pen. Code, § 171a, making it a felony for any person not authorized by law to bring into any prison, jail, or reformatory any opium or other narcotic, is valid.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Lee Mon, sometimes called Ah Fong, pleaded guilty to taking opium into a county jail. From a judgment sentencing him to the penitentiary, he appeals. Affirmed.

Walter F. Lynch, of Stockton, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. The charging part of the information against defendant is as follows:

"The said Lee Mon (sometimes called Ah Fong) did on or about the 29th day of December, A. D. 1921, prior to the filing of this information, at and in the county and state aforesaid, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously bring, take, and convey into the county jail of the county of San Joaquin, state of California, a quantity of opium, and at the time of so bringing, taking, and conveying said opium into said county jail as aforesaid, the said Lee Mon (sometimes called Ah Fong) was not then and there authorized by law so to do."

The defendant was duly arraigned and pleaded guilty. He was thereupon sentenced to the penitentiary in accordance with the requirement of the statute.

We find nothing erroneous or irregular in the proceedings. The information was based upon the provisions of section 171a of the Penal Code, and is in proper form. The only reason urged in the court below why judgment should not be pronounced against the defendant was that "the statute is invalid." But there seems to have been no argument upon the question, and there has been no appearance in this court on behalf of appellant.

No reason occurs to us why such statute should not be upheld, or why the judgment should not stand.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Master and servant $\hookrightarrow$ 80(5)—Complaint held to warrant recovery of commissions on transaction proved.

A complaint, alleging that plaintiff was employed to solicit orders for the purchase through defendant of merchandise for the account of the purchasers, and that defendant promised to pay him 25 per cent. of the gross profits on all business received from persons in plaintiff's territory, was broad enough to support a recovery of commissions on a transaction, though defendant contracted to furnish the goods and then purchased them on its own account, instead of purchasing for the customer's account.

2. Pleading $\hookrightarrow$ 398—Variance as to nature of transaction on which commissions sought held immaterial.

In an action for commissions on an order for goods obtained through plaintiff's solicitation, a variance between an allegation that the goods were purchased by defendant for the account of the customer and proof that it contracted to furnish them to the customer and then purchased them on its own account was immaterial under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 469 and 470.

3. Contracts $\hookrightarrow$ 176(1)—Construction is for court.

4. Corporations $\hookrightarrow$ 432(12)—Evidence held to support finding of authority to employ one to solicit orders for share of profits.

Evidence held to support a finding that the president of a corporation, who was ostensibly manager of its export department and with its vice president owned all of its stock, had authority to employ plaintiff to solicit orders for the purchase through defendant of goods for a share of the profits on such orders.

Action by H. R. Williams, Jr., against Macondray & Co. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas H. Breeze, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Wilson & Wilson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment for $5,000 in favor of plaintiff entered upon a verdict of a jury.

The complaint alleges that on or about January 10, 1918, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement whereby plaintiff was employed by defendant to solicit trade with, and if possible obtain orders from, persons, firms, and corporations doing business in or residing in the republic of China (excepting Manchuria) Hongkong, Philippine Islands, Dutch Indies, Straits Settlements, Australia, and New Zealand for the purchase through defendant of goods and merchandise in the United States for the account of such persons, firms, and corporations, and that in and by said agreement it was understood and agreed that plaintiff should solicit said orders and promote said trade by communicating by mail or cablegram or otherwise with such persons, firms, and corporations, and it was agreed by and between plaintiff and defendant that in consideration of the performance of such services by plaintiff, the defendant would on demand, pay the plaintiff a commission of 25 per cent. of the gross profits made or earned by defendant on all business received by defendant from persons, firms, or corporations so residing or doing business in the said countries, or any of them, regardless of whether or not said business was received by defendant as the result of solicitation or efforts by plaintiff; that immediately after the making of said contract, plaintiff entered upon the performance thereof, and that plaintiff thereafter continued to fully carry out and perform the said contract until the 30th day of April, 1919, at which latter time defendant wrongfully and unlawfully, and without any cause or reason whatever, refused to allow plaintiff further to carry out and perform said contract, and that defendant has ever since refused, and still refuses, to allow plaintiff further to carry out and perform said contract, and that plaintiff has at all times since the said refusal of defendant been, and he still is, ready, able, and willing to carry out and perform said contract on his part; that while plaintiff was, as aforesaid, carrying out and performing said contract, defendant received orders from persons, firms, and corporations, residing and doing business in said countries for the purchase by the defendant in the United States of goods for the account of said persons, firms, and corporations and for the shipment of said goods to said persons, firms, and corporations, and that all of the goods called for by the said orders were purchased by defendant in the United States for the account of the persons, firms, and corporations giving such orders, and have been shipped by defendant to said persons, firms, and corporations.

It is further alleged that defendant has paid plaintiff the commissions that became due on certain of said orders, but that defendant has made and earned gross profits on others of the said orders, amounting to the sum of $45,600, and that plaintiff is entitled to 25 per cent. thereof.

Appellant's first contention is that there is a material variance between the proof and the allegations of the complaint. The argument is based upon the following facts: The profit made by defendant upon which it refused to pay plaintiff a commission was made upon one transaction with the Kailan Mining Administration of Tientsin, North China. There is no dispute about the fact that this business came from the territory covered by the contract between the parties. The record shows that the materials called for by this order were steel rails, and that these rails were not purchased by the defendant "for the account" of the customer, but a quotation of price or a "firm offer" was made to the customer by the defendant after defendant had secured quotations of price from the manufacturers. This offer to the customer was for a price 3 per cent. in excess of the price asked at that time by the manufacturers. The customer accepted, by cable, defendant's offer to furnish the rails. Deliveries were to be made at different times in the future. At the time of the offer and acceptance steel prices were unusually high because of the World War. Defendant, however, did not place its orders with the manufacturers at this time, but waited for several months, during which time a great reduction in the price of steel occurred, due to the signing of the armistice. Defendant thereupon purchased the rails at the greatly reduced prices, but held the customer to its acceptance of the offer at the higher price, thus making a large profit.

Defendant now seeks to escape liability to plaintiff, urging that he has pleaded that he was "employed * * * to solicit orders * * * for the purchase through defendant of * * * merchandise * * * for the account of such persons, firms, and corporations"; also, that the complaint alleges that "all of the goods called for by the said orders were purchased by defendant in the United States for the account of the persons, firms, and corporations giving such orders. * * *" It is asserted that such allegations do not warrant a recovery on the facts shown.

[1] With reference to the allegations of the complaint regarding the terms of the contract between the parties, we are of the opinion that such allegations are sufficiently broad to cover the facts proven. Aside from the allegation above quoted and referred to by appellant as being insufficient to include the facts proven, there is, as previously stated, an allegation that defendant promised to pay the plaintiff a commission of 25 per cent. of the gross profits made or earned by defendant on all business received by defendant from persons, firms, or corporations so residing or doing business in the said countries. This allegation is sustained by the testimony of plaintiff, and is sufficient to include the transaction admitted to have taken place between the defendant and the Kailan Mining Administration.

[2] While there is some variance between the allegation that the indebtedness arose by reason of orders for the purchase by defendant of goods for the account of persons in the territory named and the proof, which showed that the commission was due upon business handled in a somewhat different manner, we are not disposed to regard this matter as material, because it could not have misled the defendant to its prejudice in maintaining its defense under all the facts in evidence in this case. Code Civ. Proc. § 469; Fielding v. Iler, 39 Cal. App. 559, 562, 179 Pac. 519; Holden v. Mensinger, 175 Cal. 302, 165 Pac. 950. Plaintiff would have been entitled to have amended his pleading to conform to the proof or the fact could have been found in accordance with the proof. Code Civ. Proc. § 470.

It is argued by appellant that it is unlikely that the defendant intended to contract to pay a commission upon profits made upon direct sales to customers, but that it is more reasonable to suppose that defendant intended to contract with plaintiff to pay a commission only upon purchases "for the account" of customers. We do not see the force of this reasoning. It is entirely clear from the record that the defendant was in the habit of handling its business in either of two ways; by purchasing for the account of a customer, charging a commission for its services, or by making a "firm offer" to the customer and then buying the goods in the open market for resale to the customer. The circular letters and advertising matter sent out by the plaintiff in pursuance of his contract with the defendant solicited business from prospective customers in the prescribed territory, under either of these arrangements. The cablegrams covering the Kailan Mining Administration transaction were submitted to Macondray, by plaintiff, before they were sent out. Mr. Macondray was in charge of the department where plaintiff worked, and plaintiff necessarily deferred to his judgment and advice as to the method of handling business that came to the defendant company. Macondray was therefore in a position to direct that the business be handled in either manner. There seems to be equal reason for allowing plaintiff a commission upon the one transaction as upon the other. Regardless of the way the business was handled by the defendant, it came to them out of the territory assigned to plaintiff and in response to his advertising methods and plaintiff has testified that the agreement made with him was for "an interest to the extent of 25 per cent. of gross on business done or coming from China" and the other countries mentioned.

Defendant seeks to charge plaintiff with negligence because, immediately upon receipt of the acceptance from the Mining Administration of the offer made to it by defendant, plaintiff did not place orders with the manufacturers for the merchandise required. Of course, the question of whether or not the plaintiff performed his duties carefully or negligently or used good or bad judgment during his period of service with the defendant is not an issue in this case. It would seem, however, that criticism of plaintiff's method of procedure would come rather ungracefully from the defendant, in view of the fact that plaintiff's failure to immediately place such an order resulted in a profit of many thousands of dollars to defendant, while the pursuit of the only other method suggested as proper would have made anything more than a nominal profit an impossibility. Defendant contends that the fortunate outcome was the result of mere chance, and that plaintiff was not warranted in taking this chance. However, plaintiff has testified that when he made the offer to the mining administration it was after consultation with the president of the defendant company, who was also the manager of the export department; that prices of steel were then so high that the defendant was assured they would not go higher, and in fact the defendant was expecting a drop in such prices and also a drop in the freight rates. By the time shipment was made of this order freight rates had decreased by 50 per cent., and the price of steel had declined sufficiently to afford the defendant a profit, as shown by their books, of $30,661, after deducting a "manager's bonus." The jury allowed to the plaintiff $5,000.

[3] Complaint is made of the refusal of the trial court to give certain instructions to the jury by which the contract pleaded is construed to cover only transactions with customers by which goods are bought for the account of such customers. Our previous discussion of the pleadings answers this objection of appellant. We do not consider the contract pleaded to be so limited in its scope, and we think such instructions would have been erroneous. It is true, as contended by appellant, that the question of the interpretation of a contract is a question of law for the court, but the instructions offered by defendant on this subject do not fairly interpret the contract which plaintiff pleaded, and which he proved, not only by his own testimony, but by numerous other facts and circumstances appearing in the record and hereinafter referred to.

[4] The appellant also contends that there is no proof of the authority of Mr. Macondray to enter into such a contract on behalf of the corporation. Briefly, and in substance, the proof is: All of the shares of the capital stock of defendant were owned by Mr. Macondray and Mr. Rathbone. Mr. Macondray was the president of the company; Mr. Rathbone was the vice president and the manager of the insurance department. Mr. Macondray was, ostensibly at least, the manager of the export department of defendant, to which department of its business the contract with plaintiff related. Macondray employed and discharged clerks in said department, ordered goods, and saw that it was shipped out. No one but Macondray and Mr. Connolly participated in the business connected with the export department; the contract with the Kailan Mining Administration, upon which this commission is claimed, was made by Macondray on behalf of the defendant. There were four directors of defendant, Mr. Macondray, Mr. Kittle, Mr. Connolly, and Mr. Rathbone. The directors, practically, never held a meeting. Mr. Kittle, one of the directors, was merely a "dummy director," owning but one share of the stock, and never participated in the business. Mr. Connolly discussed with both plaintiff and Mr. Macondray the contract involved here, and was apparently satisfied with the same. Mr. Rathbone knew of the contract with plaintiff about January or February, 1918, which was shortly after it was made, and, apparently, he made no objection to it. Mr. Connolly himself had a contract with defendant which was similar to the contract held by plaintiff, and such contract had been made with Connolly by Mr. Macondray as president of the defendant. It was never authorized by or acted upon in any way by the directors, and yet such contract was recognized by the defendant as a binding obligation, and payments were made thereunder to Connolly. Defendant also recognized plaintiff's contract, and furnished him with a statement of commissions due him thereunder—in fact, paid $500 upon such commissions and tendered another small sum in full settlement, which was refused. It was only when plaintiff insisted upon having a commission upon this large transaction with the Kailan Mining Administration that any question was raised regarding the authority of Macondray to enter into this contract on behalf of defendant.

Under all of these facts we think the implied finding of the jury that Macondray did have authority to enter into this contract on behalf of the defendant was justified. *Crowley v. CHAMBERS v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF TEHAMA COUNTY. (Civ. 2411, 2452.)

1. Waters and water courses ⚡225—Proceeding for organization of irrigation district held judicial.

A proceeding before the board of supervisors for the organization of an irrigation district under St. 1897, p. 254, requiring a notice, a hearing, the taking of evidence, and a judgment, presents all the elements of a judicial proceeding.

2. Waters and water courses ⚡225—On writ of review from order of a board of supervisors, only evidence before board considered.

On writ of review from an order of a board of supervisors denying a petition to establish an irrigation district, the investigation is limited to the evidence before that board in determining whether it had any discretion to dismiss the petition.

3. Waters and water courses ⚡225—Board's determination on credibility of witnesses and weight of the evidence held conclusive.

On writ of review from an order of a board of supervisors refusing to establish an irrigation district, the determinations of the board on questions of weight of the evidence and credibility of the witnesses are conclusive.

4. Mandamus ⚡28—Office of writ of mandate stated.

The office of a writ of mandate is, not to control the discretion of an inferior tribunal, but to compel it to act where only one course is open to it under the law.

5. Waters and water courses ⚡225—Whether owners of town lots qualified petitioners for irrigation district held question of fact.

The primary purpose of St. 1897, p. 254, providing for the establishment of an irrigation district on petition to a board of supervisors signed by a majority of the owners of "lands susceptible of irrigation from a common source," was to irrigate agricultural lands; but whether owners of town lots were qualified petitioners in any particular case was a question of fact for the board of supervisors.

6. Waters and water courses ⚡225—Board of supervisors have power to include a town within irrigation district.

A board of supervisors with power to create irrigation districts on petition of landowners have authority to determine whether a town will be benefited by water for irrigation and may include it within the boundaries of an irrigation district.

7. Waters and water courses ⚡225—Record held to authorize conclusion that petition for irrigation district was not signed by majority of landowners.

In a petition to a board of supervisors for the establishment of an irrigation district under St. 1897, p. 254, and amendatory acts, the record held to authorize the board's conclusion that petitioners had failed to maintain the burden of proving that petition was signed by majority of the qualified landowners.

8. Waters and water courses ⚡225—Signatures to petition for establishment of irrigation district not to be withdrawn after publication.

Irrigation Act, § 2, providing that signatures to a petition for the establishment of an irrigation district may be withdrawn at any time before publication, implies that such signatures may not be withdrawn thereafter.

Petition by O. W. Chambers against the Board of Supervisors of the County of Tehama. From an order denying the petition, the petitioner applies for writ of review and for a writ of mandate. Denied.

Fred C. Pugh, of Red Bluff, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Petitioner made an original application to this court for a writ of review (No. 2411) to annul an order or resolution of the board of supervisors of Tehama county denying a petition for the organization of an irrigation district to be known as Los Molinos Colony irrigation district, and later, an application for a writ of mandate (No. 2452) to require the board to adopt a suitable resolution determining that all the provisions of the Irrigation Act of March 31, 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 254), and the amendatory acts have been complied with. The two applications were made for the reason that petitioner was in doubt as to whether it is a case for certiorari or for mandate, and it was stipulated at the hearing herein that they might be considered together by this court and covered in one opinion.

The petition to the board of supervisors was in proper form and was published as required by the statute. A written opposition or contest was filed by certain property owners within the proposed district, and after a public hearing the board denied the petition. Several questions have been discussed by counsel, but the only serious controversy seems to be as to whether the evidence before the board of supervisors showed without substantial conflict that the petition for the organization of the district was signed by the requisite number of property owners in view of section 1 of said act, providing:

"A majority in number of the holders of title or evidence of title to lands susceptible of irrigation from a common source, and by the same system of works, including pumping from subsurface or other waters, such holders of title or evidence of title representing a majority in value of said lands, may propose the organization of an irrigation district, under the provisions of this act."

[1] In considering this question there can be no doubt that the board exercised a judicial function.

"The board must hear all relevant and competent evidence offered, and thereupon determine whether or not the petition is signed by a majority in number of the holders of land within the proposed district susceptible of irrigation from the same source or system, and whether or not the lands held by such signers represent a majority in value of such lands within the district. * * * This scheme presents all the usual elements of a judicial proceeding, the notice, the hearing, the taking of evidence, and the judgment." Imperial Water Co. v. Supervisors, 162 Cal. 14, 120 Pac. 780.

[2] We take it, also, that in the determination of the merits of these applications we are not to try any issues of fact that were presented to the board of supervisors, but our investigation is limited to an inquiry as to the evidence before said board and whether, in view of the situation as then and there existing, the board had any legal discretion to dismiss or deny the petition. Inglin v. Hopkin, 156 Cal. 483, 105 Pac. 582; Harelsion v. S. San Joaquin Irr. Dist., 20 Cal. App. 324, 128 Pac. 1010.

[3, 4] If there was any substantial evidence before the board, or there was any ground for a rational inference, that said petition was not signed by the requisite number of property owners, and, for that reason, the board decided against the petitioners, manifestly we cannot say that the board exceeded its jurisdiction, for the law expressly clothes the board with the authority to decide that very question in accordance with the view entertained by said board of the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses. Likewise, in such case the writ of mandate would not issue because its office is not to control the discretion of an inferior tribunal, but to compel it to act where only one course is open to it under the law; in other words, to require that said tribunal or officer discharge a plain ministerial duty. These propositions need not be discussed any further, as they are elementary and not disputed.

What, then, was the situation before the board in relation to this question? Without reviewing in detail the evidence as to the number of competent and qualified signatures to the petition we may accept the admission of petitioner that the number is 140. This is shown by the supplementary affidavit of H. S. Gans, one of the attorneys for petitioners, filed with the board on October 17, 1921.

[5, 6] What was the showing as to the whole number of qualified property owners within the proposed district? As to this, it was not disputed that 319 names appeared upon the assessment roll. From this number it is the claim of petitioner that 104 should be deducted because they were the owners of lots in the towns of Los Molinos and Dairyville. If such deduction were made we would have, of course, 215, of which 140 is obviously more than one-half. But here we are confronted with the contention of respondent that the showing before the board of supervisors did not justify any such deduction. Before considering the disputed question of fact, it is well to note the peculiar language of the statute requiring the signatures to the petition to be of a majority of the owners of "lands susceptible of irrigation from a common source." It does not necessarily follow from this that town lots should be excluded from consideration. The primary purpose of the act is to accomplish the irrigation of agricultural lands, and in the sense in which the expression is used in the statute the ordinary town lot should not be classified with said lands; but it is true that some town lots are of such size and put to such use as to require irrigation, and the difference between such lots and agricultural lands would be only one of degree and would not justify any discrimination. Whether the owners of the town lots should be deemed qualified petitioners in any particular case would be a question of fact to be determined by the board of supervisors to whose discretion the Legislature has committed it. It is also true that the board has authority to determine whether a town will as a whole be benefited directly by water for irrigation and so include it within the boundaries of an irrigation district. The foregoing follows from a consideration of the statute and the decisions of the Supreme Court in Board of Directors v. Tregear, 88 Cal. 334, 26 Pac. 237; In re Central Irrigation District, 117 Cal. 382, 49 Pac. 354; Imperial Water Co. v. Supervisors, 162 Cal. 14, 120 Pac. 780; La Mesa Homes Co. v. La Mesa, etc., Irr. Dist., 173 Cal. 121, 159 Pac. 593.

[7] Turning to the record before the board as to this feature of the case, we find that petitioners, after describing the lands to be included in the proposed district comprising some 12,000 acres, alleged in their petition:

"That said lands are susceptible of irrigation from the common sources and by the same system of works mentioned herein."

This allegation was not challenged by the written objection filed by the contestant property owners except that there appeared upon said petition "the names of twenty-nine persons who are the owners and holders of the title or evidence of title to town lots in the town of Los Molinos and are not the owners, or the holders of title or evidence of title to any other lands within said proposed irrigation district; said town lots not being agricultural lands and not being lands that will be benefited by irrigation," and the names of six persons "who hold the title or evidence of title to town lots in the town of Danville." There was thus presented an issue as to the property qualification of only thirty-five of those on the assessment roll, and while it may not be that petitioners would be estopped from showing before the board that a larger number was disqualified, yet the board of supervisors, acting as a judicial tribunal, would be justified, at least where no proof was offered to the contrary, in assuming that as to the remainder they were owners of lands susceptible of irrigation from a common source. And we find that no evidence was offered before the board as to this disqualification except as to those challenged by the contestants, and the effect of the showing in that regard is that twenty-four of petitioners were included in that class.

It is the contention, however, of petitioner that when it is shown that certain persons were owners of town lots, it must be inferred that such lots were not susceptible of irrigation from a common source and the owners were therefore disqualified. The only evidence before the board shown by the record as to this is the following testimony of H. S. Gans:

"That of the said 319 persons whose names appear upon the said assessment roll, 91 were assessed upon property within the town of Los Molinos; that of said 91 persons, 27 were signers to the said petition for organization of district; that of said 319 persons, 13 were assessed upon property within the town of Danville; that of said 13 persons, 3 were signers to the said petition for organization of district; that taking the sum of 91 and 13 names, to wit, 104 names, from said 319 names, would leave the balance of 215 names as on the assessment roll; that 4 of said 27 persons signing said petition and on the assessment roll for lots within the town of Los Molinos, as aforesaid, were also on the said assessment roll for lands not in said town of Los Molinos and within the boundaries of said irrigation district."

There was, thus, no description whatever of the character or extent of the property within said towns not represented on said petition. It was not even designated as lots but property, and it would not be unreasonable to suppose that in these sparsely populated towns or villages the several tracts of land may have been of considerable extent and susceptible to irrigation. However, if we concede that from that evidence the board of supervisors should have drawn the inference that this property should not have been included in the calculation at all, there is nothing to show that the owners were not assessed upon other property in the district which should be so considered. It is to be observed that there is evidence in this respect as to those who signed the petition, but not as to the balance.

It is not to be disputed that the burden of proof was upon petitioners to prove every fact that lies at the foundation of their proceeding. They allege and were required to prove that their petition was signed by a majority of all the qualified owners of property within the proposed district. This involved, of course, the two considerations, to wit, the number of eligible names on their petition and the whole number upon the assessment roll. If either of these facts was left to conjecture or was not established satisfactorily, this court cannot say that the board exceeded its jurisdiction or violated a plain ministerial duty. As we view the record, we cannot say with any degree of certainty that more than 24 names should have been deducted, by reason of the ownership of lands not susceptible to irrigation, from the assessment roll. This would leave 295, and the 140 would therefore fall short of the required number.

[8] It appears that about 90 of those who signed said petition filed with the board, at the time of the hearing, a written application to have their names withdrawn and stricken from the petition upon the ground that they signed it under a misapprehension. Petitioner urges that this circumstance probably influenced the board in its denial of the petition. But the said Irrigation Act in section 2 provides that "signatures to the petition may be withdrawn at any time before the publication is commenced, as in this section required," etc., thereby implying that it may not be done thereafter. Since the record does not show to the contrary, we must assume that the board of supervisors had due regard for this provision of the statute and gave no effect to the attempted withdrawal. Indeed, the minutes show the ground upon which the order was based as follows:

"Whereas, the above matter having been heard by this board and evidence oral and documentary having been introduced and it appearing therefrom that the said petition does not comply with the requirements of an act approved March 31, 1897, and the subsequent acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, in that said petition does not contain, or is not signed by a majority in number of the holders of title, or evidence of title as required by said act and the amendments thereto.

"Now, therefore, be it resolved, that it is the sense of this board, and the board hereby finds, as a fact, that said petition contains less than a majority of the holders of title and evidence of title as shown by the assessment roll of Tehama county for the year of 1921, that the said petition be, and the same is hereby denied."

We think it cannot be held that the board acted without jurisdiction or in violation of its plain duty; and, moreover, if it might be said that there was sufficient evidence to justify a conclusion in accordance with the contention of petitioner, the state of the record is such that we should exercise our discretion in favor of respondent.

The order to show cause in each case is discharged, and the peremptory writ denied.

SCHOLLES v. SILVIUS. (Civ. 3688.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 19, 1922.)

1. Evidence $\S$ 246—Excluding attorney's letter admitting one-fourth interest in property only, instead of one-half claimed, error.

In an action to establish a trust and quiet title to a one-half interest in real property, the exclusion of a letter written by plaintiff's attorney burdened with the admission that her interest in the property was but a one-fourth was error.

2. Evidence $\S$ 258(2)—Letter written by attorney held to be utterance of client.

In an action to establish a trust and quiet title to a one-half interest in a parcel of real property, evidence held to show that a letter admitting ownership of a one-fourth interest only written by plaintiff's attorney, was written under her express direction, and that it was her utterance, and not merely that of her counsel.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action to establish a trust and quiet title by Grace M. Scholes against F. D. Silvius. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Hocker & Austin, of Los Angeles, and James F. McBryde, of Glendale, for appellant.

Leon R. Yankwich and Edward H. Allen, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action to establish a trust in a parcel of real property and to quiet title to an undivided one-half interest in it. The complaint alleges that upon certain considerations the parties had agreed to take title to the property, that defendant took title thereto in his own name in severalty, and that he refused to convey to plaintiff her one-half interest. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals.

It is contended by appellant that the trial court erred in refusing to receive a certain letter in evidence. The missive was written by respondent's counsel to appellant, and it was offered upon the theory that it contained an admission that respondent was entitled to but a one-fourth interest in the property; the objection to its reception in evidence being that it was but an offer of compromise. The body of the letter follows:

"Mrs. Grace Scholes of this city has retained me to protect her interests regarding the property located at 3026 South Hoover street in this city in which she has a one-fourth interest as a result of the agreement entered into between you and Mrs. Scholes at the time the property was purchased.

"A search of the records in the county recorder's office made this morning discloses the fact that no transfer of this property has been made, and, unless I receive a written assurance from you by return mail that you intend to live up to your agreement to the extent that she may be allowed to occupy the property at least until such time as the sum of $325 shall have been applied as rent at the rate of $25 per month for the apartment, I am instructed to file an action to have her declared an owner in said property to the extent of one-fourth interest.

"The sum of $325 is arrived at by using the sum of $3,500 as the actual value of the property. Mrs. Scholes is willing to settle the whole matter on the above basis; that is, that she be allowed to occupy the premises on the basis of $25 per month rent so long as any part of the said sum of $325 still remains due her; otherwise we will commence suit for an interest in the property."

It should be observed in explanation of this letter that the mention of the figures contained in it and the offer of appellant to accept an occupancy of the premises in settlement of her claim to an interest in the property all arose from certain negotiations which, according to the testimony of appellant, had preceded the final agreement to acquire the place. It is strikingly apparent from a perusal of the letter that it is burdened with the admission that respondent's interest in the property was but a one-fourth interest. The only question to be considered is whether the admission is one which may be termed an independent admission. Whether it is so appears to us to be settled by Rose v. Rose, 112 Cal. 341, 44 Pac. 658. The exact nature of the paper which was received in evidence in that case is not disclosed by the opinion of the Supreme Court, but we have examined the record on appeal in the litigation and have ascertained its contents. The case was a divorce case and one of the questions for determination was whether certain property was the community estate of the parties. The paper mentioned was signed by the husband. It opened with the assertion:

"I and Maria M. Rose are husband wife [sic], and are owners of the following community property, and which constitutes all the property that I have or own in my own name or otherwise."

There was next a statement that the two could not longer live happily as man and wife, followed by an offer to divide all the property describing it, equally with the wife. In disposing of the question as to the admissibility of the paper the Supreme Court said:

"The court did not err in admitting, on the issue as to the character of the property, the paper signed by defendant, in which he offered to divide the property, and described it as community property. It was admitted solely on the question as to whether the property was community or separate, and for this purpose it was proper as a declaration by the defendant, even conceding that the paper is to be regarded as an offer of compromise. The declaration as to the community character of the property was not essential to the purposes of the compromise, and is, therefore, not to be regarded as a concession made for that purpose. While, therefore, it would not be competent to admit an offer of compromise as such, the declaration therein of facts involved in the controversy which are not mere concessions made for the purpose of such offer, but are statements of independent facts, are admissible against the party making them.

"The rule is thus stated by Mr. Rice: 'It is never the intention of the law to shut out the truth, but to repel any inference which may arise from a proposition made, not with the design to admit the existence of a fact, but merely to buy one's peace. If an admission, however, is made because it is a fact, the evidence to prove is competent, whatever motive may have prompted to the declaration. But, if the party admits a particular item in an account, or any other fact, meaning to make the admission as being true, this is good evidence, although the object of the conversation was to compromise an existing controversy.' 1 Rice on Evidence, 435."

[1] It seems clear that Rose v. Rose is in point here. In fact, if there is any difference between that case and this, it operates against, rather than in favor of, respondent. The statement of Rose that the property mentioned by him was community property bore a closer relation to his proposition for a division of it than respondent's statement that she had but a one-fourth interest in the property in question here bears to her offer to accept an occupancy of it in lieu of an interest in common in it. We are satisfied that the court erred in excluding the letter.

[2] Respondent contends that the communication was inadmissible because it was written by her counsel, and not by herself. There are two conclusive answers to this contention. In the first place, the point was not raised in the trial court, the only objection to the letter being that it was an offer of compromise; secondly, the letter was identified by respondent herself while under cross-examination, and the offer of it was based upon that identification. The testimony on this head was as follows:

"Q. Now, you employed Mr. Allen [her counsel] to adjust this matter for you? A. To adjust this matter; yes; because I thought he [appellant] was trying to cheat me out of my property. Q. And you explained to Mr. Allen fully all the facts and circumstances of the surrounding case? A. I did. Q. And at your suggestion and with your consent Mr. Allen as your agent wrote Mr. Silvius a letter asking a settlement of the matter? A. He tried to compromise, which failed. Q. You authorized the writing of the letter. Do you know whether or not this is the letter that he wrote (passing letter to the witness)? A. It is. Mr. Austin: We ask that that be received as Defendant's Exhibit 1. A. (continuing). I had this letter written when I thought the property was sold."

It is apparent from this examination that the letter was written under the express direction of respondent, and that it was her utterance, and not merely that of her counsel.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

PERCY v. PERCY. (L. A. 7109.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1922.)

- 1. Divorce ⚡184(10)—Except that plaintiff's testimony must be corroborated, findings on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Rule that findings of fact on conflicting evidence may not be disturbed on appeal is applicable in a divorce case, with the single exception that, before a divorce can be granted, plaintiff's testimony must, under Civ. Code, § 130, be corroborated.

- 2. Divorce ⚡127(4)—What is sufficient corroboration of plaintiff stated.

The corroboration of plaintiff's testimony, which, under Civ. Code, § 130, is necessary for divorce, is not of every act of which there is testimony, but it is enough that there is evidence, circumstantial or direct, substantially tending to confirm the party's testimony on a considerable number of material facts.

- 3. Divorce ⚡127(4)—Corroboration of plaintiff's testimony as to residence held sufficient.

Corroboration of testimony of plaintiff in divorce as to his residence in county of suit held sufficient.

- 4. Divorce ⚡62(6)—Plaintiff could establish residence while on military duty in an army camp.

Plaintiff in divorce was not precluded from establishing his residence in the county of suit because, at the time in question, he was there on military duty in an army camp.

- 5. Divorce ⚡254—Judgment awarding community property unauthorized by pleadings or submission.

The issue of division of the community property not having been submitted to the court by the pleadings or otherwise, but the evidence of, and reference to, the value of such property having been incidental to the issue of cruelty, predicated on extravagance and the allowance of costs to the wife, judgment so far as awarding to the husband the balance of the community property, after payment of costs awarded to the wife, was unjustified.

- 6. Divorce ⚡322—Rights in community property may be left for subsequent action.

The rights in the community property need not be litigated in an action for divorce, but may be left for determination in a subsequent action, in which the court may exercise its discretion where divorce was awarded on the ground of extreme cruelty.

- 7. Divorce ⚡194—Right to costs on appeal to be determined by Supreme Court.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1027, 1034, and the rules of court, the determination of whether appellant in a divorce action is entitled to her costs on appeal is for the Supreme Court.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action for divorce by James Fulton Percy against Josephine Levina Percy. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified.

Lucien Gray, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Gordon Gray and Dwight D. Bell, both of San Diego, and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. The plaintiff husband was granted an interlocutory decree of divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty and desertion, and the defendant was awarded $1,000 as her share of the community property, payment of which was ordered forthwith. The defendant appeals upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings of the trial court as to residence, cruelty, and desertion, and predicates such contention in part upon the statutory requirement that the evidence of the parties in a divorce action must be corroborated. Civ. Code, § 130. It is conceded that the evidence on most of the contested points is contradictory, but it is nevertheless claimed that there is not sufficient corroboration to justify the respective findings attacked.

[1, 2] Appellate courts are powerless to interfere with the findings of fact, where the evidence is conflicting. This rule applies to divorce cases as well as to any other, with the single exception that, before a divorce can be granted, the testimony of the plaintiff must be corroborated. Civ. Code, § 130. The rule in this regard is correctly stated in the respondent's brief, as follows:

"Corroboration of every act sworn to by the plaintiff is not required. Evidence, circumstantial or direct, substantially tending to confirm the plaintiff's testimony upon a considerable number of material facts, is sufficient." Cooper v. Cooper, 88 Cal. 45, 48, 25 Pac. 1062; Andrews v. Andrews, 120 Cal. 184, 52 Pac. 298; Avery v. Avery, 148 Cal. 239, 82 Pac. 967.

Without a discussion of the evidence or of the findings in detail it is sufficient to say that the record shows ample corroboration of the plaintiff's testimony.

As to the finding of desertion, appellant claims that the plaintiff's testimony concerning her refusal to have reasonable marital intercourse is not corroborated, except by her admission, and that therefore the evidence is insufficient to justify a decree upon that ground. In view of our conclusion that the evidence is sufficient to support the finding of the trial court upon the issue of extreme cruelty, it is immaterial whether or not the testimony with reference to desertion is corroborated.

[3, 4] It is claimed that there is not sufficient corroboration to sustain the testimony of the plaintiff as to his residence in the county of San Diego for more than a year before the action was commenced. It is conceded that the plaintiff actually lived within the county of San Diego for more than a year before the commencement of the suit. He testified that he lived there with the intention of making California and, for the time being, the county of San Diego, his permanent residence. He was at that time in the United States army, serving as a physician in the military hospital at Camp Kearny. His actual presence within the county of San Diego for more than a year immediately prior to the bringing of the action was amply corroborated by the testimony of others, and his intention to make California his residence was corroborated by various circumstances indicating his intent to establish his residence in California. Plaintiff's testimony as to his intention to remain in California was corroborated by the application to the state medical board for a license to practice; by his investigation concerning his right to practice in California; by his conference with physicians with a view to establishing a partnership here; by his declarations from time to time of his intention to remain in California; by his application to join a secret order which required a residence for six months in California as a condition to initiation; by his registration to vote, wherein he took the usual oath that at the next election he would have been one year within the state of California. The fact that, at the time in question, he was on military duty in an army camp did not preclude him from establishing his residence there if he so desired. Stewart v. Kyser, 105 Cal. 459, 464, 39 Pac. 19; Budd v. Holden, 28 Cal. 124, 127; Estate of Gordon, 142 Cal. 125, 75 Pac. 672.

[5] Appellant contends that the portion of the decree awarding her $1,000 as her proportion of the community property and directing its payment forthwith is premature and beyond the issues, and for that reason the case should be reversed. It is conceded by the respondent that the order directing the immediate payment of the $1,000 is premature and therefore erroneous, but that the appellant is not aggrieved by that portion of the order which directs the immediate payment to her of the $1,000. This is undoubtedly true. The serious question in the case is whether or not the rights of the parties as to the community property was submitted to the court for decision. This issue was not raised in the pleadings. It is claimed by the appellant that all the evidence in regard to the community property and the parties was introduced, not with a view of ascertaining the character and extent of this property for purposes of division, but merely as incidental to the issue of extreme cruelty which was in part predicated upon the extravagance of the defendant. The appellant therefore claims that she is not bound by the rule which requires that judgments shall be affirmed even though the formal issues are not raised by the pleadings, where the parties in fact litigated the question in the lower court, and the judgment determined the actual questions litigated.

Immediately upon the court orally announcing its conclusion that the plaintiff was entitled to a divorce upon both grounds stated in the complaint and that the findings would be prepared by the plaintiff in the usual way, the defendant asked the court to take into consideration the question of costs. It was suggested to the court that no preliminary motion had been made by the defendant for costs and that the plaintiff had furnished no money for costs for the defendant. Defendant's attorney thereupon stated: "It seems to me there should be some allowance to cover her costs and expenses at least." The court thereupon discussed the value of the community property as shown by the evidence. This included the value of the plaintiff's office at Galesburg and its equipment and $3,000 in liberty bonds. The court then asked counsel if they wished to be heard further on the question of costs before it was decided. Plaintiff's counsel replied that he did. In the course of the discussion as to the costs counsel agreed that, under the law, the court had power to award all the community property to the plaintiff where the divorce was granted upon the ground of cruelty. The court then stated that the defendant had made a clean cut defense which was justified and that he felt that he "might well take into account what she had expended in making that kind of a defense, and deduct it from the community property." Thereupon the following occurred:

"Mr. Lucien Gray: It is before your Honor that the doctor has $76,000 insurance and from his insurance he expects to receive an income when he is 64 years of age, besides this other property. I simply call that to the attention of the court. It is only approximate. All the expenses of the defendant have to be met; she made a trip back to take depositions and so forth. If the court wants to take that up now or at any other time we will be glad to take it up and make any suggestions or recommendations about it. I would like to have it all settled, if I could, while we were here, particularly as both Mr. Cosgrove and myself are going back to Los Angeles.

"Mr. Cosgrove: We think the court ought to decide it now.

"The Court: I will tell you, it is a purely arbitrary thing with me. I think she is financially on a safe footing; it, however, does not occur to me when the suggestion is made that it would not be out of keeping with the situation to indemnify her to some extent against the costs made in the kind of a defense that she has conducted here. I suggest that she be allowed a thousand dollars, and that it be arranged so that it may be paid within the possibilities of the plaintiff.

"Mr. Lucien Gray: Of course a thousand dollars would hardly cover her actual court expenses, her depositions and actual costs in court, to say nothing of her personal expense or counsel fees.

"The Court: Well, it is an endeavor to help out in the court costs, and in the actual expenditures that I had that in mind; I had no idea of what they were, or anything of that kind."

After further discussion as to the expenses of the litigation the court stated:

"Mr. Lucien Gray: I understood him to say he had all his insurance so that at 64 years of age he would receive an income.

"The Court: I did when I heard him, but I do not see how he figured it. He would have a very meager income from anything the testimony shows he had in the way of life insurance. I think I will let it go at a thousand dollars and try and arrange it in the matter of the judgment how it should be paid."

This colloquy does not justify the conclusion that the parties submitted to the court an issue which is not contained in the pleadings, namely, the division of the community property. Neither plaintiff nor defendant has alleged the nature nor extent of the community property. The colloquy occurred after the court had announced its decision and is directed wholly to the question of cost which was a matter in the discretion of the trial court. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1022, 1025. The statement about the division of the property was wholly incidental to the question of costs under discussion. Under section 137 of the Civil Code the court was authorized, during the pendency of the action, to require the plaintiff to pay for the support of the defendant and her expenses in prosecuting the action. As no such preliminary order had been made and as the court at the time of the rendition of its judgment had a right to require the plaintiff to pay the defendant's costs (Code Civ. Proc. § 1025), it is apparent that the whole matter referred to by counsel, as submitted to the court at that time for its decision, was the matter of costs, and that the order of the court, as announced at the hearing, was one for the payment of these costs to the defendant from the community property, thus diminishing the total amount of community property. That portion of the decree which directs the plaintiff to pay defendant $1,000 from the community property is in accordance with the request of the parties that the court fix the costs to be paid by the plaintiff and the manner of its payment, but the judgment, in so far as it awards to the plaintiff the balance of the community property, is justified neither by the pleadings nor by the subsequent conduct of the parties. It was a decision upon an issue not presented to the court, namely, the division of the community property.

[6] The parties were entitled to litigate their marital status without reference to their community property and to leave their rights in the community property to be determined by a subsequent action in which the court might exercise its discretion as to a proper division thereof, inasmuch as the divorce was awarded to plaintiff upon the ground of extreme cruelty. Brown v. Brown, 170 Cal. 1, 147 Pac. 1168. The judgment must be modified.

[7] Under the statute and rules of the court it is necessary for this court to determine whether or not the appellant is entitled to her costs (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1027, 1034) upon appeal. The bulk of the transcript, containing 846 pages, is taken up with a presentation of the conflicting evidence with relation to the various acts of cruelty and residence, and therefore is unnecessarily long.

The trial court is directed to modify its fifth conclusion of law to read as follows: "That defendant is entitled to $1,000 to be paid to her as costs from the community property of said parties," and to modify the last paragraph of the interlocutory decree to read as follows: "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that plaintiff pay to the defendant the sum of $1,000 costs out of the community property of said parties." It is further ordered that appellant have one-half of her costs of printing transcript on appeal, the costs of printing her briefs, not exceeding the statutory allowance of $100, and her other costs on appeal.

1. Counties 55—Court may determine existence of facts on which declaration of necessity of immediate effect of ordinance based.

The determination of the board of supervisors that facts existed which made it necessary for an ordinance to take effect immediately on its passage, as provided in Pol. Code, §§ 4057, 4058, are not conclusive, and the court may determine for itself the existence or nonexistence of the facts on which the declaration of necessity was based.

2. Counties 55—Ordinance held not effective until 30 days after passage.

Ordinance declaring it to be unlawful for any person to ship or offer for shipment citrus fruits, showing evidence of 15 per cent. of frost injury, is not to be interpreted as a measure for preservation of public health, which under Pol. Code, § 4058, could be made to take effect immediately and it could not take effect till 30 days after its passage, as provided in section 4057.

In Bank.

Application of Hugh Newell for a writ of habeas corpus against the Sheriff of Los Angeles County. Writ granted.

Leonard, Surr & Hellyer, of San Bernardino, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Thomas Lee Woolwine and Tracy Chatfield Becker, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, C. J. The petitioner, by a proceeding in habeas corpus, seeks release from custody on a charge that he has violated the provisions of an ordinance of the county of Los Angeles, passed by the board of supervisors on January 22, 1922.

The provision of the ordinance, which he is charged with having violated, declares it to be unlawful for any person to ship or offer for shipment—"citrus fruits in boxes or other containers or in bulk if the contents of any package or of the fruit in bulk contains fifteen per cent. or more of citrus fruits showing in two or more segments of each fruit marked evidence of frost injury."

The Political Code (section 4057) provides that, except as provided in section 4058, no ordinance "shall take effect within less than 30 days after its passage." Section 4058 provides for a referendum and that such referendum may be initiated by a petition presented to the board of supervisors within 30 days after the final passage of the ordinance, with respect to all ordinances, except, among others, any "ordinance for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety."

The ordinance in question declares that it shall take effect immediately upon its passage, and that this declaration is made "because the adoption and the enforcement hereof is necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health and safety by reason of the fact that the public peace, health, and safety is now being endangered by the transportation and sale of frozen citrus fruits."

[1] It is a settled rule, applicable to such powers given to a board of supervisors by statutes of this character, that the determination of the board that the facts exist, which make it necessary for an ordinance to take effect immediately, is not conclusive and that the court may, and when a case requires it to do so must, inquire into and determine for itself the existence or nonexistence of the facts upon which the declaration of necessity is based. San Christina, etc., Co. v. San Francisco, 167 Cal. 772, 141 Pac. 384, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 676; Josselyn v. San Francisco, 168 Cal. 441, 143 Pac. 705; Keyes v. San Francisco, 177 Cal. 317, 173 Pac. 475; Burr v. San Francisco (Cal. Sup.) 199 Pac. 1036, 17 A. L. R. 581.

The ordinance was passed on January 22, 1922, and the complaint against the petitioner, filed in March, 1922, charges that he did, on February 10, 1922, ship and offer for shipment to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, three boxes of oranges, more than 15 per cent. of which oranges showed, in two or more segments of each orange, marked evidence of frost injury. It will be seen that, at the time the alleged offer was made, the ordinance was not in force, unless the declaration aforesaid that it was necessary for it to be immediately effective was valid for that purpose, that is, unless such enforcement was necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, or safety. It is conceded that the date charged is the true date of the act charged. Hence the rule that the date is not material in a criminal complaint and that the commission of the act can be proven to have occurred at any time within the period of limitation need not be considered.

[2] It will not be contended that the shipment of partly frozen oranges could in any manner endanger the public peace or the public safety. The only branch of the provision of the statute providing for the immediate taking effect of an ordinance, which it is necessary to consider, is the one referring to the public health. We are of the opinion that the ordinance should not be construed as intended to preserve the public health. The effect of frost upon an orange makes it become tasteless and unpalatable. We are not advised, and it is not suggested, that such frozen oranges are more detrimental to health than other tasteless and unpalatable substances. The outside appearance is calculated to deceive the eye of the buyer, especially if he has had no experience with frozen oranges. But no ordinance is necessary to inform the eater that such an orange is unpalatable or unfit to eat. His sense of taste will impart that information to him at once. Before the process of fermentation begins, such an orange is palatable. The purpose of preventing the sale of frozen oranges is not to protect health. The sale and shipment of such oranges, as is well known, constitutes a menace to the interests of the orange growers of the state. It injures the reputation, and impairs the market value of California oranges, and is likely to cause all orange growers direct and great financial injury. It is for this reason that precautions are taken by them to prevent the sale of such fruit. We do not doubt that, on that account, reasonable regulations for the prevention of such sales and shipment are within the scope of police power, and we are satisfied that the ordinance was adopted for that purpose alone, and that it was valid as a police regulation as soon as it became effective. For these reasons we are convinced that the ordinance should not be interpreted as a measure for the preservation of public peace, health, or safety. The result is that, under section 4058, aforesaid, it could not take effect immediately, but would take effect within 30 days after its passage, that is, on February 21, 1922. This was after the act in question had occurred, and therefore at the time the act was done it was not unlawful. Consequently the complaint states no valid charge against the defendant.

Let the petitioner be discharged.

ROWLAND et al. v. HORST. (S. F. 9151.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1922.)

1. Parties ⇐21—Party from whom agent collected account not necessary party in action by principal against agent for the money collected.

In an action by a principal against his agent for the payment of money claimed to have been received by the agent for the principal's benefit but retained by the agent, the person by whom the sum was paid to the agent was not a necessary party.

2. Parties ⇐21—Persons interested in resisting demands necessary parties to action for enforcement.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 389, necessary parties to an action in the capacity of defendants are those who are interested in resisting the demands of the plaintiff, either immediately or consequently, and whose rights would be prejudicially affected by the controversy.

3. Principal and agent ⇐78(1)—Agent appointed to collect cannot rely on his refusal to collect balance due to defeat settlement.

Where an agent was appointed to settle and adjust a claim against a carrier, in an action by his principal for the sums collected, the agent could not be permitted to occupy the position of one refusing or failing to make the collection of a balance to which he had long been entitled and yet at the same time refuse to settle with his principals, on the sole ground that such collection had not been made.

4. Principal and agent ⇐78(6)—Evidence sustained finding of principals' proportion of proceeds turned over to agent by carrier.

Where an agent was appointed to adjust and settle a claim for damage to barley in shipment, in an action by the principals against the agent for sums collected, evidence held to sustain a finding of the principals' proportion of the sums turned over to the agent by the carrier.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John T. Nourse, Judge.

Action by John Henry Rowland and another, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of John Westrope & Co., against E. Clemens Horst. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward C. Harrison and Maurice E. Harrison, both of San Francisco, for appellant. McCutchen, Olney, Willard, Mannon & Greene, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This action was commenced by the plaintiffs as copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of John Westrope & Co., to recover from the defendant the sum of $42,812.50, with legal interest and costs, claimed to have been received by the defendant as the agent of said firm in certain transactions which are set forth in detail in the plaintiff's amended complaint. Said complaint is in three counts, which all relate to the same matter. The first count in brief alleges that the plaintiffs, who, under their said firm name, are engaged in the business of buying, selling, and shipping grain in the city of Hull, England, but with a local office or agency in the city and county of San Francisco, which had, during the months of July and August, 1915, delivered to the Southern Pacific Company at various points in California 35 carloads of barley, aggregating 30,754 sacks, of the total weight of 3,240,944 pounds, for shipment to said plaintiffs, as consignees, at Hull, England, via the Sunset route of said railroad; and that, while said barley was in course of transit, at or near the city of Galveston, Tex., it was damaged by the Galveston Flood, which occurred in August of that year, through the negligence of the carrier, from which the plaintiffs had sustained a large loss. That the local agent of the plaintiffs in San Francisco had secured the services of the defendant to act as the plaintiffs' agent, and, on their behalf, in presenting the claim of said plaintiffs to the Southern Pacific Company for such loss and in conducting negotiations for the purpose of securing a settlement of their said claim; and that said defendant, acting as the plaintiffs' said agent, had entered into an agreement of settlement with the said Southern Pacific Company, whereby the claim of the said plaintiffs had been settled in full and by which the said defendant, as such agent of the plaintiffs, had received the sum of $42,812.50, which he had failed and neglected to account for or pay over to the said plaintiffs. The second count of the plaintiffs' amended complaint repeats in the main, but with somewhat more of detail, the averments of the first count, but relates more particularly to a specific payment of $12,500, which was to be made and which was alleged to have been made by the Southern Pacific Company in final adjustment and settlement of a balance remaining unpaid upon the claims of the plaintiffs and certain other shippers whose barley had also been damaged in said flood, and of which sum the plaintiffs claim that, after making certain deductions, they are entitled to a balance of $3,700 from the defendant, but which he had failed and refused to pay over to the plaintiffs. The third count was in the form of a common count upon an alleged indebtedness of $42,812.50 due from the defendant to the plaintiffs and unpaid. This amended complaint was unverified. There was no demurrer.

The defendant's answer consisted of a general denial of each of the counts in the amended complaint, to which was added a counterclaim for services alleged to be of the reasonable value of $50,000. An amendment to this answer was later filed containing three additional defenses, the first that of an alleged nonjoinder of the E. Clemens Horst Company, alleged to be a necessary party defendant; the second being that of an alleged nonjoinder of the Southern Pacific Company, alleged also to be a necessary party defendant; and the third being a plea to the effect that the plaintiffs, doing business as partners under a fictitious name, had not complied with the statutes of California having reference to such partnerships, so as to be entitled to maintain their present action. The first and third of these special defenses appeared to have been waived during the trial, but the second thereof, viz., the nonjoinder of the Southern Pacific Company, is still insisted upon on this appeal. The cause went to trial upon the issues as thus framed, and upon its submission the trial court made and filed its findings of fact, going into much of detail as to the history of the transaction, and arriving at its legal conclusion that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $23,789.43, for which sum judgment was ordered and entered. Upon the special defense of the defendant as to the nonjoinder of the Southern Pacific Company, the court found that the said corporation was not a necessary party to the action. In order to determine the correctness of the aforesaid findings and judgment of the trial court it will be necessary to review somewhat the evidence upon which its determination rests.

The plaintiffs were, as has been seen, the shippers of 35 carloads of barley by the Sunset route of the Southern Pacific Company to themselves at Hull, England, in the summer of 1915, which barley was damaged in transit by the occurrence and effect of the Galveston Flood. There were a number of other shippers of barley of about the same quality by the same route and at the same time, whose shipments were also damaged in the same flood and were largely intermingled with the plaintiffs' barley, in the effort to save these cargoes from complete loss in said flood. The aggregate of such intermingled shipments of barley was 56 carloads. One of these other shippers was the E. Clemens Horst Company, of which the defendant is the manager, and its shipment was one carload of barley. The defendant, being interested in the matter of the claims for compensation arising out of the damage to these aggregated and intermingled carloads of barley, came into touch with the plaintiffs' local representative, with the result of his selection as the plaintiffs' fully authorized agent to make an adjustment and settlement of its claim against the Southern Pacific Company. During the course of such adjustment the defendant also came to represent another of said shippers, George W. McNear & Co., which had shipped 20 of said carloads of barley, but, before the negotiations with the Southern Pacific Company were completed by him, the defendant had acquired by transfer to himself the ownership of the claims of the E. Clemens Horst Company and the George W. McNear Company in respect to said intermingled carload lots of barley, and to the damages which had been occasioned thereto by said flood; so that, in the month of October, 1916, when the final memorandum of adjustment and settlement of these aggregated claims was signed by the defendant representing the claimants and by the duly authorized representative of the Southern Pacific Company, the defendant occupied the dual relation of agent of the plaintiffs in respect to their claim and of principal in so far as the claims of E. Clemens Horst Company and of George W. McNear Company were concerned. He assumed, in making said settlement, to act in his own name as to all of said claimants. The agreement of settlement is in full as follows:

"San Francisco, October 6, 1916.

"Mr. Durbrow: Without prejudice I respectfully submit to you the following offer of adjustment of any and all disputes relative to the shipment of 56 cars of barley from California during July and August, 1915, and which are claimed to have been involved in Galveston Flood, August, 1915.

"The above-mentioned shipment shipped in the name of 20 cars by George W. McNear, Inc., to Christiana, Copenhagen and New York;

1 car by E. C. Horst & Co. to New York,

35 cars by John Westrope Co. to Hull.

"The offer of settlement is as follows:

"(1) E. C. Horst & Co. to get for S. P. Co. from owners of the barley, clean releases of all liability on all 56 carloads involved in the dispute.

"(2) S. P. Co. to deliver Horst free alongside their dock to Horst's vessels, all unsold barley now in New York on docks and in warehouses, originally shipped by Westrope, McNear and Horst, as principals or agents, upon surrender to S. P. Co. bills lading covering said shipment,

"(3) S. P. Co. to pay Horst the gross proceeds of all barley sold by S. P. Co., ex. above 56 cars, upon receipt of releases from Horst.

"(4) Horst to pay freight to New York on point of origin weights, on entire 56 carloads, less whatever amounts of freight have already been paid to S. P. Co. upon delivery of said shipments by S. P. Co.

"(5) S. P. Co. to waive reconditioning charges in event Horst fully performs all conditions.

"(6) S. P. Co. to repay Horst freight prepaid from New York to Christiana, Copenhagen and New York transfer charges on barley not transferred, plus interest thereon from date of payment until repayment of 6 per cent. per annum.

"(7) S. P. Co. to pay Horst $12,500.00 whenever and at such time as Horst has fully performed all conditions.

"(8) S. P. Co. shall pay Horst nothing for his services in making adjustments.

"San Francisco, October 9, 1916.

"E. C. Horst,

"G. W. Luce."

Prior to the completion of the foregoing negotiations, the plaintiffs had received about one-third of the total amount of their original shipment as the same had been disentangled from the intermingled aggregate, the same having been shipped to them by the Southern Pacific Company at Hull. The remainder of this original shipment was, shortly after the making of the foregoing agreement of settlement, sold by the defendant to certain European buyers, receiving therefor the sum of $29,335.24. He was also, by the terms of the settlement above set forth, entitled to receive from the Southern Pacific Company the sum of $12,500 whenever he had performed on his part the terms of the aforesaid agreement, which required him to get for the Southern Pacific Company from the owners of the barley clean releases of all liability on all 56 carloads involved in the dispute. These releases were prepared by the attorney for the Southern Pacific Company and were executed by the defendant on November 13, 1916, acting on behalf of the plaintiffs as their attorney in fact. The evidence shows these releases to have been satisfactory to the Southern Pacific Company, and no other or further releases have ever by it been required. Having thus come into possession of a large sum of money belonging to his principal derived from his sales of their remaining barley to said European buyers, and having thus become entitled to receive from the Southern Pacific Company the sum of $12,500, less the sum which was to be paid as freight charges under the terms of said agreement, and having informed the plaintiffs of his said acts, the latter began seeking to make a settlement with him as their agent, by which they should receive such balance as might be due them after payment of the defendant's commissions for his services and his claims for expenses incurred, and after making such deductions from the gross sum which was or should have been in his hands as he might be obligated to pay in the way of the freight charges under the terms of his foregoing agreement with the Southern Pacific Company. After repeated efforts to obtain such settlement, the plaintiffs commenced the present action, with the result which has been above noted. The defendant appeals from the judgment which determines the net amount which plaintiffs were entitled to receive as a deduction from the foregoing facts.

[1, 2] The appellant's first contention upon this appeal is that the trial court was in error in deciding adversely upon his defense of nonjoinder of the Southern Pacific Company as a necessary party defendant in this action. We discover no such error. The action was one strictly between the plaintiffs as principals and the defendant as their agent for the payment to them of money claimed to have been received by their said agent for their benefit and retained by him. The Southern Pacific Company had no interest in that relationship nor in the plaintiffs' said claim. It may be conceded that one of the defenses which the defendant might urge to his payment to the plaintiffs of the sum claimed was that he had not yet received all or a portion of said money from the Southern Pacific Company; but this would not require the joinder of the latter in the action either originally or latterly as a necessary party thereto, since it was in no wise concerned in the dispute between the plaintiffs and their agent as to the settlement of their accounts. Necessary parties to an action in the capacity of defendants are those who are interested in resisting the demands of the plaintiff either immediately or consequently and whose rights would be prejudicially affected by the controversy. Pomeroy, Code Remedies, pp. 320, 321; Code Civ. Proc. § 389. It might be possible that the Southern Pacific Company would have been a proper party to this action had the defendant suggested by his pleadings or succeeded in showing, as one of his defenses, that the reason he had not paid over to his principals some portion of the moneys claimed from him was that he had not been able to collect the same from the said corporation under the agreement which he had made with it on the plaintiffs' behalf, but, if he had such a defense and if the presence of the said corporation as a party to the action was necessary to enable him to make it, the court upon his motion, or even of its own motion, might have ordered the said corporation brought into the action. But this evidently is not the fact, since the evidence discloses that the Southern Pacific Company has received from the defendant, acting as the plaintiffs' agent, full releases of their claims on account of their said barley, and is satisfied therewith and stands and has long stood ready to pay over to the defendant whatever balance of the $12,500 referred to in its agreement with him, is due, after deducting the freight charges mentioned in said agreement.

[3] The defendant herein cannot be permitted to occupy the position of one refusing or failing to make the collection of said balance to which he has long been entitled, and yet at the same time refusing to settle with his principals upon the sole ground that such collection has not been made. Under such circumstances his dilatory plea that the Southern Pacific Company has not been joined as a defendant in the action does not meet with favor, and is wholly without the semblance of merit.

[4] The next contention of the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the plaintiffs' share of the net total of $34,545.64 received by the defendant from the sale of the portion of said barley turned over to him by the carrier and sold to European buyers was 84.9 per cent. thereof, or the sum of $29,335.24. This contention is based upon several elements, all of which are elaborately discussed in the briefs of counsel for appellant. He argues that there was insufficient evidence to support the court's finding that 1,777,555 out of the total of 2,093,704 pounds of barley so sold to European buyers belonged to the plaintiffs. The basis of this finding was the so-called Price-Waterhouse & Co.'s report. This firm of experts were requested by the defendant himself to make a careful examination of the barley on the New York piers for the purpose of determining what proportion thereof belonged to each of the original shippers. They made such examination and report, and the latter was offered in evidence by the plaintiffs and was admitted without objection on the defendant's part. It is conceded that the report embraced matter which would suffice to uphold the finding of the trial court in this regard. The present objection of the defendant that it was hearsay was waived by its admission in evidence without objection. In addition to this evidence upon this point there was also offered and admitted certain letters, telegrams, and reports of the defendant, wherein he has stated that an even larger proportion of this barley belonged to the plaintiffs than that found by the court. These declarations eke out the report of the experts and supply, we think, ample evidence to justify the finding as to the amount of said barley shipped to European buyers which belonged to these plaintiffs. The appellant further argues that the evidence was insufficient to show that the plaintiffs' barley so sold on their account was of equal quality to that of the other shippers with which it had been intermingled, so as to entitle the plaintiffs to the same percentage of share in the proceeds of these European sales as the bulk of their barley bore to that of their fellow shippers; but upon this subject also the Price-Waterhouse & Co. report speaks sufficiently to show that the plaintiffs' barley was fully up to the quality which would entitle them to the same proportionate share in the proceeds of such sales as the weight of their barley bore to that of their fellow shippers. We conclude, therefore, that the contention of the appellant that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the full amount of $29,335.24 as their share of the proceeds of the European sales of their barley is without merit.

The appellant's next and main contention is, first that the evidence does not sustain the finding of the trial court to the effect that the plaintiffs were entitled to receive $7,125 of the $12,500 to be paid the defendant by the Southern Pacific Company pursuant to their aforesaid agreement. The defendant himself, however, testified that the value of the plaintiffs' barley amounted to 57 per cent. of the value of the entire barley shipment damaged in the Galveston Flood. This percentage would give the plaintiffs precisely the sum of $7,125 out of said $12,500 which the trial court awarded them and would also furnish sufficient proof to justify the court's finding to that effect. Besides there was abundant evidence that the loss to the plaintiffs by reason of the damage caused by said flood was much greater in proportion than that suffered by the other shippers. While the exact proportion of such damage was difficult of ascertainment and while the evidence in the case reflects the extent of this difficulty due to the confusion caused through the intermingling of the consignments of the several shippers, still we think the evidence taken as a whole shows that the trial court rather underestimated than enlarged the proportion of said $12,500 which the plaintiffs were entitled to receive. The second contention of the appellant under this head is his claim that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover no part of this sum of $12,500 from him, for the reason that he had not received the same from the Southern Pacific Company and hence he could not be required to account for or pay over any portion of said sum to the plaintiffs. It appears to be a fact, and the court so found, that the defendant has not yet received said sum of $12,500 from the Southern Pacific Company. But this fact standing alone would not be sufficient to bar the plaintiffs' right to recover from the defendant its due share of said sum, unless it should also appear that the failure of the defendant to collect and receive this money was due to no fault or hindrance of his own. Upon this subject the evidence shows quite convincingly that the terms of settlement with the Southern Pacific Company were fixed by the above-quoted agreement between itself and the defendant as of the date of October 6, 1916; that within a few weeks after that date the defendant consummated the sale of the remainder of the plaintiffs' barley then on the New York piers to European buyers, receiving therefrom the sum of $29,335.24, money belonging to the plaintiffs; that from that time forth the defendant had in his possession ample funds with which to pay the railroad company whatever freight or other charge on account of these barley shipments were coming to it by virtue of said agreement; that not long thereafter the defendant, assuming to act for the plaintiffs, gave to the Southern Pacific Company the full releases which were required from all the shippers of said barley to be given to it by them, and that these releases so executed had at all times been satisfactory to the Southern Pacific Company. Nothing thereafter remained for the defendant to do but to get from the Southern Pacific Company the said sum of $12,500, or whatever balance would be coming to him upon the adjustment of the predetermined and undisputed account. The defendant did not, however, do this but began delaying his settlement with his principals upon various pretexts and by the making of claims for compensation in the form of commissions and otherwise, which the trial court found to be exorbitant and refused to sustain.

During the protracted interviews and correspondence carried on between the defendant and the principals or their representatives prior to the institution of this action the defendant never suggested that the fact that he had not as yet received the amount coming from the Southern Pacific Company stood in the way of a settlement with his principals, but on the contrary made repeated offers of immediate settlement upon other terms as to commissions and compensation which were not acceptable to them. In his pleadings in this action he made no claim or plea that the action had been prematurely brought, but based his defenses wholly upon other grounds. The present claim that the defendant ought not to be required to pay over to the plaintiffs, his principals, the large sums he had received from the sale of their barley to European buyers for the reason that he had not seen fit to collect the comparatively small sum to which he was entitled to get without obstacle from the Southern Pacific Company was an evident afterthought of which the plaintiffs had no notice or knowledge until after this action was instituted. Under these circumstances we think the trial court would have been entirely justified in directing the defendant to pay over to the plaintiffs the whole amount to which they were shown to be entitled, even though a certain small portion thereof had not been received by the defendant solely by reason of his own unexcused delay in collecting it. The trial court did not, however, go so far, but in its findings and judgment so adjusted the accounts between the parties as to charge the credits which the defendant was found entitled to receive for commission compensation, and traveling expenses, together with such amounts as he was required to pay the Southern Pacific Company for freight charges under the aforesaid agreement against the particular sum which the plaintiffs would otherwise have been entitled to receive from said corporation under said agreement, and by so doing did not require the defendant to actually pay over to the plaintiffs any money which he did not for any cause receive. All that the defendant has to do under the form of this judgment is to make those settlements with the Southern Pacific Company which he was required by his agreement to do and in the way of which there is no obstacle and which he should apparently have long since done, paying over to the plaintiffs the net sum derived by him from the sales of the plaintiffs' barley to the European buyers and which he has long and without sufficient reason withheld.

As to the other contentions of the defendant with reference to the reasonableness of his compensation, these matters were submitted to the discretion of the trial court in view of all the circumstances of the case, and we are unable to discover that this discretion has been in any manner abused. Its findings as to these matters will not, therefore, be disturbed upon appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by James Connor against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

E. W. Camp, M. W. Reed, and Robert Brennan, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Allison & Dickson, of San Bernardino (David W. Richards, of San Bernardino, of counsel), for respondent.

WILBUR, J. The plaintiff recovered a judgment for $7,500, for injuries received by him while acting as a fireman upon a train operated from Searchlight to Goffs, upon the railroad of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway. The injuries were caused by the giving away of an abutment of a bridge, upon which the engine occupied by the plaintiff was crossing. The line was a branch line, 52 miles in length, and the train operated by the plaintiff and his coemployees left Goffs for Searchlight in the morning, crossing the bridge in question about 3 miles after leaving Barnwell. The injuries occurred when they were returning over the same bridge in the evening. During the afternoon, a cloud-burst occurred in the mountains, causing a washout under the eastern abutment of the bridge, about 4 feet wide and sufficiently deep to undermine the abutment. The tracks remained in perfect alignment, and there was nothing to indicate to the approaching engineer and fireman that there had been any washout rendering the bridge unsafe, although there was some evidence that there had been rainfall in the vicinity. The train was proceeding about 10 miles an hour. The negligence relied upon by the plaintiff is the failure of the defendants to cause the track to be inspected after the cloud-burst and before the train passed over the bridge.

That "the approach and support of said bridge, on the opposite end from the direction in which said locomotive was proceeding, had previously been washed away by water, leaving said bridge in a defective and unsafe condition and unfit for the purpose for which it was constructed. That the condition of the said approach and support to said bridge and the condition of said bridge was not known to the plaintiff, but said condition was, or could have been, known to the defendants by the exercise of proper and necessary care on the part of the defendants, their agents, and servants. That the defendants, by and through their agents and servants, carelessly and negligently permitted and allowed said bridge to be and remain in the defective and unsafe condition as aforesaid, and did not exercise that degree of care and precaution and diligence to provide safe appliances and roadbed which the law requires."

The defendant John Barton Payne admits the injury to the bridge by the washout, but denies that he had knowledge of the injury to the bridge or that he could have ascertained such injury by the exercise of proper or necessary care, and denies that he negligently permitted the bridge to remain in an unsafe condition. The plaintiff offered evidence tending to show that certain employees of the defendant railroad director had been informed of the cloud-burst but, notwithstanding such information, had failed to inspect the tracks.

The defendants appeal from the judgment and claim that, in any event, the judgment is erroneous as to the railway company, because of the fact that, at the time of the accident, the railroad was being operated by the Director General, John Barton Payne, the defendant. It is conceded by the respondent that the judgment against the railroad company should be reversed for that reason. It is further claimed that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions proposed by the defendant and that the verdict is excessive.

The plaintiff offered no instructions, and the court gave none of its own motion and submitted the case upon some of the instructions requested by the defendants and refused others requested by the defendants. No instruction was given to the jury defining negligence or informing them that, for the plaintiff to recover, it must be shown that the injuries received by him were the proximate result of the negligence of the defendants nor was any instruction given upon the measure of damages. The defendant offered an instruction in three paragraphs, the first defining negligence, the second instructing the jury that, in order for the plaintiff to recover, the negligence must be the proximate cause of his injuries, and the third instruction upon the subject of res ipsa loquitur. Respondent concedes that the first and second paragraphs are correct statements of the law, and it must also be conceded that such instruction should have been given in the case, but it is contended that the instruction must be considered as a whole and that that portion of the instruction upon the subject of res ipsa loquitur was erroneous and therefore justified the refusal of the entire instruction. That portion of the instruction reads as follows:

"In this behalf, you are instructed that the mere occurrence of the accident in this case or of the damage complained of, if you find that the accident and damage did occur, is no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants or of any of their servants, agents, or employees, and that the burden is on the plaintiff to show, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the defendants were guilty of negligence which proximately caused the damage. The plaintiff has the burden of proving, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the defendants were guilty of negligence."

[1] The question of whether or not the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies is to be determined by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court under the federal Employers' Liability Law (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665), under which this action was brought. It is a matter of doubt whether this doctrine is applicable under the federal Employers' Liability Law. Roberts' Injuries Interstate Employees, § 22, p. 48; Richey's Federal Employers' Liability (2d Ed.) § 163, p. 330; Patton v. Texas & Pacific Railway Co., 179 U. S. 658, 21 Sup. Ct. 275, 45 L. Ed. 361; Sweeney v. Erving, 228 U. S. 233, 33 Sup. Ct. 416, 57 L. Ed. 815, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 905; Southern Ry. Co. v. Bennett, 233 U. S. 80, 34 Sup. Ct. 566, 58 L. Ed. 860; Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. O'Brien, 132 Fed. 593, 67 C. C. A. 421; Cincinnati, etc., Ry. Co. v. South Fork Coal Co., 139 Fed. 528, 71 C. C. A. 316; Southern Ry. Co. v. Derr, 240 Fed. 73, 153 C. C. A. 109.

ever, we will assume that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does apply to actions brought by the employees against interstate commerce carriers, under the federal Employers' Liability Law. Under this doctrine the unexplained falling of the bridge in question would establish negligence prima facie.

[3] In this case there was a complete explanation of the cause of the accident. The plaintiff himself in his pleading explains the cause of the accident, namely, the washing out of the support of the bridge. The evidence shows that this was the result of a sudden cloud-burst and that the injury to the bridge had occurred but a short time before the accident. The complaint is predicated upon the theory that the defendants were negligent in failing to inspect the tracks after the cloud-burst. The general rule is that, where the plaintiff in his complaint gives the explanation of the cause of the accident, that is to say, where the plaintiff, instead of relying upon a general allegation of negligence, sets out specifically the negligent acts or omissions complained of, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply. White v. Chicago G. W. R. Co., 246 Fed. 427, 158 C. C. A. 491; Midland Valley R. Co. v. Conner, 217 Fed. 956, 133 C. C. A. 628; Lyon v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 50 Mont. 532, 148 Pac. 386; West v. Hollady (Mo. App.) 196 S. W. 403; Texas Co. v. Charles Clarke & Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 182 S. W. 351. The res ipsa loquitur doctrine is based in part upon the theory that the defendant in charge of the instrumentality which causes the injury either knows the cause of the accident or has the best opportunity of ascertaining it, and that the plaintiff has no such knowledge and, therefore, is compelled to allege negligence in general terms and to rely upon the proof of the happening of the accident in order to establish negligence. See cases last cited.

In this case, if the plaintiff had alleged negligence in general terms and had merely proved the happening of the accident, a prima facie case would have been established under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. But, where the plaintiff went further and showed that the accident was caused by a cloud-burst, the question of whether or not the defendant was negligent in failing to inspect the track was to be determined by the jury without reference to the prima facie case resulting from the mere happening of the accident. Parsons v. Hecla Iron Works, 186 Mass. 221, 223, 224, 71 N. E. 572; Lyon v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., supra; Hull v. Berkshire Street Railway, 217 Mass. 361, 104 N. E. 747, 5 A. L. R. 1330; *Cleary v. S.) 279; Enloe v. Southern Ry. Co., 179 N. C. 83, 101 S. E. 557; Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 739, 748, 183 Pac. 358, 29 Cyc. 592; Ginocchio v. City and County of San Francisco (Cal. App.) 206 Pac. 763, rehearing denied. However, where the explanation leaves it doubtful as to whether or not the ultimate cause of the injury is the negligence of the party charged, it is proper to instruct the jury as to the res ipsa loquitur doctrine. Zerbe v. United Railroads of San Francisco (Cal. App.) 205 Pac. 887, rehearing denied.

[4] Under the pleadings and the evidence in support thereof the res ipsa loquitur doctrine did not apply. While there is nothing in the case indicating that the plaintiff relied upon the doctrine, either in the pleading or proof, it was nevertheless proper to instruct the jury that the doctrine did not apply, and therefore the entire instruction under consideration defining negligence should have been given.

We think it clear, under these circumstances, that the instructions propounded by the defendants correctly stated the law, namely, that the mere happening of the accident under the circumstances of the case did not establish negligence upon the part of the defendants. The case of O'Connor v. Mennie, 169 Cal. 217, 146 Pac. 674, relied upon by the respondent as establishing the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur in cases of injury received by an employee, is not applicable for the reason that, in that case, the court was dealing with an unexplained accident, while in the case at bar the cause of the accident is fully explained and undisputed. It did not result from defective or unsafe appliances, but from an injury to the railroad from storm water, and the question involved was as to whether or not the defendants were negligent in failing to ascertain the fact of the injury in time to prevent the accident. Under the Employers' Liability Act, the basis of the plaintiff's recovery is negligence. 35 U. S. Stats. at Large, 65, c. 149; Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Horton, 233 U. S. 492, 34 Sup. Ct. 635, 58 L. Ed. 1062, L. R. A. 1915C, 1, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475. The question of negligence under the circumstances was one for the determination of the jury.

In view of the fact that our conclusion necessitates a reversal of the case, it is unnecessary to pass upon the other questions raised by the respondent as, in the event of a new trial, the jury, no doubt, will be properly instructed.

Judgment reversed.

PEOPLE v. SANDERS. (Cr. 2411.)

1. Threats ⇨5—Indictment charging extortion by threat to accuse named person of selling intoxicating liquors in violation of the United States statutes held sufficient.

Indictment alleging that defendants threatened to accuse named person of "engaging in the sale of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the United States statutes," held sufficient, in the absence of a demurrer, to charge extortion under Pen. Code, §§ 518, 519, subd. 2, defining extortion, where on the specified date it was unlawful to sell liquors for beverage purposes under the War Prohibition Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115¹¹/₁₂f-3115¹¹/₁₂h), and to order, purchase, or cause intoxicating liquors to be transported in interstate commerce, to any state or territory in which the manufacture or sale of liquor was prohibited under the Reed Amendment to the Post Office Appropriation Act of March 3, 1917 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, § 8739a), though the indictment did not describe the crime of which defendants threatened to accuse named person as the sale of liquor for beverage purposes.

2. Threats ⇨5—Indictment held to charge threat to do an unlawful injury to the person of prosecuting witness; "extortion."

Indictment charging that defendants threatened to "incarcerate" named person in county jail unless he paid defendants a certain sum of money held sufficient, in the absence of a demurrer, to charge a threat to "do an unlawful injury to the person" of such person under Pen. Code, §§ 518, 519, subd. 1, defining extortion as the crime of obtaining money by means of such threats, notwithstanding failure to allege that the threat to incarcerate such person in the county jail was a threat to "do him an unlawful injury," it appearing from the indictment as a whole, charging that defendants "did unlawfully, corruptly, knowingly, and feloniously extort and obtain" a certain sum of money from the named person, that the threat was to unlawfully injure such person, in view of section 950, subd. 2.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Extort—Extortion.]

3. Threats ⇨7—Evidence held to sustain conviction for extortion by threat to accuse prosecuting witness of violation of prohibition laws.

In prosecution for extortion by threatening to accuse prosecuting witness with the crime of engaging in the sale of intoxicating liquors in violation of the United States statutes, under Pen. Code, §§ 518, 519, subd. 2, evidence held to sustain conviction.

4. Threats (1)—Threat to incarcerate defendant in county jail after unlawful arrest held a threat to do an "unlawful injury to the person"; "extortion."

In prosecution for extortion under Pen. Code, §§ 518, 519, subd. 1, defining extortion as the crime of obtaining property by means of fear induced by threat to do an unlawful injury to the person of the prosecuting witness, where defendants, one of whom was a police officer, pursuant to a conspiracy, pretended to arrest the prosecuting witness without a warrant, and without any pretense of any legal right to make such arrest, in violation of sections 182 and 836 et seq., and threatened to incarcerate him in the county jail unless he paid them a certain sum of money, such threat constituted one to do prosecuting witness an "unlawful injury to his person" within section 519, subd. 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

E. N. Sanders was convicted of extortion, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Louis G. Guernsey, W. I. Gilbert, Paul W. Schenck, and Richard Kittrelle, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. The appellant herein was tried and convicted upon the charge of extortion. In his appeal from the judgment entered upon such conviction he makes two main contentions as grounds for the reversal of such judgment. These are: First, insufficiency of the indictment; second, insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict and judgment of conviction.

The defendant, with three other persons, whose names were Claude Morton, William W. Swan, and Lee Varain, were accused by the grand jury of the county of Los Angeles, by indictment, of the crime of extortion. The charging part of said indictment, which the appellant claims to be insufficient to charge said crime, reads as follows:

"The said Claude Morton, E. N. Sanders, William W. Swan, and Lee Varain, on or about the 19th day of August, 1919, at and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, did willfully, unlawfully, corruptly, knowingly, and feloniously extort and obtain from Thomas M. Quinlin, with the consent of said Thomas M. Quinlin, $500 in lawful money of the United States, which said $500 was then and there the personal property of the said Thomas M. Quinlin.

"The said $500 was obtained from the said

Thomas M. Quinlin, and the consent of the said Thomas M. Quinlin was induced by a wrongful use of force and fear, in that the said Claude Morton, E. N. Sanders, William W. Swan, and Lee Varain did then and there unlawfully, and without any legal justification, arrest and detain the said Thomas M. Quinlin, and did then and there threaten to accuse him, the said Thomas M. Quinlin, of a crime, to wit, the crime of engaging in the sale of intoxicating liquors in violation of the United States statutes, and did then and there threaten to incarcerate the said Thomas M. Quinlin in the county jail of the county of Los Angeles unless he, the said Thomas M. Quinlin, did then and there pay to them, the said Claude Morton, E. N. Sanders, William W. Swan, and Lee Varain, the said $500.

"The said Thomas M. Quinlin did then and there believe that the said Claude Morton, E. N. Saunders, William W. Swan, and Lee Varain would enforce and carry out said threats, and then and there feared that the said defendants, Claude Morton, E. N. Sanders, William W. Swan, and Lee Varain, would and could do so, and solely by reason of said force, unlawful injury, threats, belief, and fear, did then and there consent as aforesaid, to the payment as aforesaid of said $500, to the said defendants, Claude Morton, E. N. Sanders, William W. Swan, and Lee Varain, and did then and there, on account of the said force, unlawful injury, threats, belief, and fear, pay and deliver to the said defendants, Claude Morton, E. N. Sanders, William W. Swan, and Lee Varain, said $500, as aforesaid."

It is the appellant's contention that the foregoing language in said indictment fails to sufficiently charge him with the crime of extortion as defined in sections 518 and 519 of the Penal Code. These sections of the Code read as follows:

518. "Extortion is the obtaining of property from another, with his consent, induced by a wrongful use of force or fear, or under color of official right."

519. "Fear, such as will constitute extortion, may be induced by a threat, either:

- "1. To do an unlawful injury to the person or property of the individual threatened, or to any relative of his, or member of his family; or,
- "2. To accuse him, or any relative of his, or member of his family, of any crime; or,
- "3. To expose, or impute to him or them any deformity or disgrace; or,
- "4. To expose any secret affecting him or them."

[1] The appellant contends that the foregoing language of said indictment does not sufficiently set forth any threat on the part of the appellant or his associates, either to (1) accuse the prosecuting witness of any crime; or (2) to do an unlawful injury to his person; or (3) to expose or impute to him any deformity or disgrace; or (4) to expose any secret affecting him. The third and fourth of the specifications may be dismissed without comment as beyond the scope of said indictment. As to the second of said specifications the appellant contends that there is not to be found within the language of said indictment a threat to accuse Quinlin of any crime. The particular clause in the indictment thus attacked alleges that the said defendants "did then and there threaten to accuse him, the said Thomas Quinlin, of a crime, to wit, the crime of engaging in the sale of intoxicating liquors in violation of the United States statutes." The date fixed in said indictment upon which said alleged threat was made was August 19, 1919, and the proofs correspond to said date. This was prior to the time the so-called Volstead Act (41 Stat. 305) went into effect. It is therefore obvious that the indictment did not include or contemplate the charge of a threat to accuse the prosecuting witness of the violation of a federal statute which had not yet come into being.

There were, however, in being at that time several other federal statutes which it would have been a crime for the defendant Quinlin to have violated. One of these was an act of Congress commonly known as the War Prohibition Act (Fed. Stats. 1919 Ann. Supp. 199 [U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115¹¹/₁₂f-3115¹¹/₁₂h]). By the terms of said act it was made unlawful to sell intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, but the sale of such liquors for export or for sacramental, medicinal or other than beverage uses was not made unlawful by said act. There was also in existence at that time the federal act commonly known as the Reed Amendment to the Post Office Appropriation Act of March 3, 1917 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, § 8739a), making it a crime for any person to "order, purchase, or cause intoxicating liquors to be transported in interstate commerce, except for scientific, sacramental, medicinal, and mechanical purposes, into any state or territory the laws of which state or territory prohibit the manufacture or sale therein of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes." There were also other federal statutes then in being, such as the statute forbidding the sale of liquor to Indians and the like, the violation of which would be a crime. As to these then existing federal statutes, the appellant argues that the alleged threat to accuse the prosecuting witness of selling liquors would not suffice to amount to an accusation of a crime because under these several statutes liquor could be sold or transported legally, as, for instance, for export or sacramental or medicinal purposes, under the War Prohibition Act; and, hence, that, in order to accuse a person of the crime of selling liquors, it was necessary to state in the accusation that the accused person was charged with selling liquors for beverage purposes.

Hoffman, 126 Cal. 366, 58 Pac. 856, in which the threat set forth in the information, and upon which the charge of extortion was founded, was to accuse the prosecuting witness of the crime of selling diseased and unwholesome meat. This court, in reversing the judgment of conviction based upon such information, stated that the act of selling diseased and unwholesome meat was not of itself a crime, but only became so when knowingly sold with intent that it should be eaten, and that it should have appeared in the information that the defendant had threatened to accuse the other with having knowingly sold diseased and unwholesome meat with intent that it should be eaten in order to constitute an accusation of a crime. We do not think this case has the direct or compelling application to the instant case which the appellant claims for it. The questions presented in that case arose upon a demurrer to the information, while in the instant case no objection by demurrer or otherwise was presented. In the case at bar the threatened accusation was not merely one of selling liquors. The threat was that the prosecuting witness was to be accused of "the crime of engaging in the sale of intoxicating liquors in violation of the United States statutes." Assuming that that intended accusation was based upon the provisions of the War Prohibition Act, it would amount to an accusation of a sale of such liquors to such persons and for such purposes as would constitute a violation of the terms of said act, and hence the person so threatened could not have understood said accusation to refer to the sale of liquors for export or sacramental or medicinal or other innocent uses, since such a sale would not have been in violation of said act.

A case which seems to be precisely in point is that of State v. Blackington, 111 Me. 229, 88 Atl. 726, in which an indictment wherein the threatened accusation was "the crime of the sale of intoxicating liquor in violation of the law." This the court held sufficient to satisfy the terms of a statute defining the crime of extortion substantially in the form of section 519 of our Penal Code. It is to be noted at this point that a clear distinction is to be drawn between indictments or informations which directly charge a defendant with a crime, and which must be exact and specific both in the definition of the crime and in the elimination of all exceptions which would render the acts charged not criminal, and those indictments or informations which charge extortion through threats to accuse another of a crime. In the latter class of cases no such technical accusation is required as in the former for several obvious reasons, some of which are that the indictment or information cannot go beyond the terms of the threatened accusations, and the accusations need only be such as to put the intended victim of the extortion in fear of being accused of some crime. The more vague and general the terms of the accusation, the better it would subserve the purpose of the accuser in magnifying the fears of his victim, and the better also it would serve to protect him in the event of the failure to accomplish his extortion, and of a prosecution for his attempted crime. State v. Blackington, supra; Commonwealth v. Murphy, 94 Mass. (12 Allen) 449; Commonwealth v. Goodwin, 122 Mass. 19; Commonwealth v. Bacon, 135 Mass. 521; State v. Patterson, 271 Mo. 99, 196 S. W. 3. We are therefore of the opinion that the indictment was sufficient in its statement of the accusation of a crime in fear of which the prosecuting witness consented to part with his money. People v. Fuski (Cal. App.) 192 Pac. 552.

[2] There is in this indictment a further allegation of an additional threat inducing the fear on the part of the prosecuting witness through which the alleged extortion was accomplished. It consists in the allegation that the defendants "did then and there threaten to incarcerate the said Thomas M. Quinlin in the county jail of the county of Los Angeles unless he, the said Thomas M. Quinlin, did then and there pay to them, the said Claude Morton, E. N. Sanders, William W. Swan, and Lee Varain," etc. The sufficiency of this averment is also called in question by the appellant, who contends that it is insufficient for the reason that the threat contained therein is not alleged to be a threat "to do an unlawful injury to the person" of the individual threatened, and hence is insufficient to satisfy the requirements of subdivision 1 of section 519 of the Penal Code, above quoted. It may not be denied that a threat to imprison another is a threat to do an injury to his person. It is such an injury that, if unlawful, would give grounds for both a civil action for damages and a criminal prosecution for false imprisonment. In order, however, to constitute such a threat as will lay the foundation for a charge of extortion under subdivision 1 of section 519 of the Penal Code, it must be a threat "to do an unlawful injury" to the person of another, and hence the indictment which charges such extortion must set forth that such threat on the part of the defendant was a threat to do an "unlawful" injury to the person of the alleged victim of the extortion. The appellant herein contends that the language of the indictment as to such threat above quoted is insufficient because of its failure to allege that the threat to incarcerate Quinlin in the county jail was a threat to do him "an unlawful injury." It is the absence of the word "unlawful" from said clause in the indictment which, according to the appellant, renders it fatally defective. The contention of the appellant is sound in so far as it goes to the extent of requiring that the defendant must show that the alleged threat was a threat to do an unlawful injury to the person of the complaining witness. It does not, however, follow that the statement or showing that the threatened injury was unlawful should appear in immediate context with the phrasing of the threat. If, from the face of the indictment, read as a whole, it sufficiently appears that the injury threatened to be done to the complaining witness was an unlawful injury, the indictment will be upheld, particularly as against an assault made against its sufficiency for the first time upon appeal. Looking to this indictment as a whole, the following phrases therein may be emphasized as bearing upon the question as to whether the threat to incarcerate Quinlin in the county jail was sufficiently alleged to be a threat to do an unlawful injury to his person. The indictment begins by charging that the defendants "did unlawfully, corruptly, knowingly, and feloniously extort and obtain from Thomas M. Quinlin," etc. This court, in construing the words "willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously," as thus set forth in an information, in connection with the charge of a particular crime, said:

"The words 'willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously' must be given some effect in construing such language, and they certainly would exclude an act which by law was innocent. The utmost that can be said in criticism of this information, * * * is, that it may not be direct and certain as to the particular circumstances of the offense. Such an objection is waived by a failure to demur." People v. Mead, 145 Cal. 500, 78 Pac. 1047.

But the indictment herein goes further. It alleges that the arrest and detention of Thomas M. Quinlin by the defendants was "unlawful and without any justification," and that said Quinlin, "solely by reason of said force, unlawful injury, threats, belief, and fear, did then and there consent," etc., and "did then and there on account of said force, unlawful injury, threats, force, belief, and fear, pay," etc. We think the indictment sufficient, in the absence of a demurrer thereto, to constitute the charge of a threat to do an unlawful injury to the person of Quinlin on the part of these defendants. Section 950 of the Penal Code provides that—

"The indictment or information must contain:

"2. A statement of the acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended."

This indictment charges that these defendants did "willfully, unlawfully, corruptly, knowingly, and feloniously extort and obtain from Thomas M. Quinlin" with his consent a sum of money which was obtained, and his consent thereto induced by "a wrongful use of force and fear," in that these defendants "did unlawfully and without legal justification arrest and detain said Thomas M. Quinlin, and did then and there threaten to accuse him of a crime, * * * and did then and there threaten to incarcerate the said Thomas M. Quinlin in the county jail" unless he would pay to them a certain sum of money, and that said Thomas M. Quinlin, believing and fearing that said defendants would enforce and carry out said threats, "and solely by reason of said force, unlawful injury, threats, belief, and fear," did then and there consent to the payment of and did pay said sum of money. We think it must be admitted that persons of common understanding, construing the foregoing words and phrases of the indictment according to their usual acceptance in common language, would understand that they were being charged with the extortion of the said money from said Quinlin through fear induced by the threat of an unlawful incarceration. The utmost that can be said in criticism of this indictment in this particular is that it may not be direct and certain as to the particular circumstances of the offense. Such an objection would be waived by failure to demur. Pen. Code, § 1012; People v. Mead, supra. If it is claimed by the defendant that this indictment embraces two different threats, viz. a threat to accuse Quinlin of a crime indictable under subdivision 2 of section 519 of the Penal Code, and a threat to do an unlawful injury to his person indictable under subdivision 1 of said section, and that it cannot be ascertained to which of these the above-quoted language of the indictment had application, the answer still remains that this constituted at most a mere uncertainty, which could only be taken advantage of by demurrer or motion to have these two charges, if they be such, separately stated.

[3] The next contention of the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to establish either of these two charges. As to the first of these, viz. that the defendant extorted said money from Quinlin by the threat to accuse him of a crime, we are of the opinion that the contention of the defendant cannot be sustained. The record herein discloses that the defendant, in arresting and detaining Quinlin, posed and pretended to be acting as a federal officer, and that as such he so arrested and detained Quinlin in the nighttime, and without warrant or other authority so to do. Quinlin testified that during the course of his said arrest and detention the defendant stated that "he had a charge against me of selling liquor; shipping liquor into Arizona, Washington, Idaho, and Nevada." He also testified that Sanders said that "he had enough on me to give me two or three years at McNeill's Island." He further testified that one or the other of the defendants threatened to accuse him of "shipping liquor into dry territory and selling whisky illegally." It is true that these statements of the prosecuting witness are not couched in the precise language of the indictment, but, taken together, and, as we have seen, uttered by the defendant while he was posing as a federal arresting officer, we think they fairly import a threat to accuse Quinlin of participating in the sale and transportation of liquors into dry territory in violation of the federal statutes then in being, making such acts a crime. What has been heretofore said with reference to the vagueness of such an accusation has application to its proofs. All that was necessary by way of definiteness in such proof was: First, that they should be sufficient to come fairly within the scope and terms of the indictment; and, second, that they should be sufficiently definite to advise a person of ordinary intelligence that he was being threatened with an accusation of having committed a violation of the federal laws then in being relative to the sale and shipment of intoxicating liquors. We think the foregoing testimony sufficient to measure up to both of these requirements under the rules laid down in People v. Mead, supra, and hence that the defendant's contention that the evidence was insufficient to justify his conviction upon this particular charge cannot be sustained.

[4] The appellant's next contention is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the charge in the indictment that the defendants threatened to do an unlawful injury to his person through an alleged threat "to incarcerate him in the county jail." An examination of the record in this regard also fails to support this contention. The evidence abundantly shows that, of the defendants charged jointly with extortion by this indictment E. N. Sanders, the appellant herein, was, at the time of said alleged extortion, a police officer of the city of Los Angeles, as was also one of his codefendants, W. W. Swan; that of the other two defendants Lee Varain was an acquaintance of Quinlin, who, by reason of such acquaintanceship and pretended friendship, was made use of by his codefendants to aid in the accomplishment of said crime; that the other codefendant, Claude Morton, was the attorney of said Varain. These four defendants conspired together to extort money from Quinlin, whom they knew had money, which to the extent of $1,000 he usually carried upon his person; and whom they also knew to be vulnerable as having been, or suspected of being, engaged in questionable enterprises in respect to the sale of liquor. In pursuance of this conspiracy Sanders on the evening of August 19, 1919, accosted Quinlin as he was coming out of the hotel, telling him that he was an officer; that he (Quinlin) was under arrest. He had no warrant, and Quinlin had committed no offense for which he could be legally arrested without a warrant. The defendant did not tell Quinlin at the time what he was under arrest for, but took him to a tea room kept by Varain, where they were joined by Swan. The defendant indicated to Varain that he (Varain) was also to be arrested, and that both were about to be taken to the county jail. Varain said he would like to visit his lawyer, and the trio were then driven to the office of the defendant Morton, whom Varain first interviewed alone, while Quinlin and Sanders remained in the anteroom, and during which time Sanders told Quinlin that "he had plenty on him, and that he had better get $1,000." Presently Morton emerged, and asked if he could see Varain and Quinlin alone, and was allowed to do so, and when they were together in Morton's inner office Varain began to play his part by pleading that he could not afford to be arrested again, as he had one charge against him already. He thus succeeded in getting Quinlin to agree that Morton should act as the lawyer for both of them, and go out and see if he could fix it with Sanders. He went outside, and soon returned and reported that the officer said he had "plenty on Quinlin, and had different charges, shipping liquor into different states, dry territories"; whereupon Varain began to suggest giving money to fix the officer up to $500, to which Quinlin finally agreed; whereupon Morton again went outside, and came back saying "Well if you will give him $1,000 apiece, you can both go to hell as far as he is concerned." Quinlin had only $320 on his person, but was allowed to send a messenger to his wife for $250 more. While these proceedings were going on Swan again appeared on the scene with a bottle of whisky, and they were all together in Morton's office when the final arrangements were made, by which Varain gave his check for $500 and Quinlin paid over to Morton $500 in money, agreeing to bring the other $500 to his office on the following day. Thereupon the parties separated.

Was the threat to incarcerate Quinlin in the county jail, uttered under the foregoing circumstances, a threat to do an unlawful injury to his person within the meaning of subdivision 1 of section 519 of the Penal Code? We think this question must be answered in the affirmative. The conspiracy entered into between this defendant and his codefendants to extort money from Quinlin by means of his pretended arrest, and by the threat of his incarceration, was itself unlawful, and a crime under several of the subdivisions of section 182 of the Penal Code. The arrest and detention of Quinlin by the defendant was an unlawful arrest, in that it was made without a warrant, and, so far as the record discloses, was an arrest based upon no pretense of any legal right in the arresting officer to make such arrest without a warrant under the provisions of section 836 et seq. of the Penal Code, or under any other provision of law. The utmost which the defendant and his coconspirators assert upon the trial as a justification for Quinlin's arrest and detention was that he was suspected of certain acts in relation to the selling or shipment of liquor in violation of the United States statutes then in force; but these acts, even if there was any foundation for their existence, were not pretended to have been committed or attempted in the presence of the arresting officer, or of any other of said defendants, and, in addition to this, were merely misdemeanors, for the commission of which the arrest without a warrant could not lawfully be made. Having thus unlawfully arrested and detained their intended victim, the defendants proceeded to threaten to accuse him of a crime. It is quite immaterial whether they or any of them in making said threat knew or suspected or had any reason to know or suspect that said Quinlin had committed the particular offense of which they threatened to accuse him, since it was unlawful to make or employ such a threat for the purpose of extortion. People v. Beggs, 178 Cal. 79, 172 Pac. 152. Having thus unlawfully arrested said Quinlin, and thus far unlawfully detained him in custody and having thus further unlawfully threatened to accuse him of a crime, the defendants proposed to carry their unlawful conspiracy and conduct one step further by the threat to imprison Quinlin in the county jail. Thus it will be seen that this threat of incarceration had its inception in unlawfulness, and was but the last of a series of unlawful acts having for their object the creation of the wrongful fear in the mind of their victim sufficient to induce his consent to part with his money. The appellant, however, contends that this threat to incarcerate Quinlin in the county jail, although made under the foregoing circumstances, was not a threat to do "an unlawful injury" to the latter's person, for the reason that said defendants might lawfully have brought about Quinlin's incarceration in the county jail through the process of a complaint charging him with some offense, and through the issuance and execution of a warrant for his arrest and confinement in jail.

In making this contention the appellant strongly relies upon the case of People v. Schmitz, 7 Cal. App. 330, 94 Pac. 407, 419, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 717, and particularly upon the opinion of this court in denying the petition for a rehearing in that case. It is to be noted, however, that the questions discussed in that case arose upon the face of the indictment, and related solely to its sufficiency as charging a threat to do an unlawful injury to the property of the persons complaining. This court in that case decided that the term "unlawful injury," as used in section 519, subd. 1, of the Penal Code, had reference to injuries of such a character that, if committed as threatened, would have constituted an actionable wrong, and further held that the indictment in that case did not sufficiently show that the acts threatened, as stated therein, were not such as could and would have been lawfully done, and that, in order to render an act which a person might lawfully do an unlawful injury to the person or property of another, such act must be threatened to be done by means which the law denounces as unlawful. As illustrating and distinguishing this principle, the court referred to the two cases of Boyson v. Thorne, 98 Cal. 578, 33 Pac. 492, 21 L. R. A. 233, and People v. Hughes, 137 N. Y. 37, 32 N. E. 1105. In commenting upon the latter of these two cases this court briefly recited the facts therein, showing that the defendant Hughes, the head of a labor organization, in order to extort a sum of money from certain wholesale merchants, threatened to induce certain retail merchants to continue in force a boycott of their institution and of the use of their goods by such retailers after the cause for creating the boycott had been removed. This he proposed to accomplish through an improper exercise of his influence with said retailers, and through false representations and deceit. This court adopted the views of the New York court in saying that, while it was true that the retailers had a lawful right to withhold their custom, and while it was also true that Hughes had a lawful right by proper means to induce them so to do, his threat was nevertheless a threat to do an unlawful injury to the property of those from whom he sought to extort the money, because the means to be employed by him were unlawful. In the text of the particular case thus referred to the New York Court of Appeals says:

"What Hughes threatened was found by the jury to be such an unlawful injury. They saw that he conveyed the idea strongly and clearly that, unless his demand for money was complied with, he could and would, by threatening the hostility of the order, compel the retail dealers to withdraw their custom, and could and would utilize the power he had, although the original occasion for its exercise was gone. Such a threat, within the doctrine of the Barondess Case, and within that also of the dissenting opinion in this court, amounts to a threat to do an unlawful injury to property. People v. Barondess, 133 N. Y. 649, 31 N. E. 240;¹ Id., 61 Hun, 581, 16 N. Y. Supp. 436. There was therefore a question for the jury, and the court could not properly have directed an acquittal."

This language is peculiarly appropriate to the case at bar. The threat which the defendant and his associates made to incarcerate Quinlin in the county jail must be taken and understood by us as it would be naturally taken and understood by the person to whom it was uttered under the immediate circumstances of the case. He had been unlawfully arrested, he was being unlawfully detained, and, being thus already unlawfully imprisoned, he was being threatened with being immediately taken to jail. Had the threat been literally carried into effect as uttered under the immediate circumstances and conditions of the case, it would have constituted merely a continuance of the false and unlawful detention to which the person threatened was being subjected at the very moment when the threat was being made. When these facts are considered in connection with the further facts that Quinlin's unlawful arrest and detention as thus far consummated were the result of an unlawful conspiracy between this defendant and his codefendants to accomplish the crime of extortion by the aforesaid unlawful means, and that the threat of his incarceration was but a further step in the consummation of the said crime, and was not intended by these conspirators to be rendered legal by compliance with the usual forms of law, or indeed to be carried into effect at all, except so far as the threat of its execution was to be used as a means for accomplishing the crime of extortion, it would seem to be perfectly clear and in line with the foregoing cases that such a threat, when viewed in the light of its attending circumstances, constituted a threat to do an unlawful injury to the person of him against whom it was directed. The jury to which these facts were presented evidently so regarded it, and we are of the opinion that their verdict to that effect was fully sustained by the evidence in the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, of Los Angeles, for the People.

PER CURIAM. [1] This case, as to the main questions presented for consideration, is identical with the case of People v. Sanders, 207 Pac. 380, this day decided, and the conclusions reached therein with respect to the sufficiency of the indictment, and also as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain it, are hereby given application to this appeal. In addition to the points therein considered, the appellant herein makes two further contentions. These are: First, that the trial court committed error in compelling the defendant herein to go to trial without the presence of one of his attorneys. Without attempting to recite in detail the facts relied upon by the appellant as supporting this contention and by respondent as opposing it, we are satisfied from an examination of the record that the defendant was at all the stages of his case represented by counsel, and particularly by counsel who, having also, and prior to his own trial, represented and been present at the trial of his codefendants, and were thus familiar with every phase of his case at all stages of the trial thereof, and hence that said defendant was fully and fairly represented by counsel during the trial of his case. This being so, we think the trial court did not abuse its discretion in not further postponing the trial of the cause until certain other counsel of the defendant's choosing could be present, and that the defendant has suffered no prejudicial error through the action of the trial court in that regard.

[2] The appellant makes the further contention that the trial court committed prejudicial error in prohibiting the jury from considering the question of the credibility of the prosecuting witness Quinlin. We find upon an examination of the record that it fails to sustain the appellant's contention in that regard. The episode in question occurred during the argument of the case before the jury. It appears that one of the jurors asked some question the substance or purport of which is not shown by the record herein. The court, not having caught the purport of the question, asked that it be repeated, which being done the court said:

"Mr. Quinlin is not on trial. The one that is on trial is this defendant. If a man had committed a murder, had been guilty of it, and he had been taken by an officer to an office and turned loose for the consideration of $500, and under threat he would put him in jail if he didn't pay it, the fact he was guilty of murder would not excuse the officer for taking the money from him. You want to get it out of your mind you are trying Mr. Quinlin. You are now trying to see whether these parties extorted the money from Mr. Quinlin, not if Mr. Quinlin was guilty of something. If Mr. Quinlin was guilty of anything, then it was the duty of the officer to file a charge against him, so you just get that out of your mind you are trying Mr. Quinlin, and try Mr. Swan."

In the absence of anything going to show what called for this expression on the part of the court, we are entirely at a loss to determine whether or not the language of the court was justified or whether or not the appellant was prejudicially affected thereby. The utterance of the court does not of itself amount to an instruction to the jury that they were not to consider the question of the credibility of the prosecuting witness, Quinlin. The court gave the usual instructions with relation to the functions of the jury as exclusive charges of the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses. One of said instructions having apparently reference and application to the particular matter above set forth was the following:

"You are the sole and exclusive judges of the weight and the credibility of witnesses, and it is your function to determine all questions of fact arising from the evidence in the case. With the facts the court has nothing to do. I have not expressed, nor intend to express, nor have I intimated or intend to intimate, any opinion as to what witnesses are or are not worthy of credence, what facts are or are not established, or what inferences are to be drawn from the evidence adduced. If any expression of mine has seemed to indicate an opinion relating to any of these matters, such expression must be entirely disregarded by you."

We are satisfied that, if any misapprehension had been created in the minds of the jurors as to their right and duty to consider the credibility of the prosecuting witness Quinlin by reason of the foregoing remarks of the trial court during the argument, these were entirely removed by the foregoing instruction, and that the appellant therefore suffered no prejudicial injury therefrom.

No other errors appearing in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

CASE v. EGAN. (Civ. 3852.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 26, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 22, 1922.)

Mortgages $\Rightarrow$ 282(1)—Purchaser held not personally liable on assumption of mortgage debt for which vendor was not personally liable; "contract for benefit of third person."

Where defendant purchased property from a vendor who was not personally liable for a debt secured by a deed of trust on the property, and the deed to the purchaser stated the land was "subject to a deed of trust * * * which the party of the second part (purchaser) hereby assumes and agrees to pay," the mortgage indebtedness assumed by the purchaser was not a "contract for the benefit of a third person," within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 1559, providing that a contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person may be enforced by him, so as to entitle the assignee of the note secured by the mortgage to hold the purchaser personally liable thereon, nor can the purchaser be held liable under section 2854, which requires as a basis of liability that the mortgagee must be a creditor of the grantor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Action by Fred H. Case against N. Egan. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. M. Naus and Chester H. Case, both of Oakland, for appellant.

Fred B. Mellman, of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is from a judgment against the plaintiff, following an order sustaining a general demurrer to the amended complaint without leave to amend after the plaintiff had declined to amend.

The complaint alleges, in substance: On August 4, 1913, Claude Scheelk made and delivered to George W. Austin his promissory note for $1,450 secured by deed of trust to certain real property; that the said note was assigned by said Austin to Case, the plaintiff here; that there has been a default in the payment thereof when due; that the real property covered by said deed of trust was transferred by Scheelk to Covington, by Covington to Faulkner, and by Faulkner to Egan, the defendant here. With reference to the successive transfers of this property, the complaint alleges:

"Plaintiff is informed and believes, and therefore alleges, that neither said Covington nor said Faulkner personally assumed the payment of said promissory note, or the indebtedness secured by said deed of trust, but that each of said transfers was made subject to said deed of trust without assumption of personal liability by the transferee."

But it is alleged that in the transfer from Faulkner to defendant Egan the grant contained the following:

"Subject to a deed of trust in the sum of fourteen hundred and fifty (1,450) dollars * * * which the party of the second part hereby assumes and agrees to pay."

It is alleged that on July 7, 1919, the trustees under the deed of trust sold the property; that after applying the proceeds of the sale to the debt, there was a deficiency of $1,966.40, for which judgment is asked against the defendant upon the ground that she agreed in writing that she would personally assume and pay the obligation of said promissory note.

As admitted by both parties, the sole question presented upon this appeal is:

"Is defendant, Egan, relieved from direct liability to the plaintiff upon her assumption of and agreement to pay the amount secured by the note and deed of trust by the circumstance that her grantor, Faulkner, was not himself personally liable therefor?"

Appellant's position is that the liability of the transferee of real property to the mortgagee or beneficiary under a deed of trust springs, in this state, from two independent Code rules, i. e., sections 2854 and 1559, Civil Code. Counsel, however, admit that under section 2854 of the Civil Code it is essential that the grantor of the property be himself personally liable for the debt secured thereby before his grantee can be held liable by the mortgagee. This is because under that section the mortgagee must be "a creditor" of the grantor, and he cannot be a creditor of the grantor unless the grantor is personally liable to him for the debt. It is therefore admitted that if the rights of appellant depended solely upon that section of the Code, the demurrer was properly sustained.

However, the appellant, in a most comprehensive and scholarly brief, seeks to have this court declare that the plaintiff has stated a cause of action under the provisions of section 1559, Civil Code; that under said section personal liability of the grantor is a wholly immaterial circumstance in determining the liability of the grantee. Whatever may be our view as to the logic of appellant's arguments upon this question and his acuteness in differentiating the cases in this state which are opposed to his contention, we feel bound by the expressions of the rule in the following cases: Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 354, 30 Pac. 609; Alvord v. Spring Valley Gold Co., 106 Cal. 547, 40 Pac. 27; Ward v. De Oca, 120 Cal. 102, 52 Pac. 130; Williams v. Naftzger, 103 Cal. 438, 37 Pac. 411; Sherwood v. Lowell, 34 Cal. App. 365, 377, and 378, 167 Pac. 554; Page v. Chase Co., 145 Cal.

While some of these cases do not expressly decide the precise question presented here, we are of the opinion that it is the general doctrine of them all that where the grantor of real property is not personally liable for a mortgage debt, a stipulation in a deed from him to his grantee that said grantee shall pay, personally, the mortgage indebtedness, will not be regarded in law or equity as a contract intended for the benefit of a third person within the meaning of section 1559, Civil Code, so as to entitle such third person to enforce the same. The reasoning inducing this conclusion is set forth in the case of Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280, 283, and 284, 25 Am. Rep. 195, which was one of the cases relied upon by our Supreme Court in the case of Biddel v. Brizzolara, supra. The other cases herein cited, and which are binding upon us, either expressly announce this doctrine or they are in entire harmony therewith.

The demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 11, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 8, 1922.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨33—That some representations found to have been made are not actionable does not affect judgment rescinding contract on evidence showing actionable misrepresentation.

In purchasers' action to rescind contract, the fact that some of the misrepresentations alleged and found to have been made are not actionable does not affect the judgment rescinding the contract, where it can be sustained upon evidence supporting any one actionable material misrepresentation.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨37(6)—Misrepresentations from which no damage could result held not actionable.

As respects validity of contract for purchase of land and shares of stock in irrigation company, misrepresentations as to the cost of the water system, the number of cattle and sheep being cared for in the valley where the land was situated, and as to the dam having a cement core, held not material.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨36(2)—Misrepresentations as to productiveness of land and adequacy of water supply held ground for rescission.

As respects validity of contract for purchase of land and stock in irrigation company, misrepresentations as to the productive quality of the soil and as to the adequacy of the water supply, if purchasers were thereby induced to contract, held ground for rescission.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇨37(4)—When purchaser could rely on vendor's representations as to productiveness of land and water supply.

A purchaser had the right to rely on vendor's representations as to productiveness of land and adequacy of water supply unless he possessed knowledge sufficient to induce a belief that the representations did not accord with the facts, or unless the conditions were such as to put him upon notice that the truth had not been stated.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⇨44—Evidence held to sustain findings that vendor misrepresented productiveness of land and adequacy of water supply.

In purchasers' action to rescind contract, evidence held to sustain findings that vendor made misrepresentations as to the productive quality of the soil, and as to the adequacy of the water supply.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Trial court's conclusion of fact on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⇨42—Fraud inducing execution of contract not waived by modification of contract before discovery of fraud.

Fraud by which purchasers were induced to enter into contract was not waived by changing of contract at a time when purchasers were not aware of the fraud.

8. Vendor and purchaser ⇨119—Purchasers held not barred by laches from right to rescind contract for misrepresentations.

Where purchasers obtained information respecting inadequacy of water supply, and attempted to cancel the contract in August, 1915, and carried on negotiations for cancellation for several months thereafter, gave notice of rescission March, 1916, and commenced action therefor during May, 1916, they were not barred by laches from the right to rescind on the ground of misrepresentations.

9. Vendor and purchaser ⇨37(5)—Good faith in making material misrepresentations no defense.

In action for rescission of contract because of misrepresentations, the good faith of the party who made the representations is no defense under Civ. Code, § 1572.

10. Contracts ⇨94(3)—Rule of criminal law requiring proof of specific intent to defraud not applicable to civil actions.

The rule of the criminal law requiring proof of a specific intent to defraud in false pretense cases does not apply to civil actions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action by Charles C. Scott and wife against the Delta Land & Water Company, a corporation, and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. Story, Jr., of Ouray, Colo., and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

L. M. Fall, Dudley W. Robinson, and Hickox & Crenshaw, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiffs, alleging misrepresentations fraudulently made to induce them to enter into a contract for the purchase of certain land and water rights in the state of Utah, brought this action to enforce rescission. The prayer of their complaint was that the contract of sale be canceled; that a certain mortgage creating a lien against real property in the state of California, which was executed by them to secure payment of a portion of the purchase price of the Utah land and water stock, be ordered surrendered, and promissory notes made incidental therewith be canceled, and for damages and costs. The decree as entered secured to the plaintiffs all of the relief demanded, except that no judgment was allowed for damages. The defendants have appealed from the judgment, and assign as a principal ground thereof that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court. Certain alleged errors of law occurring in the course of the trial make up the remaining points upon which it is claimed that a reversal should be ordered.

The defendant Delta Land & Water Company was the owner of the real property contracted to be purchased by the plaintiffs; the Western Securities Company was an allied corporation organized for the purpose of acting as sales agent of the property. The legal connection between the two corporations was so close as to leave no question but that the corporation first named assumed full responsibility for every act done and representation made by any of the officers or agents of the latter while promoting sales of the Delta properties; hence, in references made hereinafter to such officers or agents, they will for convenience be generally referred to as those of the defendants, and the principal corporation will be designated as the Delta Company. Plaintiffs in their complaint alleged that on March 5, 1915, they entered into a contract to purchase from the Delta Company 160 acres of land in Beaver county, Utah, and 160 shares of capital stock of the Beaver County Irrigation Company (all of the stock of the latter corporation being owned by the Delta Company); that they executed notes to cover the purchase price of the land, which was agreed to be $3,800, and the price of the water stock, which was agreed to be $11,200, and in addition thereto gave a mortgage on five acres of land which they owned near the town of Whittier, in California, to secure payment of the $3,800. The payment of the price of the water stock was secured by assignment of the shares to the Delta Company, and by mortgages made covering the land purchased. They alleged that on May 20, 1915, a new agreement was made whereby plaintiffs relinquished one-half of the land and water stock agreed to be purchased, and contracted then to pay for 80 acres retained by them at the price of $30 per acre, and 80 shares of water stock at $70 per share. The terms of the notes given on account of the modified contract were changed from those which accompanied the original contract, but the mortgage liens remained, and 80 of the shares of water stock continued to be held by the Delta Company as collateral security. Plaintiffs alleged that their contract to purchase the land and water stock was procured through false and fraudulent representations made to them by defendants; that the defendants represented: (1) that the land "was of the best quality, fertile in every respect, free from alkali and noxious weeds, and suitable for growing thereon all kinds of crops of hay, grain and vegetables"; (2) that the Delta Company owned all of the water flowing in Beaver river, and that, according to the record kept by the United States Government for 14 years, that river furnished sufficient average flow to irrigate 44,000 acres of land; that all of the said water had been made appurtenant to the 15,000-acre tract of land owned by the Delta Company, and that it was sufficient and would furnish all necessary water for irrigating said tract, and amount to an average each year of not less than 3 "acre-feet"; that said land was worth $30 per acre, and the water stock was worth $70 per share. There were other allegations as to fraudulent representations, such as that defendants stated that the Delta Company had spent $1,000,000 in providing an irrigation system; that many thousand cattle and sheep (the particular number being stated in the complaint) were being cared for and fed in the valley where the land was situated; that the dam provided to hold the water in storage had a cement core extending to bedrock. It was alleged that the land was not fertile; that it was impregnated with black alkali; that it was not of the best quality, or in any respect suitable to grow hay, grain, and vegetables, and that the water supply was not as represented, or sufficient with which to irrigate the 15,000-acre tract, but sufficient only to irrigate not to exceed 6,000 acres; that the United States government had not kept a record of the flow of water for 14 years, but had only kept a record for 6 years, and that, according to such record, it was not shown that there was sufficient water in Beaver river to furnish an average of 3 "acre feet" annually to the 15,000-acre tract; that in the year 1915, on or about July 1st, the water was exhausted, and that no further water was available during that season for the irrigation of crops, and that the other representations referred to were not founded in fact. The trial judge found that misrepresentations had been made in the particulars alleged, and found that the land was not worth more than $10 per acre, and the water stock not more than $15 per share.

[1-4] The judgment may be sustained upon evidence supporting any one material misrepresentation. Davis v. Butler, 154 Cal. 623, 98 Pac. 1047; Thomas v. Hacker, 179 Cal. 731, 178 Pac. 855. It matters not that there may have been included in the allegations and findings representations which are not actionable; for instance, the representations as to the cost of the water system, and as to the number of cattle and sheep which were represented as being cared for in the valley where the land was situated, and whether the dam had a cement core, may be left out of consideration. The representations as to the productive quality of the soil and as to the adequacy of the water supply were material factors which, if they furnished an inducement to the vendees to enter into the contract made by them, would afford ground upon which to base a rescission when their falsity was established. Bickel v. Munger, 20 Cal. App. 633, 129 Pac. 958; Tracy v. Smith, 175 Cal. 161, 164, 165 Pac. 535. On the other hand, if the land was as represented, and the water supply adequate, no damage could result because of any of the other alleged misrepresentations. Misinformation as to the material matters referred to would constitute representations as to existing facts and conditions, and would not fall within the category of mere opinion or speculation. Barron Est. Co. v. Woodruff Co., 163 Cal. 573, 126 Pac. 351, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 125. And the vendee had the right to rest upon them unless he possessed knowledge sufficient to induce a belief that the representations did not accord with the facts, or unless the conditions were such as to put him upon notice that the truth had not been stated. Wiley v. Clements, 146 Cal. 91, 79 Pac. 850; Neher v. Hansen, 12 Cal. App. 370, 107 Pac. 565.

The evidence showed that the Delta Company issued a circular which was printed and used generally by the sales agents, which contained these statements:

"15,000 acres of virgin soil under a one million dollar irrigation system; an inexhaustible supply of water that makes the Milford farmer absolutely independent of rainfall."

Plaintiff C. C. Scott (the husband) testified that he was a farmer residing near Whittier, California; that he had been solicited by an agent of the defendants to purchase land in the Utah tract, and that he was given one of the circulars to which reference has been made; that he went to Utah in February of 1915 with an agent of defendant, and was shown an experimental farm upon which was a good stand of alfalfa (this experimental farm had been highly fertilized but the agents did not give that information to Scott); that he was shown the dam in which was collected the water supply, and that the agent told him that every share of water entitled the holder to 3 acre-feet; that the agent explained what the term "3 acre-feet" meant; that at Minersville adjoining the 15,000-acre tract the agent showed trees and berries, and said that there could be grown just such products on the tract referred to; also that the agent showed alfalfa which he said had been planted 35 years, and said that the same kind of crop could be produced on the land which said plaintiff was solicited to buy; that the agent took a shovel and showed different soils; said that it was all good soil; that he had never seen better; and made the representations regarding the government having measured the water for 14 years, and of the conclusions drawn therefrom as to the water supply, as the same were alleged by plaintiffs in their complaint. The land had never been cultivated or changed from its raw state.

It appears by Scott's testimony that he did not enter into a contract immediately after making this first trip to the Utah land, and other agents of the defendants soon called upon him, one of whom (the president of the Delta Company) stated that "they had sufficient water for 44,000 acres, but to make this thing safe for the people we are going to put it on only 15,000." Following this, plaintiffs made the contract of March 5, 1915. Shortly thereafter Scott took his son and went upon the land contracted to be purchased, and spent some time in leveling and clearing the ground. He raised no crops, but expressed himself in his testimony as having become dissatisfied with conditions, although he did not, during his stay there, obtain information as to whether the water supply would be adequate, or what the productivity of the soil was. Upon his return to his home in Los Angeles county he requested and secured the new agreement which has been mentioned, under which he contracted to purchase but one-half of the land covered by the agreement of March 5th. Some time in July of 1915 he received notice that the water supply for irrigation purposes had for the time being become exhausted, and, after negotiations with the Delta Company looking to an abrogation of his contract, all of which failed of result, he served on behalf of himself and wife a notice of rescission, which notice was given on March 20, 1916.

As to the representations concerning the character of the soil, it must be conceded that such representations, testified by Scott as having been made, warranted the latter in believing and assuming that the soil was of a character as would produce crops of general kinds suitable to that locality and in average quantities. It was shown, even by the testimony of witnesses for the defendant, that the land was lacking in humus constituent, and would not produce general crops until that element had been supplied, either by fertilizing with material brought upon it, or by growing alfalfa thereon for several years; furthermore that for the first year or two even an average crop of alfalfa could not be produced. The representation was that the then condition of the land was such as would produce crops of the kind referred to, and in average quantities, and such representation would not be satisfied by showing that, after a process of fertilization extending over several years, the land might be made productive. It was shown that the only way that the quality of the soil could be determined would be by chemical analysis, or by actual experimentation; hence there could be no imputation of negligence because Scott, a farmer, having been afforded an opportunity to see and examine the soil, did not at once discover its true character.

[5, 6] The evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding on that issue. It was sufficient also to support the conclusion of the trial judge that 1.7 acre-feet, which he found to be the maximum available supply of water, was insufficient to properly irrigate the 15,000-acre tract. There was some conflict in the evidence as to that issue, but there was testimony of witnesses who stated that the requirement (or the water duty, as it was termed) was 3 acre-feet annually in order to meet needs in the production of average crops. This testimony furnished evidence of a substantial kind and, as this court has no duty to resolve the conflict, the conclusion of the trial judge upon that matter of fact must be taken as final. Upon the two main issues specified there was sufficient evidence.

[7] The fraud was not waived by the changing of the contract on May 20, 1915. At the latter date plaintiffs had not been made aware of the deficiencies in soil and water supply. The consent of the Delta Company to the release of the obligations of the plaintiffs as to one-half the quantity of land and water shares purchased was not in any way, so far as is shown, based upon a condition that the Delta Company should no longer be liable for any fraudulent representations made as an inducement to the plaintiffs to enter into the original contract. The contract of May 20th amounted to a modification of the original agreement; it carried with it the original mortgage security as then existing against the California property of the plaintiffs.

[8] Plaintiffs were not guilty of laches barring them from the equitable relief sought. In August of 1915 they obtained information respecting the inadequacy of the water supply. They then proceeded in an attempt to secure a cancellation of their contract, and negotiations proceeded, it may be gathered from the record, for several months thereafter. About March 20, 1916, they gave notice of rescission, and on May 3d of the same year commenced this action. They acted with reasonable diligence in pursuing the remedy which the law afforded them. No conditions are shown as where the opposite party has so changed its situation, relying upon the contract, as to make it inequitable that it should now be compelled to release plaintiffs from the obligations assumed by them. The offer of the plaintiffs to release to the Delta Company all claim to the land or water stock was sufficiently expressed in the notice of rescission.

[9, 10] The court in its findings recited that the representations made by defendants and their agents were "false, untrue, misleading, and fraudulent, and were positively asserted by said defendants and their said agents, and each of them, to be true, in a manner not warranted by the information which they or either of them possessed at the time of the making thereof." Appellants argue that the burden rested with the respondents to show at the trial that the representations when made by defendants were not "actually believed by the defendants on reasonable grounds to be true." This point carries with it the suggestion that the finding of the court which has just been referred to was not sufficient to support the judgment. Aside from the provisions of section 1572 of the Civil Code, it is not established by the weight of authority in the United States that a party to a contract may innocently, and with belief in the truth of his statements, misrepresent to the opposite party conditions material to the consideration to be rendered by the former and escape liability. In a civil action the good faith of the party who procures the assent of another to the making of a contract by material misrepresentations is of no moment.

"Many courts lay down the rule that the misrepresentation of a material fact may be ground for rescinding or avoiding a contract though there is no actual fraud, and though it is innocently made. Such a representation is considered to be constructively fraudulent because of its effect of imposing upon and deceiving the person to whom it is made." 12 R. C. L. p. 343, par. 98.

The rule of the criminal law requiring proof of a specific intent to defraud in false pretense cases does not apply to civil actions.

Errors alleged to have been committed by the trial judge in his rulings on the admission of evidence have been examined, and as to none of them is it made to appear that the appellants have been so prejudiced as to entitle them to a new trial. There was competent evidence to the main issues which have been hereinbefore discussed. Such evidence supports the findings and judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

DELTA LAND & WATER CO. v. PERRY
et al. (Civ. 3590.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 11, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 8, 1922.)

1. Pleading $\S$ 411—Parties who without objection assumed issue to be presented by cross-complaint cannot complain that it was not properly presented.

A cross-complaint must in itself state facts sufficient to entitle the pleader to affirmative relief, and is not aided by averments in other pleadings; but, where the parties without objection to the pleading assumed the issue to be properly presented, and made no objection to evidence, they cannot complain on appeal.

2. Vendor and purchaser $\S$ 42—Fraud inducing execution of contract was not waived by modification of contract before discovery of fraud.

Fraud inducing the execution of a contract was not waived by modification of the contract prior to discovery of fraud.

3. Waters and water courses $\S$ 234—Rights of purchasers of water stock under notice of rescission held not affected by payment of assessments to prevent sale for nonpayment.

Payments of assessments on water stock to prevent a sale thereof for nonpayment by purchasers subsequent to service of notice of rescission of the contract for purchase thereof did not affect the rights of the purchasers under their notice of rescission.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 1170(7)—Erroneous admission of evidence held harmless in view of other evidence overwhelmingly supporting the finding.

In purchasers' action to rescind contract because of misrepresentations as to the productiveness of the land and adequacy of the water supply, admission of document signed by other purchasers as to inadequacy of water supply, if error, held harmless under Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½, in view of overwhelming evidence in support of the conclusion that the water supply was inadequate.

5. Vendor and purchaser $\S$ 113—Purchasers held not barred by laches from obtaining rescission of contract for fraud.

Purchasers who gave notice of rescission promptly upon discovery of fraud, and who tendered back and offered to relinquish and return to vendor everything of value which they had received, were not barred by laches from obtaining relief in vendor's action brought less than 9 months after service of notice of rescission, since purchasers were not required to immediately sue to enforce rescission, but could await affirmative action on part of vendor, and set up facts upon which they based their right to relief in vendor's action.

Action by the Delta Land & Water Company against Harry F. Perry and others, in which the defendant filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William Story, Jr., of Ouray, Colo., and Lissner & Lewinsohn and Lewinson & Barnhill, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

L. M. Fall, Dudley W. Robinson, and Hickcox & Crenshaw, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. In this action plaintiff sought the foreclosure of a mortgage given by defendants to secure the payment of their promissory note in the sum of $2,400. By answer defendants admitted the execution and delivery of the note and mortgage, but, as a defense to the cause of action, alleged the same was procured by false and fraudulent representations made by plaintiff and its agents, whereby defendants in reliance thereon were induced to buy from plaintiff certain arid land and right to water for irrigating the same, which right was evidenced by shares of stock in the Beaver County Irrigation Company, a subsidiary of plaintiff, and for the purchase price of which the note and mortgage were given to plaintiff. By a cross-complaint filed they alleged in substance the facts set forth in the answer as a defense to the action, and prayed that the note and mortgage constituting plaintiff's cause of action be annulled and canceled. The court upon trial of the issues found in accordance with the allegations of defendants' answer and cross-complaint, and entered judgment thereon in favor of defendants as prayed for, from which plaintiff has appealed.

The 40 acres of land sold to defendants, and for the purchase of which the note and mortgage securing the same were executed, was a part of a tract of 15,000 acres of arid land situated in Beaver county, Utah, for the irrigation and development of which plaintiff, in the name of the Beaver County Irrigation Company, caused to be constructed a reservoir for impounding the waters of Beaver river, together with a system of conduits for distributing the water upon the same.

A complete history of the scheme adopted by plaintiff for the development of this large tract of land, and the means and representations employed by it in procuring purchasers of subdivisions thereof, together with one share of stock in the irrigation company for each acre of land as a means of obtaining water for sufficiently irrigating the land, without which crops could not be successfully produced, is stated in an opinion by this court, filed on April 11, 1922, in the case of Scott et al. v. Delta Land & Water Co. (Civ. No. 3591), 207 Pac. 389. As shown by the evidence in the instant case, the representations made and means employed by plaintiff to induce defendants to purchase the land and water stock and execute the note and mortgage are, as conceded by appellant, substantially the same as made and employed in the Scott Case. No purpose could be served by a repetition of what is there said in discussing that feature of the case. Suffice it to say that, notwithstanding testimony on behalf of plaintiff in conflict therewith, there is here, as in the Scott Case, ample evidence to support the finding that defendants, in buying the land and water stock, and executing the note and mortgage in part payment therefor, relied upon the representations so made by plaintiff and its recognized agents; that such representations were false and untrue, and "were known to the cross-defendant at the time of making them and each of them to be wholly false, untrue and fraudulent." The finding relates to the representations as to the fertility of the soil, its content of humus, freedom from alkali, and the adequacy of a supply of water for irrigation, the amount of which, as represented to defendants, was $2\frac{1}{2}$ acre feet for each acre of the entire tract. As in the case referred to, wherein the evidence touching such issues is substantially the same as in this, we conclude there is no merit in appellant's contention that the findings are without sufficient support in the evidence.

[1] The fraudulent representations whereby defendants were induced to execute the note and mortgage were set up by the answer as a defense to the foreclosure of the mortgage. By a cross-complaint filed therewith defendants alleged the same facts pleaded by way of defense, and upon which they based a claim for affirmative relief, namely, the cancellation of the note and mortgage. In the cross-complaint, however, they failed to allege a rescission or offer to rescind, by reason of which omission appellant insists that the cross-complaint did not state facts upon which defendants were entitled to affirmative relief, and hence the judgment canceling the note and mortgage should be reversed. Fairchild v. Western Securities Corporation, 176 Cal. 742, 169 Pac. 363. While it is true that a cross-complaint must in itself state facts sufficient to entitle the pleader to affirmative relief, and is not aided by averments in other pleadings, nevertheless, where the parties without objection to the pleading assume the issue to be properly presented, and make no objection to evidence touching the same, they are in no position on appeal to complain of such defect. It is alleged that defendants first discovered the fraud about July 1, 1915. While no reference is made thereto in the cross-complaint, there was attached to it, marked "Exhibit A," a notice of rescission upon the ground of false and fraudulent representations made by said company, its officers and agents, and wherein defendants tendered to the company deeds to said property so conveyed to them by plaintiff, and offered to execute such other or further instruments as might be requested in order to release any interest they might have in the property, and demanded a cancellation and return of the note and mortgage mentioned. At the trial, and without objection, the notice of rescission, copy of which was attached to the cross-complaint, was offered and received in evidence, and plaintiff admitted the same was served on its agent on July 15, 1915. It thus appears that the issue, though not presented by the pleading, was nevertheless fully tried, and hence appellant could not have been prejudiced by reason of the error, and is now for the first time in no position to complain on account of its omission from the pleading.

[2] It is also claimed in this case, as in the Scott Case, that the right to rescind on account of fraud was waived by the making of a new contract. This contention is based upon the fact that on January 20, 1915, Perry purchased 80 acres of land, together with 80 shares of water stock, as to which, but prior to July 1, 1915, when he learned of the fraud, he agreed with plaintiff for a modification of his contract by which he surrendered 40 acres of the land, together with the stock attached thereto, retaining the balance with 40 shares of water stock, upon which the note and mortgage were to be applied. Under these circumstances, and since the modification was had prior to the discovery of the fraud, defendant's act in making the new contract did not relieve the transaction of the vice of the original act founded in fraud. Since defendants had no knowledge of the fraud prior to the subsequent transaction, their acts did not constitute a waiver thereof. Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. (4th Ed.) p. 2090; Hodgkins v. Dunham, 10 Cal. App. 690, 103 Pac. 351.

[3] It also appears that subsequent to serving the notice of rescission defendants paid two assessments upon the water stock, and it is insisted by appellant that this constituted a waiver of the fraud. The purpose of paying the assessments was to prevent a sale of the stock for nonpayment, and thus preserve the property to its rightful owner. In the case at bar it operated to preserve the property to appellant, which, as the wrongdoer, had refused to accept a return of the property tendered. The making of the payments did not affect the rights of defendants under their notice of rescission. Clark v. Wells, 127 Minn. 353, 149 N. W. 547, L. R. A. 1916F, 476; Shermaster v. California Building, etc., Co., 40 Cal. App. 661, 181 Pac. 409.

[4] It is next claimed that plaintiff was prejudiced by the ruling of the court in admitting, over its objection that the same was irrelevant and immaterial, a document signed by a number of farmers who had purchased lands in the project, wherein attention of the plaintiff was called to the fact that the two preceding years had demonstrated that there was not more than half enough water available to irrigate the lands in the project, and suggested a means of increasing the supply. Conceding, as we do, the ruling to have been erroneous, nevertheless, in view of the overwhelming evidence in support of the conclusion that the supply of water was inadequate to irrigate the lands, it cannot be deemed to have operated prejudicially to plaintiff or influenced the court in arriving at its decision. Section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution.

[5] Lastly, it is claimed that defendants are barred from relief by laches. There is no merit in this contention. They gave notice of rescission promptly upon discovering the fraud, tendered back and offered to relinquish and return to plaintiff everything of value which they had received from it. Plaintiff had possession of the water stock, holding it as collateral security for the purchase price thereof, and hence it was not necessary to tender to plaintiff that which it already had. Defendants were not called upon to institute an immediate suit to enforce the rescission, but might, as they did, await some affirmative action on the part of plaintiff in this case had and taken by filing its complaint less than nine months after the service of notice of rescission (Suhr v. Lauterbach, 164 Cal. 591, 130 Pac. 2), and then in that action set up the facts upon which they based their right to relief.

That the land was arid, and practically valueless for the growing of crops, without a supply of water for irrigation, admits of no question. It likewise appears, that for the purpose of inducing defendants to purchase the land and execute the note and mortgage, plaintiff's agents made representations which led the purchasers to believe that plaintiff had then made ample provision for an adequate supply of water for use upon the entire tract of 15,000 acres, to which the water developed and impounded by the Beaver County Irrigation Company was made appurtenant, and that the 40 shares of stock thereof so purchased by defendants represented a right equal to 40/15,000 of the water of said irrigation company, by virtue of which defendants were and would be entitled to at least 2½ acre feet of water to each acre so purchased, and which amount was necessary to the proper irrigation of the same. These representations, at the time of making them, were by plaintiff's agents known to be untrue. Hence, conceding, as claimed by appellant, that other representations should be disregarded as mere expressions of opinion, nevertheless the false representations as to the supply of water, standing alone, justify the decision of the trial court. The record as a whole discloses no error which could have prejudiced the substantial rights of cross-defendant.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Action by Leroy Bradley and wife against the Delta Land & Water Company and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

SHAW, J. This is one of a brood of like cases based upon alleged false and fraudulent representations made by defendants and their selling agents, by means whereof certain parties, including plaintiffs, in reliance thereon, were induced to purchase arid lands in Beaver county, Utah, and shares of stock in an irrigation company which evidenced the right to water for use thereon. This action, instituted upon notice of rescission served upon defendants, is to recover a sum of money paid by plaintiffs in the purchase of 80 acres of such land, located in what was known as the Milford project in said state, and to cancel a promissory note and mortgage securing payment of the same, executed by plaintiffs in the purchase of the water stock. Upon trial the court found the issues in favor of plaintiffs, and entered judgment in accordance therewith, from which defendant Delta Land & Water Company has appealed.

Appellant's chief contention is that the findings are not justified by the evidence.

The facts upon which the action is based are in substance identical with those involved in the case of Scott v. Delta Land & Water Co. (Civ. No. 3591) 207 Pac. 389, the judgment in which was, in an opinion filed by this court on April 11, 1922, affirmed. The opinion referred to contains a full discussion of the alleged errors urged in the instant case as ground for a reversal of the judgment herein. What is there said is equally applicable to appellant's contention upon the insufficiency of evidence to support the findings herein, as well as upon the ground of laches on the part of plaintiffs in bringing their action to enforce the rescission. No purpose could be served by a restatement of the facts or reasons which prompted the court in affirming the judgment therein. Suffice it to say that, upon the authority of what is said in the Scott Case and the case of Delta Land & Water Co. v. Perry et al. (Civ. No. 3590) 207 Pac. 393, filed herewith, the judgment herein is affirmed.

PER CURIAM. Action to enforce rescission of a contract for the purchase of real property and of certain shares of corporation stock, and for other relief. The case is similar to three others in which decisions of this court are being filed at this time. They are No. 3590, Delta Land & Water Co. v. Perry et al., 207 Pac. 393; No. 3591, Scott et al. v. Delta Land & Water Co. et al., 207 Pac. 389, and No. 3593, Bradley et al. v. Delta Land & Water Co. et al., 207 Pac. 395. This case differs from the others only in that it relates to a different contract and different property. The alleged false and fraudulent representations made by the defendants and their agents and the various circumstances of the transactions are so much alike that a separate statement of the particular facts of this case is not necessary.

On the authority of the decisions above mentioned, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SEILER. (Cr. 1012.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 28, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 25, 1922.)

1. Criminal law § 553—Jury has right to accept testimony for prosecution, notwithstanding contradiction by defendant's witnesses.

Though defendant and his witnesses testified defendant was driving at a reasonable speed on the right side of the road before colliding with the automobile of deceased, the jury had the right to accept the testimony of witnesses for the prosecution that defendant was driving in the center or on the left of the road at a speed between 40 and 55 miles an hour.

2. Homicide § 250—Evidence held to sustain conviction for manslaughter by unlawfully driving automobile.

Evidence on behalf of the state that defendant was driving his automobile in the nighttime, either in the center of the road or on the left-hand side at a speed of 45 or 50 miles an hour, when he collided with two other automobiles at a sharp curve and killed the driver of one of the other machines, held sufficient to sustain a conviction for manslaughter.

3. Homicide § 62—Death caused by act expressly forbidden by statute is "manslaughter."

Death caused by driving an automobile on the left side of the road at a speed exceeding 40 miles an hour or at an unreasonable rate of speed on a winding road where there was much traffic, each of which acts made a misdemeanor under Motor Vehicle Act, as amended by St. 1919, p. 191, is manslaughter under Pen. Code § 192, defining "manslaughter" as the unlawful killing of a human being without malice, in commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Manslaughter.]

4. Homicide § 340(3)—Instruction held favorable to accused.

In a prosecution for manslaughter by the unlawful operation of an automobile, a paragraph of the instruction that the driving of an automobile on the highway under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence was a lawful act was more favorable than defendant was entitled to.

5. Criminal law § 800(1)—Homicide § 285—Instruction as to criminal negligence held unnecessary, and where given need not define term where acts charged were unlawful.

Where the acts charged in a prosecution for manslaughter were unlawful, so that the negligent performance of a lawful act was not involved in the case, an instruction on criminal negligence was unnecessary, and the fact that the court gave such instruction did not require it to go further and define criminal negligence.

6. Criminal law § 789(4), 823(15)—Instruction as to reasonable doubt held improper in form, but not prejudicial in view of further instruction.

An instruction that, if the jury are convinced beyond a reasonable doubt defendant was not negligent in operating his automobile, they should return a verdict of not guilty, was in improper form; it should have directed a verdict of not guilty if the jury were not convinced beyond a reasonable doubt he was negligent, but the error does not require reversal, where the next sentence in the court's charge stated that, if the jury entertained a reasonable doubt as to whether he was negligent, they should give him the benefit of that doubt.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

7. Homicide § 74—Commission of lawful act need not be wanton or reckless to be "manslaughter."

Under Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2, defining involuntary manslaughter as the unlawful killing of a human being involuntarily, but in the commission of a lawful act which might produce death, without due caution and circumspection, the act performed must be one which might produce death, but lack of caution and circumspection need not go to the extent of being wanton or reckless.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

A. V. Seiler was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying new trial. Affirmed.

Theodore A. Bell, and Ralph Starke, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant was convicted on a charge of manslaughter; he moved for a new trial, the motion was denied; he made a motion in arrest of judgment, and that motion was denied; and he has appealed from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

[1, 2] That the appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The evidence shows that on the evening of the 22d day of April, 1921, the defendant was driving an automobile from Burlingame north toward San Francisco. At the point known as Death Curve, which is located below the cemeteries and between Burlingame and San Francisco, the car driven by the defendant collided with an automobile driven by Harry D. Utter, and thereafter proceeded and immediately struck an automobile driven by the deceased, Harry R. Doty. The latter collision was of such violence that Doty was killed. The place of the accident is particularly dangerous, as may be inferred from the name it bears. Each of the drivers of each of the machines lived in the general neighborhood and knew the dangerous nature of the spot. The accident occurred about 8 o'clock in the evening. The prosecution called as its witnesses persons who were riding in the other machines, and the defendant called as his witnesses persons who were riding in his machine. It will serve no purpose to quote the testimony of each witness, but it may be said that the defendant's witnesses testified that the defendant was driving on the right-hand side of the highway, at a rate of speed variously estimated at 18, 20, or 25 miles per hour; that the other two automobiles were very close together, and both were going down the road at a rate of speed variously estimated at 35 or 40 miles per hour. Of course, if the jury had accepted the foregoing testimony they would have been entitled to bring in a verdict of not guilty. Their verdict, however, indicates that they did not accept the foregoing as being the true statement of the facts.

The witnesses called by the prosecution testified that at the time of the first impact and also at the time of the second impact, the defendant was either in the center of the road or on his left-hand side; some of those witnesses placed the speed of the defendant's car at 45 miles an hour, and some placed his speed as high as 50 miles an hour; those same witnesses claimed that Utter's car and Doty's car, at the time of the accident, were traveling at a rate of speed not exceeding 20, 23, 24, or 25 miles an hour. The jury had the right to believe, and if it did believe, that at the time of the accident, the defendant attempted, in the nighttime, to make Death Curve by driving on the left-hand side of the road at a speed of 45 or 50 miles an hour, then, and in that event, the defendant was guilty of manslaughter.

On the publication of the foregoing, the appellant applied for a rehearing. In his petition he set forth that certain errors were committed by the trial court in instructing the jury. The petition was granted for the purpose of allowing the appellant to present his points. As we understand the appellant's contention, it is that the trial court gave instructions which were conflicting, and that the instructions of the trial court stated to the jury that the defendant should be convicted if the decedent was killed by reason of the "criminal negligence" of the defendant, but that the trial court did not define the expression "criminal negligence." Complaint is also made that one instruction as to the proof was unfair as to the defendant. The instructions given we have numbered for convenience as follows:

I. "I want to say to you that the driving of an automobile upon the public street or highway under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence in this case was a lawful act. In other words, it was an act which this defendant or any other person had under the law a right to do.

II. "If you are convinced to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant on the occasion in question was guilty of negligence, and you further find to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the negligence of which he was then and there guilty, if any, was of criminal character, or, in other words, was criminal negligence, you will in that case return a verdict of guilty on that count as charged in the information.

III. "If you are convinced to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that he was not at the time in question guilty of negligence of any sort or kind, whatsoever, and was exercising reasonable care and circumspection and caution in the operation of the automobile, and that he was not under the influence of intoxicating liquor, you will, of course, return a verdict of not guilty."

It was the theory of the prosecution, and it introduced evidence tending to prove: (A) That at the time of the accident the defendant was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, while driving his automobile; (B) that at said time he was driving on the left-hand side of the road; (C) that immediately prior to the accident he was driving at a speed of 40, or 45 miles or 50 miles per hour; (D) that the accident occurred about 8 o'clock at night on a hilly, serpentine road, which is,

during the day and night, traveled by vast numbers of pedestrians and vehicles, and, at said time and place, the defendant did not operate his car in a careful and prudent manner and at a reasonable rate of speed having regard to the traffic and use of said highway. Under the Motor Vehicle Act of California as amended (Stats. 1919, p. 191), specification A, is a felony (Id. § 17); specification B is a misdemeanor (Id. § 20, subd. "a"; section 32, subd. "a"); specification C is a misdemeanor (Id. § 22, subd. "a"; section 32, subd. "a") and specification D, is a misdemeanor (Id. § 22, subd. "a"; section 32, subd. "a").

In the information on which the defendant went to trial there were two counts. The second count charged the defendant as under specification A. On that count the jury refused to bring in a verdict. For the purpose of this decision we will assume that the jury acquitted the defendant thereon, and we will not consider intoxication in determining the merits of this appeal.

Section 192 of the Penal Code, in effect, provides as follows: Manslaughter is the unlawful killing of a human being without malice. It is involuntary—in the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony; or, manslaughter is the unlawful killing of a human being without malice. It is involuntary—in the commission of a lawful act which might produce death without due caution and circumspection.

[3] Under our statutes if the death was caused under specification B, C, or D, the jury was entitled to bring in a verdict of guilty under the first definition of manslaughter. In other words, if one performs an act in a manner expressly forbidden by statute and thereby causes the death of another, he may be convicted under the definition of manslaughter as firstly defined. State v. Campbell, 82 Conn. 671, 677, 74 Atl. 927, 135 Am. St. Rep. 293, 18 Ann. Cas. 236; People v. Camberis, 297 Ill. 455, 130 N. E. 712; State v. Clark, 99 Or. 629, 196 Pac. 360; State v. Rountree, 181 N. C. 535, 106 S. E. 669, and 2 R. C. L. 1212. If one performs an act in a manner not forbidden by statute, but in a wanton, reckless, or culpable manner, and thereby kills another, he may be convicted under the definition of manslaughter as secondly defined. Schultz v. State, 89 Neb. 34, 130 N. W. 972, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 403, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 495; State v. Goetz, 83 Conn. 437, 76 Atl. 1000, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 458, 462; 21 Cyc. 760. In other words every alleged act of the defendant done in the management of his car at the time of the accident is provided against in the statute and is made unlawful. This being so, the case involved the doing of unlawful acts and not lawful acts.

[4] It will be noted that the instructions given by the trial court were not addressed to homicides committed in the performance of unlawful acts. It will be noted, at once, that instruction I, which is addressed to homicides committed in the performance of lawful acts, is far more favorable to the defendant than he was entitled to. Under that instruction as it is worded, the jury should have brought in a verdict of not guilty. But, by its verdict, it appears that the jury disregarded the instruction.

[5] Instruction II deals with "criminal negligence." That expression is used in those jurisdictions where it has been created by statute. 29 Cyc. 424. Nebraska is such a state.

"The term 'criminal negligence,' as it is used in" section 3, article 1 of chapter 72 of the Compiled Laws of Nebraska, "is defined to be gross negligence. It is such negligence as would amount to a flagrant and reckless disregard of her own safety and amount to a willful indifference to the injury liable to follow." Omaha & R. V. R. Co. v. Chollette, 33 Neb. 143, 146, 49 N. W. 1114, 1115.

In other words, criminal negligence consists of the commission of a lawful act, but in a culpable, reckless manner. However, as stated above, the performance of a lawful act is not involved in the issues in this case. It was neither necessary nor appropriate that the trial court should have given instruction No. II concerning criminal negligence. Having done so, however, it was not error for the trial court to omit to go further and define criminal negligence.

[6] Instruction No. III is not exactly correct. The instruction would have been in better form if it had been worded as follows:

"If you are not convinced to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that he was at the time in question guilty of negligence of any sort or kind, whatsoever, and was exercising reasonable care and circumspection and caution in the operation of the automobile, and that he was not under the influence of intoxicating liquor, you will, of course, return a verdict of not guilty."

Such, undoubtedly, was the meaning of the trial court, and such undoubtedly was the meaning which the jury obtained, because the very next sentence in the court's charge was:

"On the other hand if you entertain reasonable doubt as to whether he was guilty of negligence of any kind or character, whatsoever, or as to whether he was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, you will in that case give him the benefit of such reasonable doubt and return a verdict of not guilty."

We find no reversible error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [7] The opinion of the district court contains this passage:

"If one performs an act in a manner not forbidden by statute, but in a wanton, reckless, or culpable manner, and thereby kills another, he may be convicted under the definition of manslaughter as secondly defined."

The statute (Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2) defines involuntary manslaughter of this specific character as the unlawful killing of a human being, involuntarily, but "in the commission of a lawful act which might produce death * * * without due caution and circumspection." In order to constitute this kind of manslaughter the act may be lawful, but it must be one which might produce death, and which does produce death, and it must be committed without due caution and circumspection. The lack of due caution and circumspection need not go to the extent of being wanton or reckless, although it might possibly be such as would be defined as culpable. But the word "culpable" is not an apt description of the idea intended to be conveyed by the words "due caution and circumspection." On this subject see note II to the case of Johnson v. State (1902) 61 L. R. A. 277. This remark was not necessary to the decision of the district court, and therefore its inaccuracy does not require us to grant a rehearing.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

JOHNSTON et al. v. MENDENHALL et al.

1. Ejectment ⚡69—Demurrers to defenses based on entry under contract of sale properly sustained in view of defense of ownership and right to possession as plaintiff's partners.

In an action in ejectment, which went to trial on defendant's first defense denying plaintiffs' ownership as exclusive tenants in common, and alleging ownership and right of possession in plaintiffs and defendants as partners, demurrers to defenses and causes of action based on defendant's entry under and fulfillment, so far as not prevented by plaintiffs' nonperformance, of a contract of sale, under which they were to have exclusive possession, management, etc., for ten years, apply the entire gross income, except salary, to the payment of interest on a note and mortgage, which they agreed to discharge in payment of the purchase price, and reduce the amount thereof at the end of such period to a given sum, at which time provision was made for a division of the profits between them and plaintiffs, but that, if they failed to pay as stipulated, plaintiff should be released from the contract, and defendants' rights thereunder, including that of possession, forfeited, and that the agreement was purely one of purchase and sale, under which the parties were not partners, were properly sustained; the first defense being sufficient to afford defendants full opportunity to present their defenses of ownership and right to possession under the contract.

2. Ejectment ⚡23—Vendors' agreement to resell and indemnify purchasers for losses from proceeds held not to create interest in land sufficient as a defense in ejectment.

Vendors' agreement to pay purchasers in possession under a contract of sale the amount expended on the land by them, in consideration of their remaining in possession and caring for it, despite losses alleged to have been caused by vendors' nonperformance, until a sale could be consummated, and to use their best efforts to sell the land and pay such sum with interest from the proceeds did not create an interest in the land which defendants could set up as a defense to an action in ejectment but merely an interest in the proceeds of the sale thereof.

3. Appeal and error ⚡694(1)—Judgment on issue held conclusive in absence of evidence.

In an action in ejectment where trial was had on an issue as to defendants' ownership and right of possession under a contract of sale a judgment for plaintiffs, in the absence of the evidence, held conclusive.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by John Johnston, Jr., and another, against Carl Mendenhall and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

U. E. White, of Pomona, and Glen M. Ely, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

R. C. Springer, of San Diego, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This action is one in ejectment brought to recover possession of certain land situated in San Diego county and known as the Riverview ranch. Plaintiffs, who are husband and wife, claim to be the owners in common of the property and entitled to its possession. Defendants' pleadings consist of a second amended answer containing seven different pleas, which include a denial of ownership as alleged, and certain allegations which, it is claimed, establish equitable defenses and counterclaims, and an amended cross-complaint containing eleven allegations which substantially set up all the alleged equitable defenses recited in the various defenses in the amended answer. Demurrers were sustained to the amended cross-complaint and to all of the defenses set up in the amended answer except the first defense thereof. This first defense denied ownership in plaintiffs as exclusive tenants in common and alleged ownership and right to possession in both plaintiffs and defendants as partners. It further denied the allegations of the complaint as to the wrongful withholding of possession by defendants, and alleged rightful possession in them at the time of the commencement of the action, and it also denied, as charged in the complaint, that the value of the use and occupation of the premises was of the sum of $300 a month or any other sum. The case went to trial upon the complaint and the first defense contained in the amended answer. Judgment went for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal on the judgment roll alone, and they contend that the trial court erred in sustaining demurrers to various allegations of their amended answer and to their amended cross-complaint, which pleadings, they assert, contain and fully set forth complete legal and equitable defenses to the action and upon which they have been denied a trial. These defenses, it is claimed, appear in the seventh defense of the answer and are again reiterated in the second cause of action alleged in the cross-complaint.

The seventh defense of the amended answer alleges the making of a contract upon February 26, 1919, with a recital of its terms and the entry of the defendants thereunder, and their fulfillment, so far as not prevented by plaintiffs, of the contract. It then alleges the failure of plaintiffs to perform, and the giving of notice to them by defendants of certain losses which would necessarily follow from a continuation of nonperformance. It also alleges a modification of the contract in relation to plaintiffs' duty, the continued failure of plaintiffs to perform the agreement as modified, and the consequent inability of defendants to make payments under the contract, with notice of such fact to plaintiffs. A new agreement of settlement is then claimed to have been made whereby defendants were to have and receive the sum of $15,000, which sum, it is recited, they had expended on the land, and it is further alleged that under this new agreement defendants were to remain in possession of the property for the purpose of farming and caring for the same for the mutual benefit of plaintiffs and defendants until a sale thereof could be consummated, plaintiffs agreeing in the meantime to use their best efforts to sell the land and out of the proceeds to pay defendants the said sum with interest thereon from the date of the settlement agreement, they being unable to purchase defendants' interests. Defendants then allege that pursuant to this settlement agreement they remained on the land and carried out their contract until prevented from so doing by an attachment levied by plaintiffs in another action upon the farming tools, the nature of which action the record does not disclose. Defendants then plead their willingness and ability to carry out the agreement except as prevented by plaintiffs, and claim that the plaintiffs have waived their right to declare any of the agreements forfeited. The pleading then concludes with a prayer that plaintiffs take nothing and that it be adjudged that the said agreements have not been forfeited by defendants, but that they are still in full force and effect, and general relief is asked for. The second cause of action of the amended cross-complaint reiterates the matters alleged in the seventh defense of the amended answer, and this pleading concludes with a prayer that the agreement be revised to show the true contract existing between the plaintiffs and defendants and that the contract as revised be specifically enforced, and damages in the sum of $30,000 and general relief are prayed for. Attached to and as an exhibit to defendants' amended cross-complaint is a contract which in substance shows, in addition to the recitals contained in defendants' pleadings, that the parties hereto entered into an agreement of sale by the terms of which the plaintiffs agreed to sell and the defendants agreed to purchase a certain interest in the lands here involved, together with water rights, for the sum of $50,000. It is recited therein that the land is incumbered with a mortgage for this amount, and that defendants agree to pay their purchase price by fully paying and discharging the same in accordance with the terms of the agreement. Further provisions show that defendants were to have exclusive possession, management and direction of the property for a term of ten years, during which period they were to apply the entire gross income of the property to the payment of interest upon the note and mortgage and certain other expenses, including insurance and taxes, except the sum of $150 per month which defendant Carl Mendenhall was to retain as a salary. By the terms thereof, however, defendants agreed in any event to reduce the amount of the mortgage at the end of the ten-year period down to the sum of $10,000, at which time provision was made for a certain division of the profits between plaintiffs and defendants. By the agreement plaintiffs undertook to install a pumping plant upon the lands for the purpose of irrigating the same. The agreement further provided that in the event of defendants' failure to pay the interest or principal, and the taxes and other operating expenses stipulated for, that plaintiffs should be released therefrom and that defendants should forfeit any and all rights acquired thereunder, including their right to possession, and that the agreement should terminate; and it also contained a clause to the effect that the agreement was purely one of purchase and sale and that the parties were in no sense partners. It also appears by the very terms of this contract that defendants were bound to make certain payments irrespective of any profit derived from the land, and that their rights under the contract were declared to depend upon the prompt and faithful performance of the agreement, failing in which they were to forfeit all rights acquired thereunder, including their right to possession.

[1, 2] It is manifest, therefore, that the demurrers were properly sustained to the causes of action alleged, and the defenses relied upon in the amended answer and the cross-complaint, as the first defense of the answer upon which the case went to trial was sufficient to afford defendants full opportunity to present their defenses of alleged ownership and right of possession under the contract. The seventh defense alleged a termination of the contract and the making of a new agreement whereby plaintiffs were only obligated to use their best efforts to sell the land and pay certain amounts to the defendants out of the proceeds of such sale, and that defendants were in the meantime to remain in possession of the premises. Assuming the agreement to have been made as alleged, it did not purport to pass an interest in the land to defendants, but merely an interest in the proceeds arising from the sale thereof. The alleged agreement, therefore, did not create an interest in land. Miller v. Lerdo Land Co. (Cal. Sup.) 198 Pac. 778.

[3] Prior to proceeding to trial of the case, defendants, upon application to the court, were permitted to amend their second amended answer and second amended cross-complaint. By these amendments defendants allege that during the season of 1920 they informed plaintiffs that they had suffered losses and would be unable to comply with the provisions of their contract, and that thereupon plaintiffs and defendants entered into an arrangement of settlement by the terms of which defendants acquired certain interests in the land to the extent of $15,000, and that plaintiffs were to use their best efforts to effect a sale of the same and from the proceeds thereof were to pay to defendants the sum mentioned. They further alleged that the defendants in the meantime were to remain in possession and care for the land, and that pursuant to this agreement defendants did so remain in possession until prevented by plaintiffs, who caused an attachment to be levied on the farming implements. This amendment, given its most favorable interpretation, merely shows, as does the agreement in the second amended answer, that the original contract was terminated, and if we assume the allegations to be true, they simply attempt to set up a legal interest in the land, and the allegations therefore have no more force and effect than those contained in the first defense of the amended answer, which alleged ownership and right of possession. Trial having been had upon this issue, the judgment, in the absence of evidence, is conclusive upon this question.

The additional defenses of the amended answer and cross-complaint deal with the validity and the relationship of the parties under the contract, and do not require consideration.

From what we have said it follows that the orders and judgment should be, and they are, hereby affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

IRRIGATED VALLEYS LAND CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. ALTMAN et al. (Civ. 2419.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 24, 1922.)

1. Waters and water courses — 158½(2)—Evidence held to support findings entitling defendant to use of water.

In an action to restrain defendants from appropriating the water from a certain ditch, evidence held to support findings entitling defendants to the use of the water.

2. Corporations — 410—Secretary's powers as to disposition of lands and concomitant rights held coextensive with those of corporation.

Where the secretary of a corporation organized to buy and sell land was vested with power to sell and develop its lands and water rights, and by special act of the directors was also made sales agent and manager with power to sell its lands, so far as authority to dispose of its lands and concomitant rights was concerned, his powers were coextensive with those of the corporation.

3. Corporations — 410—Bound by secretary's act tending to promote authorized business.

Where a corporation's business was buying, selling, and improving farm lands, it was within the authority of its secretary, with plenary power to give an adjacent landowner the privilege of using the company's water to improve his crops, and, as this was an appropriate means of promoting the authorized business of the company, it was bound by its officer's act.

4. Waters and water courses — 157—A parol license acted on to use water held irrevocable.

Where licensee began to use water from an irrigation company's ditch under a parol license, and at the suggestion of the company had spent money in purchasing this land from a third party and preparing it to use the company's water, the license was irrevocable.

5. Waters and water courses — 154(1)—Irrevocable license to use water held a right appurtenant to the land.

Where the present owner's predecessor in interest had obtained an irrevocable license to water the land from an irrigation company's ditch, a contention that the present owner had made no expenditures on the company's representation, and hence was not entitled to use the water, was unsound, for when the present owner's predecessor in interest acquired an irrevocable license it became a right appurtenant to the land.

6. Waters and water courses ☞157—Irrigation company, by failure to protest against use of water, recognized validity of original license.

Where an irrigation company remained silent for years, although it had knowledge that the present owner's predecessor in interest had used the company's water on his land and the present owner had and was continuing to use the company's water, the company by its conduct recognized the validity of the original license, as quiescence is tantamount to acquiescence.

7. Estoppel ☞52—Nature of estoppel stated.

Where a person by his conduct induces another to believe in the existence of a particular state of facts and the other acts thereon to his prejudice, the former is estopped as against the latter to deny that the state of facts does not in truth exist.

8. Waters and water courses ☞138—Protest to tenant does not prevent landlord from acquiring against irrigation company easement to use water by estoppel.

A protest by an irrigation company against the appropriation of water for certain lands made to a tenant does not break the operation of an estoppel against the company to deny the right of the landlord to use this water.

9. Waters and water courses ☞138—Continuous use for five years gave easement by prescription.

Where after defendant's predecessor in interest had notified plaintiff irrigation company that he proposed to use water from plaintiff's ditch, and that plaintiff could not stop him, and there was a continuous use of the water under a claim of right for a period of more than five years, a finding that defendant acquired title to an easement to use the water by prescription was authorized.

10. Waters and water courses ☞137—Use continuous within prescription rule, where water used as often as necessary.

Where one claiming an easement uses it as often as it is necessary for him to do so, the use is generally held to be continuous, and this is particularly true with reference to easements connected with irrigation.

11. Waters and water courses ☞138—Right to use water both under irrevocable license and under easement by prescription not inconsistent.

In an action by an irrigation company to restrain defendant from using its water, there is no inconsistency between defendants' claims of a right to appropriate the water under an irrevocable license and a right to appropriate the water under an easement by prescription.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by the Irrigated Valleys Land Company of California against D. J. Altman and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dudley D. Sales, of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, both of Woodland, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiff instituted this action for the purpose of securing a decree perpetually enjoining and restraining the defendants from using a certain ditch, known as the "Hungry Hollow Ditch" and the right of way over which said ditch traverses and which is the property of the plaintiff. The alleged wrongful use of said ditch by the defendants consists of the "diversion of water from said ditch by and through an irrigating canal which connected with the same and extended to a certain piece of real property owned by defendant, Schaupp, and leased by the defendant, Altman." Said real property embraces 160 acres, and for the sake of convenience will hereinafter be referred to as "the 160-acre tract."

The amended complaint sets out in detail the acts of the defendants constituting the alleged wrongful diversion of the water from said ditch. The answer to said complaint denies specifically the averments thereof and also sets up a number of special defenses which may be stated in substance as follows: (1) That plaintiff is estopped from denying that defendants have the right to the use of said ditch and right of way because of the representation by plaintiff to the predecessor in interest of defendants, one William Chaney, prior to the purchase of said tract by said Chaney, that the right to the use of said ditch and right of way would become, upon said purchase by said Chaney, appurtenant to said tract, and that he could enjoy said use without cost; that said Chaney thereupon purchased the said 160-acre tract on the faith of said representations and expended money in constructing ditches and preparing said tract for cultivation; and in connection with this latter averment it is further alleged that the defendants and their predecessors in interest have used said ditch and right of way under a license and with the consent of plaintiff, and "relying upon said license and consent have spent money in the construction of irrigating ditches and in preparing said land for cultivation"; (2) that the owners of said 160-acre tract were given the right to use said ditch and right of way for the purpose of obtaining water with which to irrigate said tract in an instrument whereby the right of way for said ditch was granted to the plaintiff company by the Bank of Woodland; that "at the time defendants' predecessor in interest purchased the 160-acre tract, plaintiff represented that said tract was contiguous to the said ditch, and now the plaintiff is estopped to deny the truth of said statement." The right of the defendants to an easement in said ditch and right of way by prescription is also set up.

The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury upon the amended complaint and the answer thereto, and the court thereupon filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, upholding the special defenses of the defendants, and rendered and caused to be entered judgment accordingly. The appeal is by the plaintiff from said judgment under the alternative method.

The general contention of the appellant is that certain findings are not supported by the evidence, and also that the conclusions of law are inconsistent with the findings of fact. As to the latter proposition, the contention is, in effect, that certain findings vital to the judgment, conceding that they are bottomed by sufficient evidentiary support, do not warrant the conclusions of law deduced therefrom by the court below. In other words, it is claimed that, admitting that the facts embraced within these findings are true the trial court made an erroneous application of the law thereto.

The defendant Schaupp is the owner of the 160-acre tract and the defendant Altman the lessee thereof. The said 160-acre tract does not border upon the ditch, but adjoins on the west what is known as the "Foster Land," which does abut upon the ditch.

[1] The plaintiff was organized as a corporation in the month of October, 1909, from which time uninterruptedly down to the date of the trial one William Metzner was president thereof. Charles J. Cox, Jr., became the secretary of the corporation at or about the time of its organization, and held and discharged the duties of that office down to and including the year 1912. In this connection it should be stated that there were two persons officially associated with the corporation by the name of Charles J. Cox; they being father and son. The former was a director of the plaintiff. It should further be stated that, during the time he was secretary of plaintiff, Charles J. Cox, Jr., was engaged in the general real estate business in the city of San Francisco under the name of Cox & Co. Upon its organization the plaintiff adopted by-laws for the government thereof and its business. Section 8 of article 10 of said by-laws provided:

"It will be the duty of the secretary to negotiate all contracts for the purchase of lands, water power and water rights; to supervise the development and improvement of all lands belonging to the corporation, and to form and draw plans for the subdivision, general supervision and sale of lands, and to generally supervise the sale, purchase, development, and marketing of the lands of the corporation."

The plaintiff, in the year 1910, purchased from the bank of Woodland a 3,000-acre tract of land, situated in Yolo county, having in view the subdividing of said tract into smaller farms and putting the same as so subdivided on the market for sale. In the month of September of said year 1910 (probably at the time that the tract referred to was acquired by the plaintiff), the said Bank of Woodland granted to plaintiff a right of way for a ditch; the purpose of the construction of which was to divert water from Cache creek, in said county, to the tract of land mentioned, the right to the use of so much water as might be necessary for said purpose or as might be conveniently permitted to be used therefor having been granted to the plaintiff by the Yolo Water & Power Company. Among the covenants contained in the instrument granting said right of way to plaintiff was the following:

"It being further agreed and understood that the owners of land now contiguous to said right of way, and each of them, shall have the right to the use of said ditch for the purpose of conveying water therein for the irrigation of their land, such use to be free to them and to each of them."

The plaintiff commenced the construction of a ditch over said right of way in the year 1910, shortly after the grant to it of said right by the Bank of Woodland. The said ditch taps Cache creek at a point opposite the town of Capay, in Yolo county, and, having been completed, runs in a northeasterly direction for a distance of about six miles, where it reaches the tract of land already referred to as having been acquired by the plaintiff from the said Bank of Woodland. Said ditch is designated and known as the "Hungry Hollow Ditch" and is, in point of fact, a part of the irrigating system of the Yolo Water & Power Company.

On November 15, 1909, Charles J. Cox, Jr., secretary of the plaintiff, addressed a letter to one William Chaney, then residing in Hollister, Cal., proposing to secure for him the 160-acre tract in question. His letter reads:

"Dear Will: Inclosed you will find a small diagram of the land belonging to the Irrigated Valleys Land Company, showing the ditches in proximity to Cache creek. The company is building these ditches now, subdividing this big 3,000-acre tract into small farms and selling it for $125 per acre. The two pieces marked red on this map, consisting of 131 and 160 acres, respectively, adjoin our land and come under our ditch. I secured a contract on these two pieces Saturday, at $65 an acre, as the owner, who is not a resident of this neighborhood, does not know of the improvements going on there. It is fine rich soil, and worth $150 an acre under ditch; anybody buying this now will get the benefit of the ditches for nothing. The land company have all they can handle, and I would like to have some friend of mine buy this property. Would like to have you go up and see it this week, and hope to hear from you at your earliest convenience."

Chaney, testifying as a witness for the defendant, said that upon receiving the above letter, he wrote to Mr. Cox and asked him to give him further information with regard to the 160-acre tract; that Cox later visited him at his house, and asked him to go with him (Cox) to see the land, and the witness consented to and did do so.

"After inspecting the land," proceeded Chaney, "Cox told me if I bought it I could use the company's ditches, and that he wanted me to put out alfalfa, and he said it would be an advertisement for them and help sell their property."

Cox further informed witness that he (Cox) was the secretary and manager of the plaintiff. Acting upon the statements and representations made by Cox, Chaney bought the property on the day that he had the conversation with the former. He testified that he would not have bought the property if he had known or thought that he could not have irrigated it. He further stated that he had often seen Cox in and about the property that he bought in the company of prospective purchasers of the subdivisions of the plaintiff's tract. The witness said that after he purchased the property he had a conversation with Cox about mapping the 160-acre tract as part of the lands of the Woodland tract, and that Cox subsequently "showed me a map like this (a map being in the possession of the witness at the time he was testifying), and he said he had mapped that out and had marked it 'sold' in order to help the sales of the rest of the property." The witness testified that after purchasing and taking possession of the land—in the fall of 1910—he proceeded to prepare 40 acres of it for the raising of alfalfa, and that he seeded the land, built some laterals, and used the ditch in question for the purpose of irrigating the portion of the land so utilized. In the fall of 1911 he planted to alfalfa an additional 30 acres, and expended the sum of $65.25 in putting a bulkhead into the main ditch and also $50 to make a bulkhead in the lateral ditch, which he dug to carry the water from the main ditch to his tract. Altogether he expended approximately $200 in making preparation for the use of the water upon his land. In addition to this it cost him about $10 per acre to prepare the soil for the growing of alfalfa and the seeding of the same. He testified that he commenced irrigating from the ditch in the year 1911, and also used water from the ditch for the same purpose in the year 1912, and that there was no objection voiced against his use of the water from the ditch by any one connected with the plaintiff until the year 1912, when he received a letter dated August 31st of that year from plaintiff, in which it notified him that the company protested against his use of the water from the ditch of the company, and informed him, that—

"The Irrigated Valley Lands Company recognizes no right in you, or any right as appurtenant to your land, to obtain water through the company's ditch, or any ditch which connects with said ditch. There is not sufficient water to irrigate the lands adjoining said ditch, without considering lands adjacent thereto."

Upon receiving said letter, Chaney called on W. C. Wallace, who had control for the company of the distribution of the water flowing into and through the Hungry Hollow ditch, and said to Mr. Wallace that he had received the letter referred to, and that that letter stated that there was not sufficient water to accommodate the company's lands and his land also, but that Wallace, nevertheless, turned the water into the defendant's ditch. The witness testified that he had a conversation with C. J. Cox, Sr., and a Mr. Wagner after he had purchased the land through the former's son. On that occasion Cox, Sr., who represented himself to Chaney as being a director of the plaintiff, and Mr. Wagner, while not directly telling him that he could use the water, said to him that they were anxious that he should put his land into alfalfa as soon as possible. From the general trend of the conversation with Cox, Sr., the witness understood that said Cox intended that he should use the water upon his land.

Chaney entered into an agreement for the sale of the land on the 21st day of November, 1912, to Frank Galentine. Galentine on the 16th day of August, 1913, assigned his contract with Chaney for the purchase of the land to W. E. Joerger. On the 4th day of December, 1917, Chaney and Joerger joined in a deed conveying the land to the defendant Schaupp.

W. C. Wallace, heretofore mentioned as the man in charge of the distribution of the water of the Hungry Hollow ditch, testified that he distributed water to Chaney during the years 1911 and 1912 and to Joerger, while the latter was in possession of the land, during the years 1913, 1914, and 1915. He also furnished water to Galentine when he was in possession of the land. The defendant D. J. Altman testified that he bought property near the land in question in the year 1913, and was in a position at all times thereafter where he could observe operations on the 160-acre tract after it had been purchased from one Schultz by William Chaney. He stated that the land had been irrigated from the ditch during the years 1911 and 1912, and that in 1913 he took possession of the 160-acre tract under a lease; that he knew that the land had been irrigated from the water flowing through the Hungry Hollow ditch from the year 1911 to the year 1918, inclusive. He was particularly asked if the land was irrigated in the year 1916, and he replied that it was, and that he saw the water on the land. He stated that a pumping plant was installed on the 160-acre tract, but that enough water to irrigate the land could not be obtained from that source, and that the land was always irrigated by water obtained from the Yolo Water & Power Company and flowing through the main ditch in question. The pumping plant was finally abandoned and the engine sold. During the time that he was in possession of the land he stated that no one interposed any objection to the use of the water from the ditch until just prior to the commencement of this action, when he received a letter from the company, protesting against further use of the ditch by him. He also specified the number of different occasions in each year on which the portion of the 160-acre tract which was under cultivation was irrigated from the water of the ditch.

Metzner, president of the plaintiff, testified that—

The company never "entered into any agreement with the owner, or purported owner, of this 160-acre tract in reference to the use of water thereon taken from the Hungry Hollow ditch."

He stated that he had no knowledge of the diversion of the water from the ditch to the 160-acre tract until a short time prior to August 31, 1912, when the company addressed to Chaney the letter heretofore referred to, declaring that the company recognized "no right in Chaney or any right as appurtenant to his land" to obtain water through the company's ditch or any ditch connected with said ditch; that he had no knowledge thereafter of the use of said water by Chaney or any of his successors in interest until some time in 1918, when it was learned by the company that the defendant Altman was diverting water to said 160-acre tract from the ditch, and had diverted water from the ditch to the said 160-acre tract in the year 1917; that, upon learning this, the company addressed a letter to Altman, protesting against the taking of any water from the main canal of said company, and diverting the same to the 160-acre tract in question, and stating to him that, unless he ceased so taking and using said water, legal steps would be taken by the company to prevent him from further so diverting and using the same. Metzner testified that the company received no written reply to the letter addressed to Chaney, under date of August 31, 1912, but said that about a week or ten days after sending said letter to Chaney, he (Metzner) went to what is known as the "Home Ranch" of the company's lands in Yolo county, and that he there met Chaney; that Chaney, addressing him, said: "I got your letter, and I propose to use the water, and you can't stop me." The witness said: "As far as I know, Mr. Chaney never continued to make an attempt to use it." A letter written by G. D. Parish, a tenant in possession of the 160-acre tract, under date of May 20, 1916, was received by the company, and therein Parish asked the permission of the company for the use of water to "wet a piece of grain and alfalfa" on said land. This letter was introduced in evidence and Metzner said that, while no written reply was made thereto, he later visited the properties of the company and there met Mr. Parish, and said to him that the company could not furnish him water at that time. Metzner further testified that C. J. Cox, Jr., under the firm name of Cox & Co., was made the selling agent of the lands of the plaintiff. This agency existed while said Cox was still secretary of the company.

G. D. Parish testified for the plaintiff in rebuttal that he had the 160-acre tract leased during the years 1916 and 1917; that he did not use the water on the premises in 1916, but did irrigate from the ditch in the year 1917. He stated that he did not have any alfalfa in 1916 because he had no water.

It should also be stated that it was shown that the distribution of the water was controlled by an employee of the plaintiff, and that said employee generally used his own judgment as to the turning in of the water upon the various pieces of land which used the water from the Hungry Hollow ditch.

The above statement represents substantially all the important testimony received at the trial.

The findings are not of specific facts, but are general in form, declaring that the allegations of the answer are true and those of the complaint untrue. As we have seen, the answer, besides specific denials, sets up the several different and distinct special defenses above referred to, and sets out with particularity the facts upon which each is founded. It follows that all of the material facts so alleged, as well as those facts which were brought out by the evidence in support thereof, are comprehended within the findings or were found to be true by the court, viz.: (1) That the grant of the right of way for the ditch to the plaintiff by the Bank of Woodland also specifically granted to the owner of "land now contiguous to said right of way" the right to the use of said ditch for the purpose of conveying water therein for the irrigation of their lands, "such use to be free to them and to each of them." (2) That Cox, Jr., was, at the time of the purchase of the 160-acre tract by Chaney, secretary of the plaintiff and its agent for the sale of the lands embraced within the tract for the special irrigation of which the right of way for a ditch was granted to it and the main ditch was built; that Cox, Jr., as secretary of the plaintiff, was vested with full power to negotiate all contracts for the purchase of lands, water power, and water rights, and "to supervise the development of all lands belonging to the corporation"; that Cox, Jr., was also the selling agent of the plaintiff under the firm name of Cox & Co.; that said Cox induced Chaney to purchase the 160-acre tract upon the representation and promise to the latter that if he (Chaney) would purchase said tract, he could have the use of the ditch for the purpose of conveying water to his land for irrigating the same; that said Cox further stated to Chaney, during the negotiations for the sale of the 160-acre tract to the latter that it would be an advertisement and to the interest of the plaintiff's lands, and thus facilitate the sale of the subdivisions thereof, if he (Chaney) would purchase and sow the 160-acre tract to alfalfa and raise good crops thereon; that, solely upon the faith of the promise of Cox, Jr., that he could have the use of the said ditch, Chaney purchased the land; that Chaney would not have made said purchase but for said representation and promise; that Cox mapped the lands of the plaintiff and included therein as a part and parcel of the same the 160-acre tract, marking on said map the latter tract as having been sold. (3) That Chaney immediately entered into the possession of said 160-acre tract, expended large sums of money in preparing to convey the water from the main ditch to his land and in cultivating the said tract and in growing alfalfa and grain thereon; that he so used the main ditch in the years 1911 and 1912. (4) That in the month of August, 1912, the plaintiff demanded of Chaney in writing that he cease using the water of the ditch, and at the same time likewise notified him that the company did not recognize in him any right to obtain water through its ditch or any ditch which connects with said ditch, or that the right to use the ditch was appurtenant to the 160-acre tract; that within 10 or 12 days after the receipt of the said written notice or demand to stop the further use of the ditch for the purpose of conveying water to his land, Chaney said to Metzner (president of plaintiff), referring to the plaintiff's protest against his further use of the ditch, "I propose to use the water and you can't stop me"; that from that time on down to the commencement of this action on May 29, 1918, Chaney and his successors in interest, including the defendants, have continuously, uninterruptedly, notoriously, and under a claim of right used said ditch for conveying water for irrigating the 160-acre tract.

That the evidence, of which we have above presented an epitomized statement, is amply sufficient to support said findings is a proposition which it seems to us stands beyond the realms of doubt or disputation. The remaining question is therefore whether the court deduced from said findings the correct conclusions of law.

It is not necessary, nor is such the intention, to express a definite opinion upon the question whether the 160-acre tract is "contiguous" to the main ditch within the meaning and intent of the grant of the right of way for a ditch by the Bank of Woodland to the plaintiff. We may, however, venture these suggestions in connection with this proposition: That it is probable that the bank by the insertion of that covenant in the grant intended to confer upon all owners of land in the immediate community or neighborhood in which the tract of the plaintiff is situated the right to the use of the ditch for irrigating purposes; and the word "contiguous" would not be wholly inapt in the expression of such meaning and intent under the circumstances of this case. In Ann. Cas. 1918E, 798, it is said that, while the primary meaning of the word "contiguous" is "in actual contact, touching, meeting or adjoining at the surface or border" (Johnston v. Davenport Brick, etc., Co. [D. C.] 237 Fed. 668), and that it must therefore always be so understood, unless the context shows it was otherwise intended (Holston Salt, etc., Co. v. Campbell, 89 Va. 396, 16 S. E. 274), still the meaning of the word depends largely on the subject-matter to which it is applied (Griffin v. Denison Land Co., 18 N. D. 246, 119 N. W. 1041). It is reasonable to suppose that if the right of way was granted by the bank for the exclusive use and benefit of the lands embraced within the plaintiff's 3,000-acre tract, the instrument granting the easement would probably have expressly so provided, or, in other words, restricted the employment of the ditch to such use, and therefore the fact of the omission from the grant of such a provision affords some support to the suggestion that the word "contiguous" was used in the grant as indicating an intention in the grantor to give to owners of land in the immediate vicinity of plaintiff's tract, and not included within the latter, the right to use the ditch for the irrigation of their lands. But, whatever may be the correct interpretation of the grant in that respect, it is clear that the judgment may and should be sustained upon other considerations.

[2] As secretary of the plaintiff, Cox, Jr., it will be observed, was vested with full power not only to sell the lands and water rights of the plaintiff, but was also given general power to develop the said lands for marketing purposes. He was also, moreover, by special action of the board of directors of the plaintiff, given authority to act as its sales agent and manager, with power to sell its lands. As secretary, in so far as the authority to dispose of the lands and concomitant rights of plaintiff was concerned, his powers were as broad as or coextensive with those of the corporation itself. And, as is said by Chief Justice Shaw in the very recent case of Woods Lumber Co. v. W. H. Moore, Trustee, etc., 183 Cal. 497, 501, 191 Pac. 905, 907 (11 A. L. R. 549):

"A corporation engaged in carrying on a business which it is authorized to do by its articles and the law under which it is organized has implied power to make all contracts which are 'essential to the successful prosecution of the business' (Civ. Code, § 354, subd. 8; Bates v. Coronado B. Co., 109 Cal. 163; Merc. Trust Co. v. Kiser, 91 Ga. 636), or the making of which is an appropriate means by which it may be 'reasonably expected that the business in which the corporation is engaged will be advanced' (Depot R. Synd. v. Enterprise Brewing Co., 87 Or. 560), or which are 'necessary and helpful to the conduct of its authorized business' (Timm v. Grand Rapids Br. Co., 160 Mich. 371), or which tends directly to promote the business authorized by its articles and which it is doing. Kraft v. Brewery Co., 219 Ill. 205; Central L. Co. v. Kelter, 201 Ill. 503; Blue Island Br. Co. v. Fraatz, 123 Ill. App. 26; Horst v. Lewis, 71 Neb. 365."

[3] That the plaintiff is authorized, either expressly or impliedly, to do all of these things for the successful prosecution of the business for the carrying on of which it was organized, there can be no manner of doubt; and, as above suggested, it is equally clear from the evidence that Cox, Jr., as secretary and sales agent of the plaintiff, was clothed with like authority. And, obviously, if the agreement that said Cox made with Chaney would, as Cox so conceived, and as we may assume from the evidence that it did, directly tend to promote the authorized business of the plaintiff, or be "an appropriate means" whereby it might reasonably be expected that the business of plaintiff would be advanced, then the act of making the agreement was within the scope of his authority as the agent of the plaintiff, and the latter is consequently bound thereby.

[4] It being true, then, that Cox possessed plenary power, as secretary and sales manager of the corporation, to make for and in behalf of the corporation the said agreement with Chaney, it follows that Chaney entered into the use of the ditch under a parol license from the plaintiff, and that, upon the incurring by him of expenditures of money in buying the land and also for the purpose of facilitating the use of the easement and in cultivating the tract according to the suggestion of Cox, Jr., the license became irrevocable. Churchill v. Russell, 148 Cal. 1, 82 Pac. 440; Stoner v. Zucker, 148 Cal. 516, 83 Pac. 808, 113 Am. St. Rep. 301, 7 Ann. Cas. 704; Roseberry v. Clark, 23 Cal. App. 549, 138 Pac. 923; Smith v. Green, 109 Cal. 228, 234, 41 Pac. 1022; Blankenship v. Whaley, 124 Cal. 300, 304, 57 Pac. 79; Flickinger v. Shaw, 87 Cal. 126, 131, 25 Pac. 268, 11 L. R. A. 134, 22 Am. St. Rep. 234; Rerick v. Kern, 14 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 271, 16 Am. Dec. 497; Stepp v. Williams (Cal. App.) 198 Pac. 661, 668, 669; Raritan Waterpower Co. v. Veghte, 21 N. J.

Eq. 475. See, also, comment of Prof. Freeman on the last-named case in 16 Am. Dec. 501 et seq.

In Stoner v. Zucker, supra, at page 520 of 148 Cal., at page 810 of 83 Pac. (113 Am. St. Rep. 301, 7 Ann. Cas. 704), the doctrine is thus explained:

"The recognized principle, therefore, is that where a licensee has entered [upon the premises of another] under a parol license and has expended money, or its equivalent in labor, in the execution of the license, the license becomes irrevocable, the licensee will have a right of entry upon the lands of the licensor for the purpose of maintaining his structures, or, in general, his rights under his license, and the license will continue for so long a time as the nature of it calls for."

In Raritan Waterpower Co. v. Veghte, supra, the rule is stated as follows:

"To the extent that the license is executed, equity will not disturb it or permit its revocation. Where improvements of a permanent nature have been made by a person on his own land, the enjoyment of which depends upon a right recognizable by the law, affecting the land of another, and to which his consent is necessary, and where such consent is expressly proved, or necessarily implied from the circumstances, and the improvements have been made in good faith upon it, equity will not permit advantage to be taken of the form of the consent, although not according to the strict mode of the common law, or within the statute of frauds; and to defeat such a purpose will, upon a proper bill filed, enjoin the licensor from accomplishing his fraud, or when he asks relief it will be refused, or if granted, will be allowed merely in the shape of compensation, but protecting the right of the licensee."

[5-7] Appellant, however, takes the position that the license whereby Chaney acquired the right to the easement cannot inure to the benefit of his successors in interest, inasmuch as the latter themselves made no expenditures in improving the property upon the faith of any representations made by Cox to Chaney, and that no representations were made to them. In other words, the contention is that an estoppel cannot be set up here for the reason that there were no representations or promises made by Cox, Jr., to any of the successors in interest of Chaney. The reply to this proposition is, though, that the license under which Chaney entered into the use of the ditch having become irrevocable, the right acquired thereby and thereunder became appurtenant to the 160-acre tract. Furthermore, the successors in interest of Chaney took the land with the ditch as constructed by the latter, and which connected with the main ditch, and the said ditch remained in the same condition from the time of its construction down to the date of the institution of this action, during which period of time the appellant made no attempt to interrupt the use of the ditch in any manner until August 31, 1912, and, later, April 30, 1918 (approximately a month prior to the commencement of this action), on which former date the letter heretofore referred to was addressed to Chaney, and on which latter date it addressed a letter to the defendant Altman, a tenant and not the owner of the 160-acre tract, objecting to the further use of the ditch for the purpose of irrigating said tract. It is not necessary to the working of an estoppel that in such a situation there should be direct or affirmative verbal representations. Such representations may arise by implication. In this case, the plaintiff, although, as we will later show in considering another branch of the case, having knowledge that the successors in interest of Chaney had used and were using the ditch, remained silent, addressing no protest against such use to the successors of Chaney, and thus by conduct recognized the validity of the license by which Chaney acquired the right to the easement and so acquiesced therein. As the law-writers say, "Quiescence is tantamount to acquiescence." In other words, "if a person by his conduct induces another to believe in the existence of a particular state of facts, and the other acts thereon to his prejudice, the former is estopped, as against the latter, to deny that that state of facts does in truth exist." 21 C. J. p. 1060. The ground upon which the estoppel rests is that the conduct constitutes an implied representation of the truth of the state of facts in question. Bigelow, Estop. (5th Ed.) p. 570. There can be no doubt—indeed, it must be assumed from the fact that the irrigation of the land was necessary to the successful growing of alfalfa and other grain—that the successors in interest of Chaney would not have bought the same but for their knowledge of the fact that said easement was appurtenant to said tract.

[8] Counsel for the appellant, however, declares that the letters from the plaintiff to Chaney and Altman, protesting against their use of the ditch, constitute convincing, if not conclusive, evidence that the respondents were not given the license pleaded in the answer. But the answer to this is that permission had been granted to Chaney to use the ditch, and the same had developed into an irrevocable license before said letters were received by either of the parties named. Moreover, Altman, as we have seen, was only a tenant or lessee of the 160-acre tract, and in such case such a protest, addressed to a mere tenant of the property against the use of the easement, cannot break the operation of the estoppel.

[9, 10] But the judgment may securely rest upon the finding that the defendant Schaupp acquired title to the easement or the right to the use of the ditch by prescription. As seen, the plaintiff, in a letter to Chaney, under date of August 31, 1912, notified him to cease using the ditch, but a few days thereafter Metzner, president of the plaintiff, according to his own testimony met Chaney, and they discussed the matter of the receipt of said letter, and Chaney then declared to Metzner that he proposed to use the ditch or the water, "and you can't stop me." The evidence clearly shows that from that time until and immediately preceding the date of the commencement of the present action Chaney and his successors in interest continuously used the ditch under a claim of right, or, in other words, for a period of more than five years from the date of said conversation between Metzner and Chaney. It is true that one witness testified that in the year 1916 no water from the ditch was used on the land, the explanation being that the spring of 1916 was a late, wet season, and that there was really no necessity for using the ditch. This testimony came from the 1916 lessee of the 160-acre tract. This though, if true, would not be such an omission in the use of the ditch as to have the effect of breaking the continuity of the user. The failure, if any, to use the ditch in the year 1916 was not due to any act of the owner, but to the fact only that the circumstances were such that water from the ditch was not needed. The omission amounted neither to a nonuser nor evidence of an intention to abandon the easement. In other words, as counsel for the defendants well say, "continuous use" does not necessarily mean "constant use." Where one who claims an easement uses it as often as it may be necessary for him to do so, the use is generally held to be continuous, and this is particularly true with reference to easements connected with irrigation. Hesperia Land & Water Co. v. Rogers, 83 Cal. 10, 23 Pac. 196, 17 Am. St. Rep. 209; Bodfish v. Bodfish, 105 Mass. 319.

There was, however, other testimony to the effect that water was conveyed to the 160-acre tract from the ditch in the year 1916. And from the entire evidence the court remained well within its discretion in finding that the defendants claimed and exercised the right to use the ditch openly and continuously and uninterruptedly and in hostility to the claim of the plaintiff for a period of over five years immediately preceding the date of the commencement of this action. Metzner, it is true, testified that he had no knowledge of the use of the ditch by Chaney and his successors in interest, and had no means of ascertaining whether the ditch was being so used; but he also testified that he had instructed the foreman of the plaintiff having charge of the distribution of the water flowing in the ditch to watch and report if any attempt was made to irrigate the 160-acre tract from the company's ditches. But, notwithstanding this instruction, as the evidence shows, the employees of the appellant who had charge of the ditches and the distribution of the water thereof continued, during the prescriptive period, to supply water for the 160-acre tract through the ditch in question. Furthermore, it was shown that Cox, Sr., who was a director of the company at the time, had a conversation with Chaney after the latter had purchased the 160-acre tract, and that said Cox stated to Chaney that the company was anxious that he should put the land into alfalfa as soon as possible. It was also shown, as we have seen, that Cox, Jr., was often near the 160-acre tract after the sale thereof to Chaney, accompanied generally by persons to whom he desired to sell subdivisions of the plaintiff's tract. From all this and the fact that water was actually supplied to the 160-acre tract by means of the main ditch during every year from 1912 to 1918, inclusive, the court could well have concluded that if it was true that the appellant had no knowledge of the use of the easement by Chaney and his successors in interest, it certainly had ready means for ascertaining the fact. But, under all the circumstances of the case as they were developed at the trial, it is hardly reasonable to believe that the appellant did not know at all times that its ditches were being used by the several owners of the 160-acre tract. Indeed, the knowledge of Cox, Jr., the secretary, and also that of its several foremen, whose special business or duty it was to distribute the water flowing through the main ditch to those entitled thereto, that the ditch was being used by Chaney and his successors, was the knowledge of that fact of the appellant itself, since not only said Cox as secretary, but also said foremen, were the agents of appellant with full power to act for it in all the matters committed to them by the plaintiff.

But it is further argued that, from the fact that the owner in the year 1915 installed a pumping plant on the 160-acre tract, capable, as is the claim of irrigating the entire acreage, and from the further fact that a tenant in 1916 asked permission of the company to irrigate the tract from its ditches, the irresistible conclusion is, and the court should have so found, that the appellant could not have known, nor did it have any reason to believe, that the 160-acre tract was being supplied with water conveyed through the company's ditches. But there is no showing here that the appellant had any knowledge of the existence of the establishment of the pumping plant; and the fact that a tenant of the owner of the land in 1916 asked permission of the company to irrigate said land from its ditches would not necessarily show that said ditches had not been used or were not being used for the purpose of conveying water to the lands of the defendants, or that the appellant did not know that they were being so used. At any rate, the trial court, it seems, did not attach any significance to the circumstances here referred to, concluding, as we may presume, and as it had a right to do, that the other facts and circumstances in the case, tending to show the continuous and uninterrupted use of the easement, were sufficient to overcome the probative effect of any facts or circumstances leading to an opposite conclusion upon the question of adverse user.

[11] Lastly, we may briefly consider the point, made at the threshold of appellant's argument, that the defense based on the license and that of title to the easement by adverse user are inconsistent, in that possession by license is not adverse and cannot ripen into a title. If the license were revocable there would no doubt be force in that contention; but, as we have shown, the license became irrevocable, and it was within the right of defendants to set up either or both of the said defenses as the basis of their title to the easement. The situation is no different from a case where a party, suing to quiet title to land, would set up and prove a conventional title thereto and at the same time title by adverse possession. Porters Bar Dredging Co. v. Beaudry, 15 Cal. App. 751, 763, 115 Pac. 951. It follows, also, that there is no inconsistency between the findings and the conclusions of law for the reason suggested.

We have discovered no substantial reason for disturbing the judgment herein, and it is accordingly affirmed.

DYMENT v. BOARD OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA
et al. (Civ. 3677.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 5, 1922. Rehearing Denied May 3, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 1, 1922.)

1. Physicians and surgeons § 11(3)—Charge physician had obtained license to practice by fraud not sufficiently specific.

A charge that petitioner had procured his certificate to practice medicine through fraud and misrepresentation without a statement of the facts constituting the fraud is not sufficiently specific to sustain an order of the board of medical examiners revoking petitioner's certificate under St. 1913, p. 732, § 14, as amended by St. 1917, p. 109, § 9.

2. Physicians and surgeons § 11(3)—Procedure in trial before medical board need not be technical.

The procedure in trials before medical boards for revocation of a license to practice medicine need not, either as to pleadings or evidence, be marked by the refinements and subtleties which are characteristic of the conduct of actions in courts of law.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

3. Pleading ⚡8(15)—General allegation of fraud in obtaining physician's certificate insufficient.

A general charge, alleging fraud and misrepresentation without stating the facts on which it is based, is insufficient.

4. Physicians and surgeons ⚡11(3)—Board need not determine sufficiency of charges before hearing.

The board of medical examiners need not, before the hearing, determine the sufficiency of charges against a physician whose license is sought to be revoked.

5. Physicians and surgeons ⚡11(3)—Objection to sufficiency of charges unnecessary to review on certiorari.

Though a physician may question the sufficiency of charges before the hearing for the revocation of his license, his failure to do so does not give the board power or jurisdiction to revoke the certificate if the charges are in fact insufficient, and if the board enters an order revoking his certificate the physician may maintain certiorari to have it annulled for want of jurisdiction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Application by Philip Dyment against the Board of Medical Examiners of the State of California and the members of the board for a writ to review an order of the board revoking petitioner's license to practice medicine. From a judgment affirming the order of the board, petitioner appeals. Reversed, with directions to annul the order of the board.

L. E. Dadmun, of San Diego, for appellant.

Harry A. Encell, of San Francisco, and Frank M. Smith, and Charles D. Ballard, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, J. On December 21, 1917, respondent board of medical examiners of the state of California issued to petitioner a certificate authorizing him to practice medicine and surgery. The document was of the kind known as a reciprocity certificate; that term being applied to a certificate issued without examination, under section 13 of the Medical Practice Act (Stats. 1913, p. 722, as amended Stats. 1917, p. 107) upon the production by an applicant for leave to practice medicine and surgery in California of a license certificate issued by the medical board of a sister state. Section 14 of the same act as amended (Stats. 1917, p. 109) authorizes the board of medical examiners to revoke any certificate issued by it when procured by the fraud and misrepresentation of the applicant. On August 30, 1920, there was filed with the board a complaint that petitioner had procured his reciprocity certificate through fraud and misrepresentation, and, after steps taken to acquire jurisdiction over petitioner and on October 19, 1920, the board made its order revoking the certificate. Thereafter petitioner applied to the superior court for a writ of review in the premises, and it was issued. Upon a hearing pursuant to the writ judgment was rendered, affirming the order of the board, and petitioner appeals from the judgment.

In response to the complaint filed with the medical board appellant presented to that body a letter signed by himself in which, among other things, it is said:

"The said Philip Dyment hereby demurs to the charges in the complaint. * * * Said demurrer is to the effect that the complaint is deficient in that it is not sufficiently definite and specific. * * * Inasmuch as section 14, chapter 354, of the Statutes of 1913 set out twelve distinct and separate definitions of 'unprofessional conduct,' the defendant Philip Dyment demands to know and has a right to know which particular statute he is accused of violating and how. If on receipt of such amended charges and specifications I find that the charges are then sufficiently definite, specific, and sufficient to warrant a proper defense, I will make my answer according to the provisions of said section 14."

This letter was plainly effective as a demurrer to the complaint, but the medical board, going forward upon the theory that only an answer on the facts under oath was permissible under the statute, proceeded in the absence of appellant to try the charges against him as upon a default and after the time fixed by the statute for answering had elapsed, with the result that the certificate of appellant was revoked as already stated. The board never at any time passed upon the demurrer.

Appellant contends that he had the right to demur to the complaint, and that the medical board had no jurisdiction to proceed under the charge against him without a ruling upon the demurrer which he presented. Respondents, on the contrary, insist that the right to demur does not exist in the case of such proceedings as that instituted before respondent medical board against appellant. It is true that the enactment regulating such proceedings does not provide for demurrers. As the statute stood at the time the charge against appellant was pending (Stats. 1917, p. 109), one against whom complaint was made before the board was required to "file his written answer, under oath, within 20 days next after the service on him" of the citation provided for in the act. This is far from meaning, however, that such a person might not demur, or might not by some other method object to the sufficiency of the written charge lodged against him. The right to present such a question in every form of action or proceeding, whether civil, criminal, or quasi criminal is practically universal under the genius of Anglo-Saxon institutions, if not under all systems for the administration of justice. It may almost be said to be a natural right, for the idea that a man may be brought to trial upon an insufficient charge is opposed to the sense of justice inherent in the human breast. This fact has found tacit recognition in many cases in which proceedings such as that pressed against appellant before the medical board have been brought in question in the courts. The regularly constituted judicial tribunals have uniformly considered the question of the legal sufficiency of complaints making such charges whenever the point has been presented to them under writs of review or in kindred proceedings (Munk v. Frink, 75 Neb. 172, 106 N. W. 425; Board of Medical Examiners v. Eisen, 61 Or. 492, 123 Pac. 52; Richardson v. Simpson, 88 Kan. 684, 129 Pac. 1128, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 911; Freeman v. State Board, 54 Okl. 531, 154 Pac. 56, L. R. A. 1918D, 436; State Board v. Jordan, 92 Wash. 234, 158 Pac. 982); the courts of our own state being among those which have held this attitude (Lanterman v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 472, 172 Pac. 625; Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 247, 187 Pac. 965). If such a question is to arise concerning these complaints—and we have already said that upon principles inherent to the administration of justice it must arise—the place for its initial presentation is before the tribunal with which the complaint is originally lodged. If a charge against a physician is made to a board of medical examiners, it is due the board that the question of the sufficiency of the complaint be ascertained at once, rather than after the proceeding has been terminated before the board and has gone to the courts, with the possible result that the board's order of revocation is annulled because of defects in the charge. A solution of the question before the board is equally due the practitioner complained against. The settlement of the point while the proceeding is yet before the initial tribunal will not only conduce to a more speedy administration of justice in the interest of all concerned—and the interest of the general public in such a question is far from negligible—but it will conduce to a great saving of expense to those directly interested. We conclude that appellant had the right to test the sufficiency of the complaint against him while the proceeding was yet before the board, either by demurrer or after some other method, and that the board was in error in proceeding to a hearing on the facts without passing upon the demurrer which was interposed by appellant. Because of the conclusion reached by us on the point next to be considered, we need not express an opinion upon the question whether, in cases in which a complaint is finally determined to be sufficient, a respondent in such a proceeding must have filed his answer under oath at the same time with his demurrer, or, at least, within the 20 days fixed by statute for answer, or suffer default upon the overruling of the demurrer.

[1] Appellant contends not only that he had the right to demur to the complaint against him filed with the medical board, but that the demurrer should have been sustained. This is the only remaining point made by appellant which we shall consider. The complaint fails to state the facts constituting the fraud and misrepresentation by means of which it is alleged that appellant procured his reciprocity certificate. The averment is that the person making the complaint "charges Philip Dymont with having been guilty of unprofessional conduct by violating section 14 of chapter 354 of the Statutes of 1913 and acts amendatory thereof of the state of California, in that he (Philip Dymont) procured by fraud and misrepresentation a certificate to practice medicine and surgery in the state of California." We are of the opinion that the complaint is insufficient.

[2] It is of course, needless to cite authorities upon the proposition that neither as to pleadings nor as to evidence must the procedure in trials before medical boards be marked by the refinements and subtleties which are characteristic of the conduct of actions in courts of law. The cases upon this point are both uniform and numerous. Still, giving to the rule its full scope, a complaint in such a proceeding must give an alleged erring practitioner such notice of the nature of the charge against him as will enable him to formulate a defense. Munk v. Frink, supra; Richardson v. Simpson, supra; Freeman v. State Board, supra. This the complaint now before us does not do. It is probably not possible to conceive of the many different practices by means of which an applicant fraudulently might procure the issuance to him of a certificate licensing him to practice medicine and surgery, and a complaint against him for having brought such an attempt to fruition ought to notify him of the specific acts committed by him in the attempt.

The work done by the medical boards of the various states in purging the ranks of the medical profession of quacks and charlatans is a most commendable one. The public interest demands the prosecution of that work with vigor, dispatch, and thoroughness and without undue interference by the courts. It is equally important, however, that no man be brought to trial, even before a medical board, upon a charge which does not notify him of the nature of the offense attempted to be pleaded against him.

It is due the California medical board in the present instance to observe that the body acted under legal advice at all stages of the proceeding before it, and it is not surprising that the views of its counsel should have been followed. We, however, cannot be satisfied that the advice given was sound.

Judgment reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment annulling the order made by the board of medical examiners of the state of California by which the reciprocity certificate of appellant was revoked, and directing the board to take such further proceedings as it may be advised to take in the proceeding against appellant pending before it, all in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; CRAIG, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [3] We are satisfied with the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal that the complaint made to the board of medical examiners is not in law a sufficient charge of unprofessional conduct to give the board jurisdiction to revoke the certificate or license authorizing the appellant to practice medicine. It contains no specific allegations of fact, but merely states that he "procured by fraud and misrepresentation a certificate to practice medicine." Such method of charging fraud has always been held insufficient; the specific facts must be stated. 9 Ency. of Pl. & Prac. 686; 31 Cyc. 55.

[4] But we do not agree with the theory that it was necessary for the board to determine the sufficiency of that complaint prior to the time of the hearing thereof. The act does not contemplate a formal method of procedure. The person charged may at the hearing object either formally or informally to the sufficiency of the complaint.

[5] But, whether he does or not, the complaint must be sufficient in its statement of facts to show actual unprofessional conduct by the person charged, or it will not give the board power or jurisdiction to revoke his certificate, and if a revocation is ordered on such a complaint the holder thereof may maintain a proceeding in certiorari to have it annulled for the want of jurisdiction of the board to make the order, as well where he did not make the objection to the board as where he did object.

The petition for a rehearing in the Supreme Court is denied.

OVERLAND PUB. CO. v. UNION LITHOGRAPH CO. et al. (Civ. 4127.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 18, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 15, 1922.)

1. Monopolies ⇨12(2) — Agreement to sell labor only to certain class held legal.

Under St. 1907, p. 984, as amended by St. 1909, p. 594, providing that labor, skilled or unskilled, is not a commodity, an agreement of printing associations to sell their labor only to persons coming within a certain class was legal, and involves no restraint of trade.

2. Constitutional law ⇨88—Right of laborer to work or refuse to work for any man or class of men inviolate.

It is the right of every man to engage to work for or to deal with, or to refuse to work for or to deal with, any man or class of men as he sees fit, whatever his motive or whatever the resulting injury, without in any way being held accountable therefor.

3. Monopolies ⇨24(1), 28—Agreement to sell labor only to certain class not ground for injunctive relief or recovery of damages.

Where printing associations entered into an agreement providing that they would sell their labor only to persons coming within a designated class is not ground for injunctive relief or for damages.

4. Monopolies ⇨28—Special damages resulting from practices in restraint of trade must be pleaded.

An action cannot be maintained against an association because of the attempt to restrain competition among its own members without pleading and proving special damages to the business or property of the plaintiff.

5. Monopolies ⇨24(1)—No right to injunction for injury by monopoly, but plaintiff may recover double damages.

St. 1907, p. 984, as amended by St. 1909, p. 594, gives no right to injunctive relief to a private person in the violation of the provisions of the act, but such person is merely given the right to recover double damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; H. M. Owens, Judge.

Suit by the Overland Publishing Company, a corporation, against the Union Lithograph Company, a corporation, and others. From a judgment of the superior court denying an injunction and damages, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harry G. McKannay, of San Francisco, for respondents Union Lithograph Co. and others.

Heidelberg & Murasky, of San Francisco, for respondent unions.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against it entered after general demurrers to the complaint had been sustained. The complaint asks for injunctive relief and for damages; its allegations are lengthy and complex. In substance, they are as follows:

Plaintiff is a corporation doing business under the laws of California. Certain named defendants and some 200 others, whose names are unknown to plaintiff, composed an organization known as the "Printers' Board of Trade." Said association is formed for the purpose, among others (as set forth in its by-laws) "to investigate and check injurious trade practices, and encourage the opposite" in the business of printing and publishing, which is the business carried on by the several members of the association. Certain of the named defendants, together with about 1,300 others whose names are unknown to plaintiff, composed an association known as "S. F. Typographical Union No. 21." Certain named defendants and 500 other persons whose names are unknown to plaintiff compose an association of persons engaged in the business of printing pressmen and assistants known as the "S. F. Printing Pressmen & Assistants Union No. 24." Certain named defendants, with numerous other persons whose names are unknown to plaintiff, compose an association of persons engaged in the printing trades in the city and county of San Francisco under the name of "Franklin Printing Trades Association." The executive officers of each of these associations are also joined as defendants.

The complaint continues with allegations, in effect, as follows: That on or about March 1, 1920, plaintiff was engaged in the city and county of San Francisco in carrying on and doing business as a printer and publisher in said city and county, and had invested in its business capital in excess of $25,000, and had built up an established trade and employed on the average more than 25 persons in said business; that in the month of March, 1920, the said association known as "Printers' Board of Trade of San Francisco" caused an agent or representative of said association to approach the managing officers of plaintiff and to demand that plaintiff become a member of said board of trade; that plaintiff, for its own good reasons, declined to join said board of trade. On January 17, 1921, plaintiff received from said board of trade a written communication, signed by the secretary thereof, inviting plaintiff to become a member of said board of trade, and reciting that the monthly dues of members would amount to $2, plus $1 for each employee in plaintiff's composing room and press room. Plaintiff again advised the said board of trade that it did not desire to become a member thereof.

It is alleged that on November 23, 1920, a written agreement was entered into by and between the defendant association, "Franklin Printing Trades Association," and the association known as the "Printers' Board of Trade" (in said agreement referred to as the "Employers' Association") and the association known as the "S. F. Typographical Union No. 21." Said agreement is referred to as the "Typographical Agreement" and it is alleged that it provides, in paragraph fifth thereof, as follows:

"In order that the union may secure the adoption and carrying out by all commercial printing concerns within its jurisdiction of the scale of wages and working conditions herein specified, and have the responsibility of the employers for their observance and performance, the union requests and the employers hereby agree that the employers will admit to membership in their association all reputable printing concerns; and in consideration hereof, and of the assumption of the responsibility by the employers for any and all violations of said scale of wages and working conditions by every member of the employers, the union agrees that its members will work only for such printing concerns as are members of the employers, provided that the employers shall not arbitrarily, or for any but good cause, refuse admission to or deny retention of membership in the Employers' Association."

The complaint sets forth that during the years 1919 and 1920, the representatives of the printers' board of trade sought to induce plaintiff to join said board of trade and threatened to enforce the provisions of said Typographical Agreement above set forth and compel the members of said unions who were working for plaintiff to leave such employment. Plaintiff was also visited by representatives of the unions involved, who stated that if plaintiff did not join the association known as Printers' Board of Trade of San Francisco, the said two union associations would be compelled and would, in pursuance of paragraph 5 of said Typographical Agreement, order the withdrawal from the employ of plaintiff of all members of said two union associations. Plaintiff refused to join the printers' board of trade and the union employees left plaintiff's employ.

It is alleged that if plaintiff persists in its refusal to become a member of the printers' board of trade, the persons alleged to have quitted its employ will "refuse to resume work and refuse to longer continue in the employ of plaintiff"; "that without the co-operation of the aforesaid quitting members of said S. F. Typographical Union No. 21, it will be impossible, within a period of three or four days, for plaintiff to continue its printing and publishing operations." It is then alleged that plaintiff has on hand important large contracts for printing and is under written contract to publish certain magazines and periodicals and that time is of the essence of such contracts, and that by reason of the acts and things charged against the defendants, plaintiff will be prevented from carrying out said contracts, and will become liable in damages thereon.

There are also allegations to the effect that the unions involved here are members of the American Federation of Labor Unions, which controls a magazine with a wide circulation among its members and affords "a ready, convenient, powerful and effective vehicle for the dissemination of information as to persons, products and manufacturers boycotted or to be boycotted"; that "if the defendants * * * continue in the course which they have consummated and threatened of boycotting this plaintiff and advising others to boycott plaintiff, it will result in the very great injury of plaintiff."

[1] We shall pause here in our enumeration of the allegations of the complaint so as to consider the effect of those already set forth. The Typographical Agreement, in so far as it is set forth in the complaint, is one which is perfectly legal and involves no restraint of trade. Provisions substantially the same as those pleaded herein were considered in the case of People v. Epstein, 102 Misc. Rep. 476, 170 N. Y. Supp. 68, 70. The agreement in that case was between the Photo-Engravers' Board of Trade of New York and members of a Photo-Engravers' Union. The reasoning of the court in that case is applicable in considering the portion of the Typographical Agreement before this court in the present case. The so-called Cartwright Act (Stats. 1907, p. 984, as amended by Stats. 1909, p. 594), upon which plaintiff relies in bringing this action, contains a provision that labor, whether skilled or unskilled, is not a commodity within the meaning of this act. The portion of the Typographical Agreement pleaded by plaintiff is a contract concerning labor. It is an agreement by the unions to sell their labor only to persons coming within a designated class.

[2] It is the right of every man to engage to work for or to deal with, or to refuse to work for or to deal with any man or class of men as he sees fit, whatever his motive or whatever the resulting injury, without being held in any way accountable therefor. Parkinson v. Bldg. Trades, 154 Cal. 581, 599, 98 Pac. 1027, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165; Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, 156 Cal. 70, 75, 103 Pac. 324. These rights may be exercised in association with others so long as they have no unlawful object in view. Parkinson v. Building Trades, supra, 154 Cal. at page 599, 98 Pac. 1027, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165. Thus, where building contractors and a group of workmen made an agreement which restricted the opportunities of a contractor not a party thereto, it was said that—

Though the business of the third party was interfered with, the courts could give no relief, since "the law could only make it possible for the complainant to do business in the way it chooses by compelling the defendants to do business in the way they did not choose."

* * * When equal rights clash, the law cannot interfere." National Fireproofing Co. v. Masons Bldrs. Ass'n, 169 Fed. 259, 94 C. C. A. 535, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 148.

In the case of Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, 156 Cal. 75, 103 Pac. 327, it was said:

"We think that to-day no court would question the right of an organized union of employees, by concerted action, to cease their employment (no contractual obligation standing in the way), and this action constitutes a 'strike.' We think, moreover, that no court questions the right of those men to cease dealing by concerted action, either socially or by way of business, with their former employer, and this latter act, in its essence, constitutes the primary boycott."

"The direct object or purpose of a combination furnishes the primary test of its legality. It is not every injury inflicted upon third persons in its operation that renders a combination unlawful. It is not enough to establish illegality in an agreement between certain persons to show that it works harm to others. An agreement entered into for the primary purpose of promoting the interests of the parties is not rendered illegal by the fact that it may, incidentally, injure third persons. * * * A laborer, as well as a builder, trader, or manufacturer, has the right to conduct his affairs in any lawful manner, even though he may thereby injure others. So several laborers and builders may combine for mutual advantage, and, so long as the motive is not malicious, the object not unlawful, nor oppressive, and the means neither deceitful nor fraudulent, the result is not a conspiracy, although it may necessarily work injury to other persons. The damage to such persons may be serious—it may even extend to their ruin—but if it is inflicted by a combination in the legitimate pursuit of its own affairs, it is damnum absque injuria." National Fireproofing Co. v. Mason Builders' Ass'n, 169 Fed. 259, 265, 94 C. C. A. 535, 541 (26 L. R. A. [N. S.] 148).

"An association of individuals may determine that its members shall not work for specified employers of labor. The question ever is as to its purpose in reaching such determination. If the determination is reached in good faith for the purpose of bettering the condition of its members and not through malice or otherwise to injure an employer the fact that such action may result in incidental injury to the employer does not constitute a justification for issuing an injunction against enforcing such action." Bossert v. Dhuy, 221 N. Y. 342, 359, 117 N. E. 582, 585 (Ann. Cas. 1918D, 661).

In this state, the doctrine has been announced even more broadly. In the case of Parkinson Co. v. Bldg. Trades Council, 154 Cal. at p. 599, 98 Pac. 1034, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165, it is said:

"In case of a peaceable and ordinary strike, without breach of contract, and conducted without violence, threats, or intimidation, this court would not inquire into the motives of the strikers—their acts being entirely lawful, their motives would be held immaterial.”

[3] In the light of the foregoing cases, we think it clear that in so far as the allegations of the complaint so far enumerated are concerned, they state no ground for either injunctive relief or for the recovery of damages.

But the complaint continues, in another section thereof, with allegations concerning the practices of the printers' board of trade. There are no allegations establishing a causal connection between the plaintiff's grievance, i. e., the withdrawal of the union printers and these averments regarding the methods of the printers' board of trade. The latter are made upon information and belief, and are substantially as follows: That said board now is and for more than three years last past has been engaged in “a combined scheme and effort to violate the laws of the state of California and of the United States of America in such case made and provided, by causing the prices of articles and services made and furnished by various members of the said Printers' Board of Trade of San Francisco, to be fixed grossly in excess of an amount that would yield to the persons making the charge and collecting said prices, a fair and reasonable profit”; that in pursuance of said scheme and effort various members composing the said printers' board of trade meet daily in the office of the said printers' board of trade in the city and county of San Francisco, and said board of trade requires that all of the new contracts and proposals for business involving an amount in excess of $15, then under submission to members of said Printers' Board of Trade of San Francisco, be reported and submitted at such meetings, and that, thereupon, by lot or agreement tentative prices are fixed upon said new contracts and it is likewise determined which member of the printers' board of trade shall perform the services or furnish the materials contemplated by such proposals or contracts; that thereupon all of the members other than the member so decided upon refrain from bidding for the doing of said work or the furnishing of said material except in an amount above the amount so fixed. It is alleged that by reason of these facts a person seeking to have work done or materials furnished is compelled to pay the price fixed as aforesaid by said members of said printers' board of trade; that said price so fixed is arrived at through corrupt, unjust, and illegal methods as aforesaid, practiced by said Printers' Board of Trade of San Francisco, and the person desiring the work or materials believes that the price so fixed is obtained as a result of competitive bidding; that as the result of said unjust and illegal practices aforesaid, competition between the members of said Printers' Board of Trade of San Francisco (which Board embraces practically 95 per cent. of the concerns engaged in the printing trade in the city and county of San Francisco) is destroyed and rendered impossible and that said acts constitute an unjust, discriminating and unlawful restraint upon trade and commerce, both intrastate and interstate.

Appellant contends that these allegations, if proven, constitute the Printers' Board of Trade a trust within the meaning of the so-called Cartwright Act. Act 4166, General Laws of California (1915) Deering; Stats. 1907, p. 984, as amended by Stats. 1909, p. 594. Conceding, for the purposes of this opinion that this be true, the said association would, in consequence, be subject to forfeiture of its charter rights, franchises, and privileges, and to dissolution upon proceedings taken by the Attorney General or the district attorney. Section 2, Stats. 1907, p. 984. But this is not such a proceeding. This is an action by a private corporation, and, as such, is governed by the provisions of section 11 of said act. In that section it is provided that an action may be brought by “any person who shall be injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation * * * by reason of anything forbidden” in said act.

“That by means of each and all of said acts done and threatened by the defendants aforesaid, respectively, as hereinbefore set forth, the trade and commerce of the plaintiff with its patrons and customers * * * has been and will continue to be forcibly suspended, and unless the relief hereinafter prayed shall be granted * * * plaintiff will lose valuable copyrights because of its inability to continue its usual operations; and that plaintiff by reason of the premises has suffered, and will suffer in an increasing degree, damages * * * in excess of $75,000”

—is insufficient. There is no allegation of the particulars in which the plaintiff has been or will be damaged by the restraint of competition among the members of the printers' board of trade. The only damage to plaintiff which is alleged, i. e., the loss of contracts, copyrights, etc., arises from the alleged inability of plaintiff to continue its operations, due to the fact that it cannot secure union labor. This matter we have disposed of in the first part of this opinion. We consider it damnum absque injuria. There is no allegation of loss to plaintiff arising because of the alleged practices of the printers' board of trade in restricting competition among its own members. On the contrary, it is perfectly apparent that plaintiff's business could not be injured by such practice, but must be benefited thereby. If, as plaintiff alleges, 95 per cent. of the persons engaged in the printing business voluntarily form an association and restrain themselves from competing with one another, plaintiff, being free from such restraint, has the fewer competitors with whom to contend. Indeed, plaintiff does not complain of loss or damage because of the want of competition among the members of the printers' board of trade, of which plaintiff is not a member. If plaintiff could secure union labor and continue to operate its business, the activities of the printers' board of trade in restricting competition among its own members would not injure plaintiff in the least. It is alleged that these practices have continued for three years. Apparently they have not injured plaintiff, but have probably meant to it a business opportunity. It is the withdrawal of the union labor and the consequent inability of plaintiff to operate its business in competition with the members of the printers' board of trade which is its real complaint.

[4] Plaintiff cannot maintain an action against the Printers' Board of Trade because of these alleged practices without pleading and proving special damages to his business or property by reason thereof. There are no facts alleged in the complaint showing damage to plaintiff because of said defendant's methods of doing business.

In the case of Munter v. Eastman Kodak Co., 28 Cal. App. 664, 153 Pac. 739, it is said:

"While, in a criminal prosecution against persons for maintaining a trust or combination in restraint of commerce or trade, the gist of the offense is in the formation and maintenance of such trust or combination, and the fact of the existence of the combination for the purpose of doing some prohibited act is all that need be proved to support and sustain the charge, yet, in a civil action for damages based upon our anti-trust statute, it is incumbent upon the complaining party, not only to allege and prove the existence of an unlawful trust or combination but also to allege and prove that his business or property has been injured by the very fact of the existence and prosecution of such unlawful trust or combination. Or, as was said by this court in Krigbaum v. Sbarbaro, 23 Cal. App. 427, 433 [138 Pac. 364]: 'To be "injured in business or property" within the contemplation of said law, as we understand it, is where the injury has directly resulted from the fact of the existence of the trust—that is to say, where the business or property has directly sustained injury solely by reason of the restrictions in trade or commerce which are fostered by such trust or combination. In other words, while one whose business or property has been injured solely because of the restrictions in trade carried out by a trust organized and maintained for that purpose may maintain an action under the provisions of the anti-trust law for double the damages he has actually suffered from the injury so inflicted, yet he could not maintain an action based upon said law if the injury, although directly the result of the wrongful acts of the trust or the constituent members thereof, did not arise by reason of the restrictions in trade or commerce carried out by such trust or combination.'"

[5] Furthermore, the statute gives no right to injunctive relief to a private person in a case of violation of the provisions of the act, but such a person is merely given a right to recover double damages. Section 11, Stats. 1907, p. 984, as amended Stats. 1909, p. 594. See, also, Natl. Fireproofing Co. v. Mason Builders' Ass'n, 169 Fed. 259, 94 C. C. A. 535, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 148.

The demurrers were properly sustained; the judgment is affirmed.

LOS ANGELES SHIPBUILDING & DRY-DOCK CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 3835.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 15, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 12, 1922.)

1. Admiralty ⚓10—Nature of work done test as to whether contract maritime.

In determining whether a contract be maritime, the test is, not locality, as in the case of torts, but the subject-matter of the contract, the nature of the work to be done.

2. Admiralty ⚓11—Contract to construct vessel nonmaritime.

A contract for the construction of a vessel is nonmaritime and not within admiralty jurisdiction.

3. Admiralty ⚓13—Marine machinist's services on uncompleted vessel lying in navigable waters not of maritime nature.

Where the general employment or activities of a marine machinist on an uncompleted vessel lying in navigable waters at the time of his injury had no direct relation to navigation or commerce, the services were not of a maritime nature.

4. Admiralty ⚓20—State cannot abolish rules of recovery for injury in maritime contract.

Where work is performed under a maritime contract, no state has power to abolish maritime rules concerning the measure of recovery, and substitute therefor indemnity under a workmen's compensation act.

5. Admiralty ⚓20—In nonmaritime contracts obligation to compensate employee for injury attaches.

Where a contract of employment is nonmaritime and the work is not of a maritime character, Workmen's Compensation Act fastens upon the relation of employer and employee the obligation to compensate for injuries received in the course of employment.

6. Master and servant — 346—Compensation Act imposes quasi ex contractu liability.

Liability imposed by the Workmen's Compensation Act may be described as quasi ex contractu; the law attaching, as an incident, to the relation of master and servant an obligation to compensate for injuries received in the course of employment.

Application of the Los Angeles Shipbuilding & Drydock Company against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California and another for certiorari to review an order awarding compensation for injuries. Award affirmed.

Louis M. Lissner, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is a proceeding in certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of one M. Toutain, a marine machinist who was injured while installing machinery in a vessel that was being constructed by Toutain's employer, the petitioner here. The vessel had never been in commission. It was an incomplete structure at the time of the injuries. It had, however, been launched and had been drawn up beside a dock for completion, where it was afloat and riding the navigable waters of Los Angeles Harbor at the time of the accident. Claiming that the commission's award was based upon a maritime tort, petitioner contends that the respective rights and duties of the parties must be determined and controlled by the maritime law, and that therefore the application of the California Workmen's Compensation Act would be an unauthorized invasion of the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts.

By article 3, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States the judicial power of the United States extends "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction."

The Judicial Code of the United States (40 Stats. at L. 395), by sections 24 and 256 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 991 [3], 1233), vests exclusive jurisdiction in the federal courts "of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it, and to claimants the rights and remedies under the Workmen's Compensation Law of any state." The concluding part of this saving clause, that which purports to save to claimants the rights and remedies afforded by a state workmen's compensation act, was added to the federal Judicial Code on October 6, 1917, by an amendment commonly known as the Johnson Amendment. In Southern Pacific

Co. v. Jensen, 244 U. S. 205, 37 Sup. Ct. 524, 61 L. Ed. 1086, L. R. A. 1918C, 451, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 900, and in Clyde Steamship Co. v. Walker, 244 U. S. 255, 37 Sup. Ct. 545, 61 L. Ed. 1116, it was decided that a state compulsory workmen's compensation act is opposed to the federal Constitution in so far as its terms apply to maritime injuries received in the performance of work of a maritime nature, performed in the course of employment under a maritime contract, and in Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Stewart, 253 U. S. 149, 40 Sup. Ct. 438, 64 L. Ed. 834, 11 A. L. R. 1145, it was decided that, in passing the Johnson Amendment, Congress transcended its constitutional power to legislate concerning rights and liabilities which are within the maritime jurisdiction, and that therefore the clause saving to claimants the rights and remedies under the Workmen's Compensation Law of any state is ineffective and void in so far as its operation might interfere with the characteristic harmony and uniformity of the law maritime in its interstate and international relations.

[1-3] It is earnestly urged by petitioner that the case at bar is within the doctrine of these decisions of the United States Supreme Court. In each of those cases the injury was received in the course of an employment under a maritime contract or while the injured servant was performing work of an essentially maritime character. In the instant case the injured employee was not engaged in the performance of a maritime contract, nor were his services of a maritime nature. In determining whether a contract be maritime the test is, not locality, as in the case of torts, but the subject-matter of the contract, the nature of the work to be done. Doey v. Clarence P. Howland Co., 224 N. Y. 30, 120 N. E. 53. A contract for the construction of a vessel is nonmaritime and not within the admiralty jurisdiction. Thames Towboat Co. v. Francis McDonald, 254 U. S. 242, 41 Sup. Ct. 65, 65 L. Ed. 245; Grant Smith-Porter Ship Co. v. Rhode, 257 U. S. —, 42 Sup. Ct. 157, 66 L. Ed. —. Although the uncompleted vessel upon which he was hurt was lying in navigable waters, Toutain's services were not of a maritime nature. Neither his general employment nor his activities at the time had any direct relation to navigation or commerce. Grant Smith-Porter Ship Co. v. Rhode, supra.

Notwithstanding Toutain's employment was nonmaritime, petitioner, assuming that the injury was the result of a maritime tort, argues that, because courts of admiralty have jurisdiction of claims for damages growing out of torts committed on navigable waters, it would destroy that uniformity which the federal Constitution was designed to accomplish in matters maritime if our state

Workmen's Compensation Law (St. 1913, p. 279, as amended by St. 1917, p. 831) were applied to such an injury. We are unable to agree with this contention. In our opinion this case is controlled by the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in Grant, etc., Ship Co. v. Rhode, supra, a case wherein it was alleged that the employee received his injuries as the result of a maritime tort, it being alleged that he was hurt by reason of his employer's negligence in constructing and maintaining a faulty scaffolding on a vessel afloat on navigable waters. In that case Rhode, as libellant, brought a suit on the admiralty side of the United States District Court to recover damages for injuries sustained by him while at work as a carpenter or joiner on a partially completed vessel lying at a dock in the Willamette river in the state of Oregon. The uncompleted vessel was lying in navigable waters at the time of the injuries. Negligence of the employer in the construction and maintenance of the scaffolding was alleged as ground for the recovery of damages. It was held that, though the general admiralty jurisdiction extends to a proceeding to recover damages resulting from a tort committed on a vessel lying on navigable waters within a state, nevertheless the exclusive features of the Oregon Workmen's Compensation Act are applicable to such a case, and that therefore the state statute abrogated the right to recover damages in an admiralty court which otherwise would have existed. In other words, it was held, in effect that where the work is nonmaritime and is done pursuant to a nonmaritime contract, the rights and liabilities of the parties have no direct relation to navigation, and need not be measured by those rules of the sea the uniform operation of which is essential to any general system of maritime law; and that therefore in such cases, and notwithstanding that the work is done on navigable waters, the remedy afforded by a state workmen's compensation act is the exclusive remedy, even though the injury may have been the result of the employer's maritime tort.

Because the Oregon Workmen's Compensation Act (Laws 1913, p. 188) is an elective statute, giving to both employers and workmen the option to except or reject its provisions, whereas our statute is compulsory, petitioner claims that the principle of the Rhode Case is not applicable here. With this contention we find ourselves unable to agree. In the first place, we fail to see any ground for the assumption that the award under review here was based upon a tort, maritime or nonmaritime. Nowhere in the record is there the slightest hint that the injury was the result of any negligence or fault. To entitle Toutain to the compensation provided for by our Workmen's Compensation Act it was not necessary that there should be any wrongful act or omission. That act allows compensation for all injuries arising out of employment irrespective of negligence or fault. The payments provided for by the act are founded simply upon the injury, and are entirely disconnected with any theory of fault on the part of the employer or right on the part of the employee established by law prior to the passage of the act, save in instances of "serious and willful misconduct." The basic principle of the act is that the cost of injuries incidental to modern industry should be treated as a part of the cost of production. That purpose is effected without the creation of a delictual liability. Doey v. Clarence, etc., Co., supra; Berton v. Dry Dock Co. (D. C.) 219 Fed. 765. See, also, Quong Ham Wah Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 184 Cal. 35, 192 Pac. 1021, 12 A. L. R. 1190.

[4, 5] But as we understand the doctrine of the Rhode Case, it matters not whether the injury be the result of a tort—a delictual omission or commission—or whether it happened without any fault on the part of the employer. Nor is it a matter of moment that the state Compensation Act be either elective or compulsory. Where, as in the Jensen, Walker, and Stewart Cases, the servant is injured while performing work of a maritime nature, or while employed under a maritime contract, the parties must be deemed to have contracted with each other in contemplation of the general system of maritime law and with the knowledge that their respective rights and liabilities would be measured and defined by that law. And since it was the design of the federal Constitution to preserve a proper harmony and uniformity in the maritime law, it follows that where work is performed under a maritime contract no state has power to abolish the well-recognized maritime rules concerning the measure of recovery and substitute therefor the indemnity that is afforded by a workmen's compensation act. But where, as in the case before us, the contract of employment is nonmaritime, and the work is not of a maritime character, the Workmen's Compensation Law fastens upon the relation of employer and employee the obligation to compensate for injuries received in the course of employment. North Alaska Salmon Co. v. Pillsbury, 174 Cal. 1, 162 Pac. 93, L. R. A. 1917E, 642; Quong Ham Wah Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra. The contract being nonmaritime, the parties must be deemed to have entered into it with the knowledge that the law has attached to their relation of master and servant an obligation to pay the statutory compensation for any injury which may be received in the course of the employment. In Doey v. Clarence, etc., Co., supra, the New York Court of Appeals, speaking of the Workmen's Compensation Law of that state, says that an award under that law is made "upon the theory that the statute giving the commission power to make an award is read into and becomes a part of the contract."

[6] It is true that in no strict sense does the obligation of the employer to compensate the employee for injuries spring from the contract of employment as a contractual obligation. Ours is a compulsory statute, and the proposition that a compulsory statute is a contract has been definitely repudiated in this state. North Alaska Salmon Co. v. Pillsbury, supra. The liability imposed by the statute is in a class by itself. For want of a better term it may be described as quasi ex contractu. Quong Ham Wah Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra. But though the parties do not contract to create the rights and liabilities which are prescribed by the statute, nevertheless, if their contract be nonmaritime, as in the instant case, there is no reason why it may not be deemed to have been entered into with reference to the state statute—with a knowledge that, to the relation of master and servant which is created by the contract, the law attaches, as an incident to that status, an obligation to compensate for injuries received in the course of the employment. This being so, the following excerpt from the Rhode Case is applicable here:

"In each of them [the Jensen, Stewart, and other decisions of the federal Supreme Court] the employment or contract was maritime in nature, and the rights and liabilities of the parties were prescribed by general rules of maritime law essential to its proper harmony and uniformity. Here the parties contracted with reference to the state statute; their rights and liabilities had no direct relation to navigation, and the application of the local law cannot materially affect any rules of the sea whose uniformity is essential."

The award is affirmed.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is a proceeding in certiorari to review the award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of one J. M. Bush. The facts are similar to those stated in the opinion filed this day in Los Angeles Shipbuilding & Drydock Company v. Industrial Accident Commission et al. (Cal. App. No. 3835) 207 Pac. 417. The opinion in that case disposes of the fundamental questions involved here and the award of the commission is therefore affirmed.

ROACH BROS. & CO. v. LACTEIN FOOD CO. (Civ. 2426.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 18, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 15, 1922.)

1. Pleading §248(4)—Amendments to complaint by buyer of goods more fully explaining contract held not to change cause of action.

In an action by a buyer of goods against a seller on a contract, where it would have been proper and competent to have proved all the terms of the contract under the general issue as framed by the pleadings originally filed, amendments to the complaint based upon the contract, and containing averments which more elaborately explained the terms of the contract, and specifically referring to matters involved therein, which were not so referred to in the original complaint, did not change the cause of action or introduce new issues.

2. Pleading §250—Damages asked in amended complaint may be larger than those asked in original complaint.

A party suing for damages for any tort may ask for a larger amount of damages in his amended complaint than in the original complaint.

3. Sales §81(5)—Refusal to supply goods contracted for held a breach of contract.

Where a contract for the sale of goods called for the sale of all the seller's surplus goods in such amounts as the buyer might require for the space of a year, the refusal of the seller to supply the buyer with goods in the required quantity on demand, when the seller had such a quantity of goods, was a breach of the contract.

4. Sales §151—Letter held to be a repudiation in toto of contract of sale.

Where a contract called for the sale of all a seller's surplus goods of a certain kind that a buyer should order for one year, a letter from the seller to the buyer, written after the buyer had sent a second order for goods, stating that the seller would not allow the buyer to sell the goods in certain territory according to their first contract, was a repudiation in toto of the contract, and not merely a refusal to supply the goods called for in the second order.

5. Sales §418(7)—Loss of profits on an article sold, but not delivered, not recoverable where no allegation they could not be bought in open market.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 3300, 3308, as to damages for breach of contract, and section 3354, providing that the value of property to a buyer or owner, deprived of its possession, is the price at which he might have bought an equivalent thing in the market, in buyer's action for seller's refusal to deliver, in which plaintiff did not allege that the goods bought could not be purchased in the open market, he could not recover the amount of profits lost by him through such default.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by Roach Bros. & Co., a corporation, against the Lactein Food Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Dennett & Zion, of Modesto, and H. A. Stout, of Oakland, for appellant.

E. B. Mering, of San Francisco, and T. B. Scott, of Modesto, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action for damages for the breach of a certain contract, alleged to have been entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant.

The defendant was, for a long time prior to and at the time of the making of the contract declared upon in the complaint, engaged in the business of manufacturing condensed buttermilk, known as "Lactein," or "Hen and Hog Buttermilk," in the city of Modesto, Stanislaus county. It was alleged in the complaint as originally filed that, on the 30th day of April, 1919, said plaintiff and said defendant entered into an agreement which was to continue one year from said date, and whereby the defendant granted to said plaintiff the exclusive option to purchase all the surplus "Hen and Hog Buttermilk" in certain designated amounts and sizes, and for certain prices. It was alleged in said complaint that said agreement was in writing, and was duly executed and delivered by said parties; that thereafter, pursuant to said agreement, the defendant delivered to the plaintiff one carload of said Lactein, and that plaintiff accepted and paid for the same; that thereafter plaintiff demanded that said defendant deliver said Lactein according to the terms of said agreement, but that defendant refused to deliver said Lactein, and "further refused to be bound by said agreement, and all without just cause or reason." There was no direct allegation in the complaint, in its original draft, stating the number of carloads of said Lactein with which the defendant agreed to supply the plaintiff, notwithstanding which omission said complaint further alleged that, "Had said defendant delivered said 19 carloads of said Lactein or Hen and Hog Buttermilk, the value of said Lactein or Hen and Hog Buttermilk to the plaintiff herein would have been $27,360; that, by reason of said refusal of said defendant to carry out said contract, said plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $4,408, the excess of said value over said purchase price," for which sum judgment is prayed.

The defendant, answering the complaint, and after certain formal denials, admitted that the contract referred to in the complaint was entered into between the parties on the day therein named, and that under said contract the defendant was to furnish said plaintiff for a period of one year from the date of said agreement Hen and Hog Buttermilk, at the prices set forth in the complaint, on the condition, however, that said defendant had the product on hand to sell to the said plaintiff; admitted delivering one carload of Hen and Hog Buttermilk to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff accepted and paid for the same; admitted that the plaintiff demanded another carload of Hen and Hog Buttermilk, but denied that plaintiff demanded any Lactein, and admitted that defendant refused to deliver said material, giving as the reason therefor that the plaintiff violated the terms of the contract, and so surrendered its rights under the same, as follows: That among the terms of said agreement the retail price thereof was to be $15.10 for 52-gallon barrels, but that plaintiff sold said material at prices lower than the prices so agreed upon, and that it did "actually sell one carload of said Hen and Hog Buttermilk at a price so far below the prices set forth in said contract that the defendant could not deliver the same without great loss"; that said agreement provided that said plaintiff was not to sell or deliver said material to any person or firm purchasing Lactein from the said defendant, but "after the delivery of said carload said defendant sold a carload of said Hen and Hog Buttermilk to the agent (of defendant) for the sale of Lactein in the county of Sacramento, state of California," in violation of the terms of said agreement.

Plaintiff later filed an amendment to the complaint, alleging, among other things, that the defendant was organized as a corporation on the 1st day of March, 1918, by M. P. Long, E. H. Zion, and J. R. Gilbert; that the capital stock of said corporation was 2,500 shares, of the par value of $10 each; that 2,410 shares of said stock were issued, of which 1,007 were issued to J. R. Gilbert; that said Gilbert on the day of the organization of said corporation sold and transferred to certain persons in Modesto 407 shares of said stock at the price of $10 per share; that at all times herein mentioned the market value of said stock was $10 per share; that said Lactein Company, on the 30th day of April, 1919, had on hand a surplus of about 600 barrels of Lactein or Hen and Hog Buttermilk, "and were then accumulating said Lactein at the rate of 250 barrels per month, all of which they were unable to dispose of"; that on said date W. B. Gilbert was the president of the plaintiff, and that "said defendant was anxious to secure the assistance of said plaintiff to dispose of said surplus Lactein, and said plaintiff was desirous of securing a contract with said defendant for the sale of said Lactein."

It was then alleged that the parties on the 30th day of April, 1919, entered into a verbal contract whereby the defendant granted to plaintiff an exclusive option to purchase all the surplus Hen and Hog Buttermilk for the prices and on the terms stated in the complaint as originally drawn. It further alleged in said amendment that plaintiff "has drawn up and annexed hereto, marked 'Exhibit A', the verbal contract as made by the parties, and as intended by the parties. The same is made a part hereof." It was alleged that the prices designated were to be for carload lots of 30,000 pounds minimum capacity, and the purchase price was to be paid in cash within 10 days of date of shipment, less 2 per cent. discount for cash; that defendant further "agreed to secure the entire present output of buttermilk and other milk products of the Newman Creamery, and convert the same into Hen and Hog Buttermilk, and hold the same subject to the above option"; that it was expressly understood and agreed and a part of the consideration of the agreement that "said defendant should purchase and pay for at least 20 carloads of said product during the first year, and that all the covenants and provisions therein contained were mutual, and the promises and agreements of the one party are in consideration of the promises and agreements of the other party herein."

It was further alleged that, at the time of the making of said contract, "L. L. Dennett was the regular counsel of the defendants and was in their employ; that at said time said L. L. Dennett was not the counsel for the plaintiff herein, and was not in its employ; that in the making of said contract W. B. Gilbert acted as representative of the plaintiff; that said L. L. Dennett was not in the employ of W. B. Gilbert, nor was he his counsel: that it was mutually agreed between the parties that said L. L. Dennett should reduce said contract to writing; that thereafter said L. L. Dennett drew up an agreement which was executed by the plaintiff and the defendant; that a copy of said agreement is hereto annexed, marked 'Exhibit B,' and is made a part of the amendment to the complaint." It was further alleged that plaintiff agreed to procure for said defendant the 600 shares of stock of the Lactein Food Company then held by said J. R. Gilbert, and cause the same to be sold and transferred to said defendant for the sum of $3,500. It was also alleged that the Hen and Hog Buttermilk to be furnished by the plaintiff to the defendant should be equal in every respect to the product then and thereafter made by said defendant, and sold under the trade name of "Lactein," and also that said product should be sold by said plaintiff under the name of "Hen and Hog Buttermilk," and that the business was to be carried on by plaintiff with buyers under the name of "Dairy Products Company." It was alleged that said contract executed by the parties failed to express the actual agreement of the parties in the following particulars: First, it fails to set forth the surplus milk that plaintiff was to receive; second, it fails to grant unto plaintiff the option to purchase any milk; third, it fails to mention the covenant of the defendant to secure the milk from the Newman Creamery and subject the same to the option of the plaintiff; fourth, it fails to set forth the covenant of the plaintiff to secure for the defendant the stock in the Lactein Food Company.

The allegations in the complaint as originally drafted, to the effect that the defendant, in pursuance of said contract, delivered to plaintiff and plaintiff accepted and paid for one carload of Lactein, and that on or about the 12th day of May, 1919, plaintiff demanded one carload of said Lactein, and that defendant refused to deliver the same, and "then and there gave notice that it would not perform said contract nor be bound by the same," were repeated in the amendment to the complaint. It is alleged that plaintiff "has at all times been ready, willing, and able to accept and pay for said Lactein according to the terms of said contract." It is further alleged (paragraph 10) that, "pursuant to the terms of said verbal contract, this plaintiff did, on or about the 30th day of April, 1919, cause to be transferred to defendant said 600 shares of stock in said defendant company, and said company paid therefor said $3,500, according to the terms of said verbal contract."

The prayer of the complaint as amended prays for "judgment of the court that said contract be reformed so as to conform to the form attached to this amendment to the complaint, and for such and other further relief as, considering the premises, is meet and proper, and for costs."

A second amendment to the complaint was filed, in which it was alleged, among other things, after formally realleging paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 9, and 10 of the amendment to the complaint:

"Paragraph 3. That the average carload according to said contract and as demanded by the market was made up as follows: 80 52-gallon barrels or not less than 40 52-gallon barrels, 20 25-gallon barrels, 30 10-gallon barrels, and 50 5-gallon barrels; that under the terms of said contract said defendant could have produced for this plaintiff 100 carloads of the above average of Lactein during said first year of said contract and plaintiff could have disposed of the whole thereof; that, according to the terms of said contract, the amount that would have been due and payable to defendant for said 100 carloads of Lactein would have been $120,800; that the value of said 100 carloads of Lactein to this plaintiff would have been $144,000.

"Paragraph 4. That by reason of said refusal of said defendant to carry out said contract said plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $23,200, the excess of said value over said purchase price."

Judgment is asked for the last stated amount. The defendant demurred to the amendment and second amendment to the complaint and moved to strike out certain averments contained therein, the demurrers being overruled, and the motions denied. Thereupon it answered the allegations of said amendments, embodying in the answers denials and admissions contained in the answers to the complaint as originally filed, and meeting such other new matter as the second amendment to the complaint contained either by way of denial, admission, or special defense.

We have presented above an extended statement of the averments of the several pleadings filed by the plaintiff for two particular reasons, to wit: First, because therein the terms of the contract, for the breach of which the plaintiff brought this action, are quite fully stated, thereby making it unnecessary to reproduce the contract itself herein; and, second, because it is claimed, as we shall later see, that the effect of the amendments to the complaint was to state a new and different cause of action, based upon an entirely different contract from that pleaded in the complaint as originally filed.

The court, among other things, found that paragraph 5 of the amendment to the complaint does not express the terms of the agreement, but that the terms of the agreement as actually made by the parties are set forth in the contract designated as "Exhibit B," and made a part of the amendment to the complaint; that, if the defendant had delivered 19 carloads, as provided by the terms of said contract, there would have been due and unpaid the defendant the sum of $18,401.50; that the value of said 19 carloads of Lactein to the plaintiff would have been $22,201.50; that by the refusal of defendant to deliver said 19 carloads of Lactein plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $3,800; that the allegations of paragraph 7 of the amendment to the complaint, to the effect that the contract executed by the parties fails to express their actual agreement in the particulars above indicated, are untrue; that paragraph 8, alleging certain prices which the plaintiff agreed to pay per barrel for said Lactein, the cost of Lactein to the defendant, the net profit to the defendant by the sale of the Lactein to the plaintiff under the contract, and that "the surplus of the Modesto plant was 250 barrels per month, and the production in addition to this surplus after the contract with the Newman Creamery Company was made, would give an additional surplus of 600 barrels per month," is untrue; that paragraph 10 of the answer to the complaint, as originally filed alleging that the refusal of defendant to deliver said material to said plaintiff was due to certain breaches of the contract by the plaintiff, is untrue. As to the second amendment to the complaint, the court finds that the allegation of paragraph 2, to the effect that, "by the judgment of this court in the amendment to the complaint in this action, said court has reformed said contract, and declared the contract set forth herein to be the reformed contract of the said parties," is untrue; that paragraphs 3 and 4 are true. As conclusions of law the court declared that the written contract annexed to the complaint, and marked "Exhibit B," "is the true contract executed by the parties; that by said contract the plaintiff was bound to receive 20 carloads of Hen and Hog Buttermilk, and also the defendant was bound to furnish the same; that defendant furnished one car and refused to furnish more, and that, by reason of said refusal, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $3,800."

Judgment was entered accordingly, and from said judgment the defendant prosecutes this appeal, supporting the same by a record prepared according to the alternative method.

The defendant urges six specific and different points, any one of which, it is claimed, will, if found tenable, require a reversal of the judgment.

Our conclusion is that the judgment must be reversed, for the reason that the court, as a basis for the relief awarded the plaintiff for the alleged breach of the contract, adopted an erroneous measure of damages. We are, though, of the opinion that the other points, in so far as they may be regarded as affecting or impairing the validity of the judgment, are devoid of substantial merit; yet, in view of a new trial, we think that two of these should be briefly noticed herein, viz.: First, that a new and different cause of action from that stated in the complaint as originally filed is set up in the amendments to the complaint; second, that there was no breach of the agreement for the reason that, as is the claim, there was no time specified at which the material should be furnished to plaintiff, and that, therefore, it was within the discretion of the defendant to furnish the material at any time during the year that the contract was to exist.

[1] 1. The cause of action stated in the original complaint was based upon a breach of a contract whereby the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff and the plaintiff agreed to purchase from the defendant a certain amount of Hen and Hog Buttermilk during the year commencing with the 30th day of April, 1919, at certain specified prices. The amendments to the complaint were based upon said contract, although the averments thereof more elaborately explain the terms of the convention. This, however, did not have the effect of changing the cause of action or of introducing issues into the case which were not there by virtue of the complaint as originally filed. It is true that the amendments to the complaint specifically referred to matters involved in the contract which were not so referred to in the original complaint. But it would have been perfectly proper and competent or within the issues to have proved all the terms of the contract, under the general issue as framed by the pleadings as originally filed, and this would, of course, have included the additional averments set forth in the amendment to the complaint as to the terms of the contract. The amendments to the complaint, as we have seen, set out in substance the terms of the contract as found by the court and admitted by the defendant to have been the contract which was entered into between it and the plaintiff.

[2] It is, however, true that the averments of the second amended complaint call and the prayer prays for a larger amount of damages than was asked for in the latter pleading. We do not know of any rule of law or any reason against the right of a party suing for damages for any tort to amend his complaint so as to authorize a judgment for a larger amount of damages for such tort than that which was asked for in the complaint as originally filed, if the evidence warranted it. Moreover, it is obvious that the defendant was not prejudiced by a demand for a larger amount of damages than that asked for in the complaint as originally filed, even if the allowance of said amendment so far as it concerned the amount of damages might be said to involve error, since the amount of damages awarded by the court was far below the sum prayed for in the amendments and even below the amount asked in the original complaint. Stohman v. Martin, 28 Cal. App. 338, 347, 152 Pac. 319.

[3, 4] 2. There is nothing in the point that there was no breach of the contract, because, as appellant contends, it had an entire year within which to perform, or at the very least a reasonable time to perform after demand. The contract is for the sale and purchase of a commercial commodity, and a fair and reasonable construction thereof is that the defendant was to furnish the Lactein to the plaintiff whenever the latter should demand it, provided, of course, that the defendant had on hand such a supply of the article as the plaintiff might require or call for. In other words, we do not think that the defendant was at liberty under the contract to refuse to supply the plaintiff with Lactein in the required quantity at any reasonable time at which the former might demand it. In this connection it is further contended that, if the defendant was in default at all, it was merely for its refusal to supply the plaintiff on its second demand or order for Lactein. The record does not support this contention. To the contrary, it appears from the evidence that the defendant, through its general manager and president, addressed a letter, under date of July 7, 1919, to the plaintiff or its agent, Mr. Gilbert, stating, among other things:

"It will be impossible for us to allow you to sell H. and H. (Hen and Hog Buttermilk) in this territory, as per our first contract; we wish to state that we will make a contract with you turning over the state of Arizona to you and allowing you a commission on any H. and H. sold in this territory, although we intend, if possible, to discontinue the sale of H. and H. entirely."

This letter, it will be observed, was after the plaintiff had made its second demand upon the defendant for Lactein. The trial court construed it to be a repudiation in toto of the contract, and so found, and we think the letter sufficiently supports the court's finding in that particular.

[5] We now return to the proposition that the court erred, to the prejudice of the defendant, in adopting as the measure of damages in this case the profits which the plaintiff would probably have derived from the material mentioned in the contract had the same been supplied to it by the defendant according to the terms of the agreement. Sec. 3300, Civ. Code. Said section provides:

"For the breach of an obligation arising from contract, the measure of damages, except where otherwise expressly provided by this Code, is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom."

We are persuaded that the measure of damages in this case, as the record stands before us, is that prescribed by sections 3308 and 3354 of the Civil Code. The first-named section reads:

"The detriment caused by the breach of a seller's agreement to deliver personal property, the price of which has not been fully paid in advance, is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the value of the property to the buyer, over the amount which would have been due to the seller under the contract, if it had been fulfilled."

Section 3354 provides:

"In estimating damages, except as provided by sections 3355 and 3356, the value of property, to a buyer or owner thereof, deprived of its possession, is deemed to be the price at which he might have bought an equivalent thing in the market nearest to the place where the property ought to have been put into his possession, and at such time after the breach of duty upon which his right to damages is founded as would suffice, with reasonable diligence, for him to make such a purchase."

The terms of the contract which the court found that the parties actually entered into are substantially set forth in the amendment to the complaint, the averments of which are in substance reproduced hereinabove. The specific provisions of the contract are that the party of the first part "is the manufacturer of a condensed buttermilk known as Lactein or Hen and Hog Buttermilk * * * and desires to sell said product and said party of the second part desires to purchase said product under the terms and conditions hereinafter specified; that it is agreed by and between the parties hereto, in consideration of the conditions and covenants and of the payment of $1 each to the other, receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, that the said party of the first part will sell to the said party of the second part," the article mentioned at the prices specified; that "the purchase price is to be paid in cash within ten days from date of shipment, less 2 per cent. discount for cash." Thus it will be seen that the contract is plainly one for the sale and purchase of the article therein referred to. There is nothing in the contract to indicate that the matter of profits to be derived by the plaintiff from the sale of the article entered into the agreement as a consideration or as an element thereof.

These are cases of contracts for the sale and purchase of certain commodities in which the measure of damages adopted by the court in this case would be applicable. These are where the circumstances are such that the vendee cannot go into the open market and supply himself with the same article, in which case the loss of profits would be a just element in the admeasurement of damages. McKay v. Riley, 65 Cal. 623, 4 Pac. 667; National, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Producers' R. Co., 169 Cal. 740, 745, 147 Pac. 963, and cases therein cited. The case of Parkinson v. Langdon, 36 Cal. App. 80, 171 Pac. 710, like the cases just cited, is one in which profits entered into the contract as a part of the consideration therefor. There is no allegation in any of the pleadings filed by the plaintiff that the latter, after the breach, was unable to purchase Hen and Hog Buttermilk in the open market; nor, so far as we are advised by the record, is there any evidence therein tending to show that Hen and Hog Buttermilk, such as was manufactured by the defendant, could not be purchased in the open market. The only testimony upon the question of damages was that given by W. B. Gilbert, who testified as to the amount of profits lost by the plaintiff by reason of the failure of the defendant to supply the former with the article according to the terms of the agreement. This is the only testimony to which counsel for the plaintiff refers in support of his contention that the amount of damages found by the court as having been suffered by the plaintiff for the breach of the contract is sufficiently buttressed, evidentially, and from this we have the right to conclude that there is no other testimony in the case upon the question of damages. The finding of the court upon the question of damages is in accord with this testimony, and is based thereon. This testimony was, under the circumstances of this case as disclosed by the record, clearly incompetent, from which proposition it necessarily follows that there is in the record no basis for a proper or legal admeasurement of damages in this case.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

CHING WING v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 2, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 29, 1922.)

1. Railroads — 350(7)—Question of primary negligence in not keeping lookout for pedestrian held for jury.

In an action for death of pedestrian struck by a train while lying on track at a crossing after having been stunned by an automobile, in which it was claimed that the employees of the railroad were negligent in not keeping a proper lookout, evidence held to warrant submission of the question of primary negligence, as against the contention that the only issue in the case was the question of the liability of the railroad under the last clear chance doctrine.

2. Railroads — 346(5) — Burden of proving contributory negligence on defendant.

In action for death of pedestrian struck by train while lying on track at a crossing after having been stunned by an automobile, the burden of proving contributory negligence was on the defendants.

3. Negligence — 83—"Last clear chance" doctrine stated.

The "last clear chance" doctrine necessarily presupposes a condition where the injured party has, by his own negligence, placed himself in a position of danger, and where the party causing his injuries, in addition to whatever primary act of negligence may be chargeable against him, after perceiving the dangerous situation of the injured party, acts with further negligence and injury results.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Last Clear Chance.]

4. Railroads — 338 — Last clear chance doctrine held inapplicable.

In an action for death of a pedestrian struck by train at a crossing after an automobile threw him to the track, held, that last clear chance doctrine was inapplicable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Ching Wing, as the administrator of the estate of Wong On King, against the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Harry M. Irwin and Waldo M. York, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff, having alleged in his complaint that defendants, by acts of negligence, caused the death of his intestate Wong On King, was awarded damages in the sum of $7,500 by a jury. Judgment followed accordingly, and defendants have appealed.

On June 30, 1916, Wong On King was crossing Alameda street in the city of Los Angeles when an automobile collided with him, causing him to fall across the track of the defendant Southern Pacific Company. He was apparently stunned by the fall and, while lying on the track, his legs were crushed by the wheels of a locomotive tender. This injury caused his death. The locomotive of which the tender was a part was owned by defendant company. Defendant Jordan was the engineer in charge of the locomotive and was being assisted at the time by the defendant Thorne as fireman. It is the contention of the appellants that the court erred in the giving of a certain instruction, and in modifying another which was offered on the part of the defendant. As to the errors complained of affecting the instructions as given and modified, appellants insist that under the evidence the case should have been submitted to the jury upon one theory only; that theory being that a situation was presented which might make applicable the doctrine of "last clear chance." It does not appear to be contended that, assuming that the evidence disclosed a case which might authorize a recovery because of the primary negligence of the defendants, the instructions as given were erroneous. The court refused to instruct the jury that the rule of recovery could be under the "last clear chance" doctrine only, but gave an appropriate instruction setting forth that, if the jury found that the deceased, while traveling across the street, was exercising reasonable care and prudence, and that while so doing the locomotive of defendant company was, through the negligence of the operators thereof, propelled upon him, causing his death, plaintiff should recover. In other instructions given the "last chance" rule was correctly and adequately explained and it was left for the jury to determine whether the facts warranted its application in the case.

[1] A brief statement of the evidence, given a light most favorable to the plaintiff, will show that there was no error in the giving of the instruction first referred to. At about 1:30 o'clock of the day in question Wong On King was at the southeast corner of Marchessault and Alameda streets. He was proceeding to cross to the opposite side of the street. Marchessault street enters Alameda street from the east. Upon Alameda street are laid double tracks of the defendant corporation. A freight train of the defendant had proceeded northward along the easterly track and had cleared the street intersection when Wong On King started to cross Alameda street. Emerging from Marchessault street an automobile proceeded to cross Alameda street at the right of and near to Wong On King. As the latter reached the easterly track of the railway, the automobile made a sudden turn to the left and collided with Wong On King, knocking him to the street, where he lay with his legs across the easterly rail and his body between the two rails of the track. The automobile proceeded to the left and south for some yards or rods on Alameda street, where it came to a stop. The locomotive was following the freight train on the easterly or north-bound track. This locomotive was backing northward, the tender being in front. It was traveling at approximately six miles per hour, and, according to the engineer's testimony, maintained a distance of 360 to 400 feet from the rear of the receding freight train. Alameda street was straight for at least a number of blocks south from the point of the accident. At the time of the happening of the latter there was considerable traffic of vehicles along its paved surface. It did not appear in evidence that any of this traffic came between the engine and the fallen Chinaman from the moment that the automobile threw the man to the street up to the time that the wheels of the tender ran over his limbs. An eyewitness stated that when Wong On King started to cross the street the witness saw the engine approaching from the south at a point at about Jeannette street, which was shown to be 345 feet away from Marchessault. As the engine approached the fallen man, several persons attempted to attract the attention of the operatives on the locomotive, and finally the call of a truckman did reach the ear of the fireman, who in turn signaled the engineer and the engine was brought to a standstill—not, however, until some of the wheels of the tender had passed over the limbs of the Chinaman. The body of the tender of the locomotive was 14 feet high, 8 feet wide, and 37 feet and 7 inches long. The sides of the engine cab were not so wide as the tender, but the engineer and fireman, by projecting their heads in the customary manner through the windows of the cab, could bring their eyes a few inches outside the lines of the tender—as the fireman stated, "maybe one or two inches." They could not see over the top of the tender. At the time in question the fireman and engineer were in their accustomed places, the fireman being on the right side of the cab as the engine proceeded backward, and the engineer on the left. The fireman stated that, looking up the track in the direction they were going, he could see the east rail therefrom a point about 25 feet ahead of the tender; that he could not see the west rail nearer than a point between 150 and 200 feet away. The engineer testified similarly, but stated that from his side he had a clear view of the westerly track except for a distance of about 35 feet immediately ahead of the tender, but that he could not see any part of the easterly track nearer than a point 150 feet away. Both of the operatives were charged by instructions from their employer to keep a sharp lookout ahead, and it does not appear that attention to any other necessary duties prevented them from so doing at the time in question. The fireman stated that he observed the automobile in question cross the tracks when it was 120 feet away from the tender of the locomotive. He did not explain why in such circumstances he failed to observe the prostrate Chinaman lying upon the easterly rail after the automobile crossed. By the testimony of some of the plaintiff's witnesses, the jury might well have inferred that the locomotive was farther than 120 feet away from the corner of Marchessault and Alameda streets when the automobile struck Wong On King.

[2-4] It is not disputed by appellants as a correct rule of law that, if the Chinaman was in no wise negligent in crossing the street at that time and place, the negligence of any third person, having no privity with him in the act, could not be used to establish the defense of contributory negligence. The burden was upon the defendants to show that Wong On King was guilty of some act of contributory negligence. The evidence failed to disclose any such negligence. The evidence did show a case where the jury was altogether justified in concluding that the operatives on the locomotive did not use reasonable care in observing the track ahead of them. Where the rule of "last clear chance" applies, it necessarily presupposes a condition where the party injured has, by his own negligence, placed himself in a situation of danger, and where the party causing his injuries, in addition to whatever primary act of negligence may be chargeable against him, and after perceiving the dangerous situation of the first party, acts with further negligence and injury results. The evidence does not seem to disclose a case where the doctrine of last chance was applicable at all; either the operatives of the locomotive were negligent and responsible, or the accident was the inevitable result of circumstances for which no such responsibility would exist. The giving of the instruction complained of, therefore, did not constitute error. For like reasons the trial judge did not err in modifying as he did the instruction offered by the appellants.

57 Cal. App. 432

Ex parte PAPPAS. (Cr. 616.)(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 24, 1922.)1. Indictment and information ☞ 117—Charge construed to be of conducting business at unlicensed place.

Complaint for violation of Yolo county ordinance No. 72, held to charge, not conducting place of business for selling liquor without procuring the necessary license, but conducting it at a place other than one of the ten which under the ordinance could be licensed.

2. Intoxicating liquors ☞ 13, 132—Consistent state legislation not repealed by Eighteenth Amendment and Volstead Act.

The Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act, while superseding the license features of state and county enactments, do not repeal the features thereof not inconsistent with them.

3. Intoxicating liquors ☞ 13, 132—County ordinances held not wholly regulatory as regards effect thereon of Eighteenth Amendment and Volstead Act.

Yolo county ordinance No. 72 held not to be wholly regulatory, and so necessarily wiped out in toto by the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act, but to be in part prohibitory; it making all but certain parts of the county dry at all times and the remaining parts dry except on the concurrence of three things.

4. Intoxicating liquors ☞ 13—No assumption that county ordinance would not have been enacted could the Eighteenth Amendment, making inoperative license features, have been foreseen.

It cannot be assumed that Yolo county ordinance No. 72, making dry most of the county and the remainder dry except on the concurrence of three things, would not have been enacted could it have been foreseen that its license provisions would be rendered inoperative by the Eighteenth Amendment; so the entire ordinance cannot be held void on that ground.

Original habeas corpus proceeding by Teddy Pappas for a writ to be directed to the sheriff of Yolo County. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

A. C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, both of Woodland, and S. W. Cross, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

C. C. McDonald, Dist. Atty., of Woodland, for respondent.

PREWETT, Justice pro tem. [1] Teddy Pappas was convicted in a justice's court of the crime of violating ordinance No. 72 of the county of Yolo. He will be referred to in this opinion as the petitioner.

The operative portions of the complaint against him read as follows:

"Did then and there willfully and unlawfully keep, conduct and establish a place where alcoholic liquors were sold, served and distributed and were kept for the purpose of sale and distribution, and the place not being then and there a licensed place of business as provided in ordinance No. 72 of said county of Yolo. * * *" (The italics are ours.)

The chief point urged in behalf of petitioner is that he is charged with conducting a place of business where alcoholic liquors are sold without first procuring the necessary license. Much of the argument and many of the authorities on the part of petitioner are directed to this point; but it is sufficient to say that he is not charged in the complaint with conducting the place of business in question without procuring the necessary license so to do. He is charged merely with conducting it in a place other than a licensed place.

To appreciate fully the import of the charge as laid in the complaint it is necessary to examine in detail the provisions of the ordinance with the violation of which petitioner stands charged. Chief of these is section 3, which reads as follows:

"Sec. 3. From and after the first day of October 1911, it shall be unlawful for any person, corporation, firm, company, association or club, within the limits of the county of Yolo, to keep, conduct or establish, as principal, agent, employee or otherwise any place where alcoholic liquors are sold, served or distributed or are kept for the purpose of sale or distribution, except at the ten licensed places mentioned and described in section one hereof. * * *"

Section 1, thus referred to, describes the ten excepted places. For convenience, we have divided into paragraphs the provision thus excepting them. It reads as follows:

"* * * (1) Except at a fixed place of business described in this ordinance,

"(2) And in the license authorizing the same,

"(3) Duly issued to the person conducting the said business."

We employ the usual terms "wet" and "dry."

The ordinance further provides that all places in the county other than the said ten excepted places are "dry" territory, and makes it a misdemeanor to sell alcoholic liquors or to conduct a place for its sale within them. Section 2a provides that a license may issue to carry on business at the ten excepted places. And a place remains "dry" until such license is issued. Otherwise stated, a place remains prohibition territory until a license is actually issued to the person who conducts a business thereat. In addition, of course, the place must be one of the ten described in the ordinance. All three of the conditions set out as paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 must concur in order to render it "wet" territory. And even then it is "wet" only in a limited degree. It is "wet" only as to the person who conducts a place of business thereat, and who has a license which authorizes the business, and this license must be issued to him.

It is thus seen that the pleader merely negatives the fact that the place stated in the complaint is one of the ten excepted places. There is no intimation in the complaint that the petitioner is charged with the offense of carrying on the business without first procuring the necessary license. The language criticized describes the territory, rather than the act of the offender.

[2] The petitioner insists that he could not lawfully be charged with the offense of failure to procure the license required by the ordinance, since it is conceded that the license provisions are all superseded by the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act, and he cites many authorities to sustain this point. But since he is not charged with such failure, it would be unprofitable to examine these authorities at length. It is further conceded that this national legislation does not operate a repeal of county and state enactments that are not inconsistent therewith. If authorities were needed in support of this concession, reference may be had to In re Volpi (Cal. App.) 199 Pac. 1090, and People v. Capelli (Cal. App.) 203 Pac. 837. Our conclusion that the petitioner is not charged with conducting a business without first procuring the necessary license nor with failure to procure a license eliminates many questions pressed upon our attention by his counsel.

[3] The petitioner makes the further point that the ordinance in question is regulatory rather than prohibitory, and it is argued therefrom that all regulatory provisions are necessarily wiped out by the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act.

We are assured that this court, in the case of Golden v. Justice's Court, 23 Cal. App. 802, 140 Pac. 60, while considering this identical ordinance, held it to be regulatory. It is quite true that the court in that case uses this expression: "The purpose of said ordinance is the regulation of the business of selling intoxicating liquors," etc.

But the court had no occasion to distinguish between regulatory and prohibitory provisions, and the remark of the court was not addressed to such distinction. The court, in that case, in no manner negatives the fact that all the county, save the ten excepted places, is "dry" territory. It is express authority to the contrary.

It would constitute a gross misreading of the opinion to hold that the court meant that all portions of the ordinance are regulatory. Counsel in their briefs assure us that only about 1 per cent. of the county is "wet" territory within the purview of the ordinance, although all save 2 or 3 of the 40 or 50 paragraphs in the ordinance deal with the regulation of the liquor traffic therein.

[4] We are asked to declare the entire ordinance void for another reason. We are asked to assume that the board would not have enacted the ordinance if it could have foreseen that all the license provisions would be rendered inoperative by the Eighteenth Amendment. But this view does not appear to be sound. A law or ordinance may be composed of such interrelated parts that an unforeseen failure of one part may justify the assumption that, in its mutilated form, it would not have been enacted. But we find no such case here. The board of supervisors divided the county into two parts—about 99 per cent. "dry" and the remaining 1 per cent. provisionally "wet." The two divisions are distinct, and they are in no wise interdependent. Prohibition is neither greater nor less in the "dry" territory by reason of the provision for license in the ten excepted places. Conversely, the right to licenses in the license territory is in no way dependent upon the fact that other portions of the county are "dry." So far as appears from the ordinance itself, the board prohibited the sale of liquors in certain parts of the county, because, with reference to those parts, it so desired. If it really desired that such sales should be prohibited in these parts, we can indulge no inference that such desire was in any way dependent upon the further desire that licenses might be issued in ten designated places. And the failure of its intent with references to these ten places in no way argues that its intent with reference to the larger portion of the county has failed.

It is necessary to recall, in this connection, that the entire county was "dry" the moment the ordinance was adopted, and that it so remained until the three excepted conditions ripened into realities. The ordinance appears to have been very carefully drawn so as to exclude any inference that the ordinance itself created any part of the county into "wet" territory. It was all "dry" at all times until the concurrence of the three specified conditions converted it into "wet" territory. This meant that it was prohibition territory, and not merely that it was territory within which it was made unlawful to sell liquors without a license. Indeed, we do not discover any provision in the ordinance which makes it unlawful to commence or carry on business or to sell liquors without a license. It is this that clearly distinguishes this case from the Louisiana case cited by counsel, State v. Green, 148 La. 376, 86 South. 919.

In that case the statute expressly prohibited the selling of liquors without a license. It was wholly a regulatory statute, and the court properly held that there could be no inference that the Legislature intended to provide a penalty except for the failure to procure the proper license. In the case at bar we are only incidentally concerned with the effect of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act (41 Stat. 305) in the ten excepted places. In support of the claim that the will of the board of supervisors has failed as to these ten excepted places, we are referred to Sprague v. Thompson, 118 U. S. 90, 6 Sup. Ct. 988, 30 L. Ed. 115. But that case is not in point. In that case the state had attempted unlawfully to discriminate between coasters and other ships coming into her ports, permitting the former to enter without being subject to pilot's fees. The court held that the purpose of the Legislature had failed, and that the whole act was void. It seems to have held in effect that it could not be ascertained whether the Legislature (in view of the unconstitutionality of its effort) would have provided that all should come in free or that all should pay the proper fees.

Commonwealth v. Nickerson, 236 Mass. 281, 128 N. E. 273, 10 A. L. R. 1568, is practically identical with the case before us. In that case the statute provided for general prohibition, except as local option, through a vote of the municipalities, might authorize a sale under license. In the Yolo ordinance, it is provided that the whole county is "dry" until the board, under section 2c, exercises its option to order the issue of a license. This limitation applies only to the ten described places. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts in commenting on this condition says:

"As a matter of statutory construction, the prohibition is general; the license is exceptional. The latter is dependent upon the efficacy of the valid local vote and the genuine license. This being the purpose and plan of the statute, its prohibitory features are not so dependent upon those respecting license as to be swept away when those as to license are stricken down by the Eighteenth Amendment."

In the light of the foregoing quotation, it may be said that the board of supervisors ordained that the entire county should be "dry" save and except as it, from time to time might at its option grant licenses in certain excepted places.

The ordinance as to the portion of the county involved in this proceeding is held to be valid. The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

Ex parte PAPPAS. (Cr. 617.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 24, 1922.)

1. Indictment and information $\S$ 117—Complaint construed to be not for selling without a license, but for selling in dry territory.

The averment in the complaint for violation of Yolo County Ordinance No. 72, § 1, "the defendant not then and there having a license," held intended to aid the description of the place of sale as "dry" territory, and not as a charge of selling without a license; the complaint clearly averring the sale of liquor at a place other than those designated for licenses.

2. Indictment and information $\S$ 117—Construction of complaint contrary to pleader's evident intent, and rendering the whole meaningless, to be avoided.

Construction of part of a complaint which would not only defeat the evident purpose of the pleader, but render the whole complaint meaningless, is to be avoided.

3. Habeas corpus $\S$ 30(2)—Mere defects in complaint cannot be reached by it.

Mere defects of obscurity or ambiguity in a complaint cannot be reached by habeas corpus, as it cannot serve the purposes of a writ of error.

Original habeas corpus proceeding on behalf of Gust Pappas for a writ to be directed to the Sheriff of Yolo County. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

A. C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, both of Woodland, and S. W. Cross, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

C. C. McDonald, Dist. Atty., of Woodland, for respondent.

PREWETT, Justice pro tem. This proceeding is identical with case No. 616 (Ex parte Teddy Pappas [Cal. App.] 207 Pac. 483) this day decided, save that in this the complaint charges a violation of section 1 of the ordinance in question, while Teddy Pappas was charged with a violation of section 3 thereof. Gust Pappas did not in person initiate this proceeding, but it is found convenient to refer to him as the petitioner. Every point involved herein, except that relating to the mere form of the charge, has been decided in said case No. 616 adversely to his contention.

Section 1 of the ordinance, under which the charge is laid, reads as follows:

"Sec. 1. From and after the first day of October 1911, it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, association or club, as principal, agent, employee or otherwise, within the limits of Yolo county, to sell, furnish, distribute, deliver or give away any alcoholic liquors in any quantity, except at a fixed place of business designated in this ordinance and in the license authorizing the same duly issued to the person conducting the said business, in the manner hereinafter described." (The italics are ours.)

The complaint against the petitioner, the material portions of which we quote, does not contain the subdivisions into paragraphs. These are here designated by numbers for convenience in reference. Said material portions read as follows:

"Did then and there willfully and unlawfully sell, furnish, distribute, deliver and give away alcoholic liquors within the limits of said Yolo county and

"(1) The said place where the defendant sold, furnished, distributed, delivered and gave away said alcoholic liquors then and there not being a fixed place of business designated in ordinance No. 72 of Yolo county; and

"(2) The said place where the said defendant sold, distributed, delivered and gave away said alcoholic liquors not being then and there a licensed place of business for selling, furnishing, distributing, delivering and giving away said alcoholic liquors as provided in said ordinance No. 72 of Yolo county; and

"(3) Said defendant not then and there having a license to sell, furnish, distribute, deliver or give away alcoholic liquors as provided in said ordinance No. 72."

[1] Petitioner insists that he is charged in the third paragraph of the complaint with selling liquors without having theretofore procured a license so to do. It is conceded that he could not, since the passage of the Volstead Act, procure such a license, and he argues therefrom that he is charged with an impossible crime. He would have us read the complaint as though it contained only the following allegation:

"The defendant sold liquors within the limits of Yolo county not then and there having a license so to do."

For the sake of brevity, we will use the popular terms "wet" and "dry." It becomes necessary to examine the several conditions specified in the ordinance which constitute prerequisites to the right to sell liquors in the ten excepted places. The ordinance divides the county into two classes of territory: (1) The ten excepted places within which liquors could under certain circumstances be sold; (2) the entire remaining portion of the county, stated to be more than nine-tenths of the county. This remaining portion was, under the ordinance and yet is, "dry."

But these ten excepted places are not unconditionally "wet"; and this fact explains the necessity for the several allegations designated in the complaint as paragraphs 1, 2, and 3. Under the terms of the ordinance the "dry" territory comprises all the county that is not "wet." The "wet" territory is not always "wet." It is in the one class or the other according as the conditions specified in the complaint as said paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 do or do not exist. A place may be "wet" territory to-day and prohibition territory to-morrow. In order to constitute "wet" territory the three following conditions must concur: (1) A fixed place of business designated in the ordinance; (2) and also designated in the license authorizing it; (3) and the license must have been issued to the person conducting the business.

A complaint attempting to describe "dry" territory might be sufficient if it pleaded the nonexistence of any one of said three conditions, since all three must concur. A complaint alleging that the place was one for which no license had been issued to the person conducting a business thereat would have described "dry" territory—the allegation describing not the person, but the place. No less does it charge a crime because it sets out the absence of all three of the necessary conditions, all of which must concur to constitute "wet" territory. The complaint does not charge the petitioner with carrying on a business at all; hence the impossibility of charging him with carrying it on without first procuring the necessary license. The ordinance does not provide for a license to sell or give away liquors in general, but only for a license to sell or give them away at one of ten specifically described places. A party could not have procured a license to sell or give away liquors at one of the ten excepted places save and except that he was the person who was carrying on the business thereat.

But the matter may be viewed from another angle. Conceding that a close reading of the allegation "the defendant not then and there having a license" would, if standing alone, warrant the claim of petitioner that he is charged with a failure to procure the proper license, still the entire complaint must be examined, and it must be interpreted in the light of all of its allegations. It is clearly averred that the petitioner sold liquors in Yolo county at a place not designated as one of the ten excepted places. This, of necessity, describes the place as "dry" territory. No more nor less does it describe it as "dry" territory, because it further avers that the place was not a licensed place of business; and no more nor less does it so describe because it further avers that the petitioner did not then and there have a license. It seems to follow, therefore, that the pleader cannot have intended to charge the petitioner with failure to procure a license, since such failure, because it is shown that the place was not a fixed place of business, is not inhibited in the ordinance. Even in the pre-Volstead days, it would not have charged the crime of failure to procure a proper license. It does not do so now.

[2] It is therefore not only possible, but inevitable, that we read the averment "the defendant not then and there having a license" as being intended to aid the description of the place as "dry" territory. The construction contended for by the petitioner would not only defeat the evident object of the pleader, but would render the whole complaint meaningless. Such constructions are to be avoided. In re Mitchell, 120 Cal. 384, 52 Pac. 799; Golden v. Justice's Court, 23 Cal. App. 778, 140 Pac. 49.

[3] At most, the allegation of which the petitioner complains is a mere obscurity or ambiguity, and it is well settled that the writ of habeas corpus cannot be made to serve the purposes of a writ of error. Mere defects in a complaint cannot thus be reached. Ex parte Williams, 121 Cal. 328, 53 Pac. 706; In re Avdalas, 10 Cal. App. 507, 102 Pac. 674.

The writ is discharged and the petitioner remanded.

BRISCOE v. GUARANTY MORTGAGE CO.
et al. (Civ. 4209.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division I, California. April 28, 1922.)

1. Venue ⇨41—One nonresident defendant cannot change venue without showing non-residence of all defendants.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 395, a nonresident defendant in a personal action in which there are several defendants cannot have the place of trial changed to the county of his residence without showing that none of the other defendants are residents of the county in which the action was brought.

2. Venue ⇨22(3)—Holder of note is necessary party to suit to cancel it for fraud.

In a suit to rescind a purchase of corporate stock for fraud, and to cancel a note given in payment for the stock, brought against the payee of the note and the subsequent holder, the holder of the note is a necessary party, so that the venue cannot be changed to the county of the corporation's residence without a showing that the holder is a nonresident of the county where the action was brought.

3. Cancellation of instruments ⇨37(6)—Complaint need not allege subsequent holder of note was party to fraud.

In a suit to cancel a negotiable instrument for fraud, brought against the payee and the subsequent holder, the complaint was not defective as respects the subsequent holder in that it did not allege that he was a party to the payee's fraud, in view of Civ. Code, § 3136, as added by St. 1917, p. 1541, as to defective title; and section 3140 providing that, when the title of any person who negotiated the instrument was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove he was an innocent holder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. M. Cashin, Judge.

Acción by J. J. Briscoe against the Guaranty Mortgage Company and another. From an order denying the motion of the named defendant for a change of venue, that defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leo J. McEnerney, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George Cosgrave, of Fresno, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendant Guaranty Mortgage Company, a corporation, from an order denying its motion for a change of place of trial from Fresno county to the city and county of San Francisco. The motion was based upon the grounds that the city and county of San Francisco at the time of the commencement of the action was the residence of the defendant Guaranty Mortgage Company, and that the causes of action sued upon accrued in said city and county of San Francisco.

The action is one to rescind an agreement to purchase corporate stock upon the ground of fraud, and upon the ground that the agreement to purchase said stock was procured in violation of the so-called "Corporate Securities Act" (St. 1917, p. 673) of the state of California, and to cancel two promissory notes, one for the principal sum of $6,500, and the other for the principal sum of $3,500, given by plaintiff in payment of the purchase price of said stock. It is alleged in the complaint that the note for the sum of $3,500 was assigned by said defendant Guaranty Mortgage Company to the defendant B. J. Sheagren, and that the latter was at the time of the commencement of the action the owner and holder thereof. The prayer of the complaint is that the agreement for the purchase of said stock be canceled, that defendant Sheagren be required to deliver up said note for $3,500, and that the defendant Guaranty Mortgage Company be required to deliver up said note for $6,500, and that both of said notes be thereupon canceled, and that plaintiff have such other and further relief as to the court may seem meet and agreeable to equity.

[1] The defendant Sheagren did not join in the action for the change of place of trial, and there was no proof offered on the hearing of said motion to show that he was not a resident of Fresno county. Under such circumstances the motion was properly denied. The rule applicable here is stated in Donohoe v. Wooster, 163 Cal. 114, 124 Pac. 730, as follows:

"Where there are several defendants in a personal action, a nonresident defendant, moving alone, is not entitled to have the place of trial changed to the county of his residence in the absence of a showing that none of the other defendants are residents of the county in which the action was brought. (Code Civ. Proc. § 395; Hearne v. De Young, 111 Cal. 371 [43 Pac. 1108]; Quint v. Dimond, 135 Cal. 572 [67 Pac. 1034]; County of Modoc v. Madden, 136 Cal. 134 [68 Pac. 491]; Sullivan v. Lusk, 7 Cal. App. 186 [94 Pac. 91].)"

[2] Appellant endeavors to escape the effect of the rule above stated by claiming that the defendant Sheagren is not a necessary party to the action, and that the complaint fails to state a cause of action against him, in that it contains no allegation that Sheagren was a party to the alleged fraud or had notice or knowledge thereof.

This contention cannot be sustained. It is alleged in the complaint that Sheagren is the holder of one of said promissory notes which plaintiff by this action seeks to have canceled, which of itself is sufficient ground for making him a party defendant. It would be impossible to obtain a valid judgment for the cancellation of said note without making him a party defendant, and, in order to state a cause of action against him, it was not necessary to allege that he was a party to the fraud or had knowledge thereof.

[3] Section 3136 of the Civil Code, as added by St. 1917, p. 1541, provides that the title of a person who negotiates an instrument is defective when he obtains the instrument under such circumstances as amount to fraud, and section 3140 of the same Code provides that—

"When it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated the instrument was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove that he or some person under whom he claims acquired the title as holder in due course."

Inasmuch as it is alleged in the complaint that the title of the defendant Guaranty Mortgage Company, who negotiated the instrument, was defective on account of the alleged fraud, the burden therefore rests with the defendant Sheagren, as assignee, to show, and for that purpose to affirmatively allege as a defense, that he is a holder in due course. The case of Rhode v. Dock-Hop, 184 Cal. 367, 194 Pac. 11, 129 A. L. R. 437, relied upon by appellant, is not in point here, for the reason that there the action was one to recover unpaid balances due on the subscription for corporate stock, and did not involve a negotiable instrument. The rule declared by section 3140 of the Civil Code applies peculiarly to negotiable instruments.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

HOPKINS v. PALO VERDE MUT. WATER CO. (Civ. 3901.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 4, 1922.)

Waters and water courses —263—Evidence held to show landowner not entitled to damages for failure of water company to furnish water.

In an action against a water company for damages for failure to furnish water, evidence held to warrant finding that plaintiff was not denied water, and that failure to receive it was occasioned by her own fault in not properly applying therefor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Volene Tegner Hopkins against the Palo Verde Mutual Water Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. B. Chapin and Paul Blackwood, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

I. W. Stewart, of Oxnard, and Arvin B. Shaw, Jr., of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the alleged refusal of the defendant to furnish water with which to irrigate certain arid land owned by her. Judgment was in favor of the defendant. Plaintiff has appealed.

Prior to December, 1918, plaintiff became possessed of considerable acreage of land in Riverside county, which was contiguous to the canal of the defendant corporation. The latter was a mutual water company, and plaintiff, desiring to become a member thereof in order to obtain water, arranged for the purchase of 145 shares of defendant's stock. The price of this stock exceeded the sum of $5,000. Plaintiff, at the time of the purchase, paid no money on account, but gave her notes which were payable with interest and gave a mortgage on her land to secure the payment thereof. She also, under the requirement of the company, deposited the stock with the latter as collateral. By January, 1919, she owed the defendant the sum of $550.66, that being the amount of three overdue semiannual installments of interest on the water stock account. At that time her land was incumbered with three liens: First, a trust deed securing the payment of $7,500; second, a mortgage securing the purchase price of the water stock; and, third, a trust deed securing an apparent loan of $15,000 made in favor of a Riverside bank. At the end of the year 1918 the Riverside bank was pressing the plaintiff for payment of the amount due it. She had defaulted in the matter of the payment of at least one assessment regularly levied for maintenance purposes by the defendant water company prior to that time. This assessment the bank had paid in order to protect its security. Plaintiff anticipated a probable foreclosure by the bank and in December, 1918, removed a pumping plant from the land and placed it on adjoining property. At the time she did this she told persons with whom she had conversations that she wanted to save the pumping plant and not allow the bank to sell it with the land. She admitted at the trial that the reason given for removing the plant was as stated, but also stated that it was removed because it needed a new foundation. So far as appears, the new foundation was never built, and it did appear in evidence that neither the pump, nor any of its accessories, was ever replaced in its original location. She testified that some time in February a suit was brought on her behalf enjoining the bank from proceeding with foreclosure or sale of the property and that she was advised by her attorney that that suit would secure to her possession of the land for at least another year. Meanwhile there were no crops planted or growing upon the land except 20 acres of alfalfa; none other were grown or planted at any time prior to the commencement of this action or the trial thereof.

On January 21, 1919, the auditor of the defendant sent to the plaintiff a letter calling plaintiff's attention to the fact that interest money was overdue on the water stock account and stating:

"As your account is over six months in arrears, the board of directors have instructed us to shut off the water and make no more deliveries until this interest account is settled. This action will not be taken if payment is received by us on or before the 27th of January."

It was the claim of the plaintiff that because of this action of the company she was deprived of the use of her land; that her alfalfa crop failed for want of water; all to her damage in a sum in excess of $11,000, for the recovery of which she brought this suit during the latter part of April, 1919. She testified that upon several occasions, prior to the first of April, she called at the office of the defendant and inquired whether she could have water, and was informed that it would not be delivered to her because of the nonpayment of interest. About April 1st she appeared before the board of directors' meeting at the office of the company and made request that water be furnished her. Several of the directors testified that she was told at that time that her crops would not be allowed to suffer. There was testimony that she said at that time that she wanted water for her alfalfa but that she might not want it for two or three weeks; that she went away apparently satisfied. Under established valid regulations of the defendant company, stockholders desiring water were required to file written application therefor, stating the time when they desired the water delivered. The defendant then had the option (under its rules) to furnish the water on the precise day stated or one day in advance thereof, or one day after. The plaintiff had at numerous times prior to the year 1919 received water which was always delivered to her after the filing of the written order, and she was very familiar with the requirement that the request should be so expressed in writing, and upon blanks provided for that purpose.

The main contention of appellant is that notification given her on January 21, 1919, that water would not be furnished until the overdue interest amounts had been paid, was never revoked, and that there was a continued refusal on the part of the defendant to supply her with water up to the time she brought this action. She contends that the refusal was unjustified and argues that her right to have water furnished her under her stock ownership could not be made conditional upon payment of interest due on account of the purchase price of the stock. The trial court found in effect that the defendant did withdraw the notification of January 21st at the directors' meeting of about April 1st, when the plaintiff appeared at the meeting. The court further found that the land of plaintiff was adapted to the growing of cotton and that at the time of the meeting of the board of directors there remained a period of 75 days before the end of the cotton planting season, which was an adequate period of time within which plaintiff might have prepared her land, irrigated it, and planted the crop. Without deciding the question, it may be assumed that the defendant did not have the right to deprive a stockholder of water because only of default made in the matter of the payment of interest on the purchase price of water stock. Even allowing that assumption, the findings of the trial judge are plainly sustainable upon the evidence. First, there was a great deal of testimony to the point that the plaintiff was clearly informed by the president and others of the directors about April 1, 1919, that she could have whatever water was necessary to meet her needs. She knew well the requirement that she should present a written order for the water, but she made no such order. She chose, rather, shortly after the date last referred to, to bring this action for damages. There was testimony, as has been hereinbefore stated, that she announced at the time she met the directors that her alfalfa did not need the water then. One witness testified that she there said: "My alfalfa is all right yet, but I don't know how long it will be so." This testimony negatives any idea that the loss of or damage to the alfalfa crop, which was the only crop grown up to that time in that year, was due to any failure of the defendant to furnish water from January 21st to the April date. It was shown that the crop to which the land was best adapted for that year was cotton, and plaintiff's testimony as to the rental value of the land was generally based upon its assumed use for the purpose of growing that crop. No preparation had been made to receive water in 1919, although plaintiff testified that she had made "plans" for the ditching of the ground. All the circumstances indicated very strongly, however, that, because of threatened foreclosure proceedings, plaintiff had not anticipated going to the expense of producing any crop other than the alfalfa already planted, during the year 1919.

This suit bears strongly the color of a speculative attempt to reap damages where none could justly be claimed. It seems unnecessary to review authorities cited in the briefs of either counsel. The main question is one of fact, as to the determination of which the decision of the trial court, made upon substantial evidence, is unassailable.

The judgment is affirmed.

PROWD v. GORE et al. (Civ. 3805.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 26, 1922.)

1. Citizens ☞2—"Citizens of the United States" means person born in, or naturalized under laws of, the United States.

A citizen of the United States is a person of any race or color born within the limits of, or who has been naturalized under the laws of, the United States.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Citizen.]

2. Citizens ☞2—"Citizen of the state" means a citizen of the United States domiciled in the state.

By "citizen of the state" is meant a citizen of the United States whose domicile is in such state.

3. Citizens ☞2—"Citizen" not convertible with "resident," but often used synonymously.

The word "citizen," while not convertible with the word "resident," is often used synonymously with it, without any implication of political privileges.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Resident.]

4. Civil rights ☞2, 6—Constitutional law ☞210—"Citizen" entitled to privileges in theaters includes residents not citizens, in view of equal protection clause.

The term "citizen," as employed in Civ. Code, § 51, declaring "all citizens within the state entitled to the full and equal privileges of theaters," and section 52 thereof, making "whoever denies to any citizen privileges enumerated in section 51," etc., liable in damages for not less than $100, is not restricted to citizens of the United States or of any of the states, but includes unnaturalized residents of foreign birth, white or black, as otherwise these sections would deny equal protection of the laws, guaranteed by Const. U. S. Amend. 14.

5. Civil rights ☞6—Theater proprietor liable for wrongful exclusion by manager of theater.

Whether Civ. Code, § 52, rendering liable in an action for damages any one who excludes a person from a theater because of race or color, is penal or not, a person so excluded by the manager of a theater can recover thereunder against the theater proprietor, who neither ordered nor knew of this or a like exclusion, as, by section 2338, and also by general law, a principal is liable for the wrongful acts committed by his agent in the transaction of the business of the agency.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action by John Emery Prowd against A. L. Gore and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

E. Burton Ceruti, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover damages. It appears from the findings herein that defendants A. L. and M. Gore were, on March 7, 1921, the owners and proprietors of the Burbank Theater in Los Angeles, of which defendant Wolfe, as their employee, was manager; that on said date plaintiff, who is a member of the negro race and who was at said time a citizen of the United States and a resident of California, over the age of 21 years, purchased a ticket which entitled him to a seat on the lower floor of said theater; that, although upon presentation of his ticket, plaintiff was admitted to the theater, the defendants, their agents, and employees, solely on account of his race and color and for no other reason, refused to give plaintiff a seat on the lower floor of the theater, to which, as the purchaser of said ticket, he was entitled; that by reason of such discrimination on account of his race and color he was humiliated and damaged in the sum of $100.55. Judgment followed in accordance with these findings, from which defendants have appealed.

The ground relied upon by appellants for a reversal of the judgment is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the finding that plaintiff was a citizen of the United States and of the state of California, or that defendants Gore, by direction or otherwise, participated in the act of their employees in discriminating against plaintiff.

The action is based upon the provisions of sections 51 and 52 of the Civil Code, the first of which sections provides that "all citizens within the jurisdiction of this state are entitled to the full and equal * * * privileges of * * * theaters * * * subject only to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to all citizens"; and the second provides that

"whoever denies to any citizen, except for reasons applicable alike to every race or color, the full * * * advantages, facilities, and privileges enumerated in section fifty-one of this Code, * * * or whoever makes any discrimination, distinction or restriction on account of color or race, or except for good cause, applicable alike to citizens of every color or race whatsoever, in respect to * * * his treatment in, any * * * theater, * * * for each and every such offense is liable in damages in an amount not less than one hundred dollars, which may be recovered in an action at law brought for that purpose." The only evidence touching the question of citizenship was that of plaintiff, to the effect that he was at the time in question a resident of Los Angeles, living at 1382 East Fifteenth street. The contention of appellants is that this evidence fell short of showing that plaintiff was a citizen of the state of California, in the absence of which, they insist, plaintiff could not maintain the action. In support of their contention they cite numerous cases involving diversified citizenship as a condition of the right to invoke the jurisdiction of the federal courts.

[1-4] In our opinion, these cases are not applicable to the question here presented. Neither race nor color is involved in the term "citizen." When used alone and without words of qualification, the term may have different meanings, depending upon the context in which it is found. As said in Union Hotel Co. v. Hersee, 79 N. Y. 454, 35 Am. Rep. 536, "the word must * * * be taken in the sense which best harmonizes with the subject-matter in reference to which it is used." When we speak of a citizen of the United States we mean one who is born within the limits of or who has been naturalized by the laws of the United States; and when we speak of a citizen of a state we mean a citizen of the United States whose domicile is in such state. While the word is not convertible with "resident," nevertheless it is often used synonymously with such term without any implication of political privileges. As employed in sections 51 and 52 of the Civil Code, the term "citizen" is not used in a restricted sense—that is, a citizen of a state or citizen of the United States—but in the broad and unrestricted sense, implying that one is a resident of the state and as such entitled to invoke the jurisdiction of its courts to protect a right guaranteed to all, without reference to race or color, who reside within its jurisdiction. To hold otherwise would render the statute obnoxious to the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution, under which a state may not "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." In our opinion, it was not the intent of the Legislature to restrict the operation of the statute to those only who were subjects of the United States government, and exclude therefrom unnaturalized residents of foreign birth, whether white or black. The evidence shows that plaintiff was a resident of the state, which fact entitled him to maintain the action. Whether or not he was a citizen of the United States, with all the rights implied by such term, is immaterial.

[5] It appears that neither defendant A. L. nor M. Gore was cognizant of the act of their employees in discriminating against plaintiff by refusing to permit him a seat on the lower floor of the house. Neither had they given any instruction to their employees to exclude or discriminate against patrons of the negro race; and hence appellants insist that the judgment as to defendants Gore should be reversed. This contention is based upon the claim that the statute is penal in character, and that defendants Gore cannot be held liable for a wrong committed by their employees. Conceding the statute to be penal, we are nevertheless of the opinion that defendants are liable for the acts of their manager, defendant Wolfe, in discriminating against plaintiff. Section 2338, Civil Code, declares:

"Unless acquired by or under the authority of law to employ that particular agent, a principal is responsible to third persons for the * * * wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as a part of the transaction of such business."

In Otis Elevator Co. v. First National Bank, 163 Cal. 39, 124 Pac. 707, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529, it is said:

"It is the general doctrine of the law, as it is our statutory rule, that a principal is liable to third parties not only for the negligence of its agent in the transaction of the business of the agency, but likewise for the frauds, torts or other wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as part of the transaction of such business."

Moreover, the provision does not purport to be a penal statute. No criminal offense is created thereby, and no provision is made for criminal prosecution nor the recovery by the state of any fine or the imposition of a penalty for a public wrong. It merely fixes a minimum measure of damages for a private tort, to be recovered by an aggrieved party for his own benefit. Gruetter v. Cumberland Tel. & Tel. Co. (C. C.) 181 Fed. 248.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FOLEY. (Cr. 1008.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 3, 1922.)

1. Robbery — 24(3)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

In prosecution for robbery, evidence held to identify defendant as one of the perpetrators of the crime.

2. Criminal law — 822(13)—Instruction held not to mislead jury to believe that more than a reasonable doubt was necessary for acquittal.

In prosecution for robbery, instruction, stating that "all evidence tending to show that the accused was in another place at the time of the offense is in direct conflict with that which tends to prove that he was at the place where the crime was committed and actually committed it," held not to mislead jury to believe that more than a reasonable doubt as to the presence of the defendant at the time and place of the robbery was necessary for his acquittal, in view of other portion of the instruction stating that the defendant was to be given the benefit of every reasonable doubt.

3. Criminal law — 824(13)—Failure to instruct that defendant's failure to testify raised no presumption against him held not error in absence of request therefor.

In prosecution for robbery, failure to instruct jury that defendant's failure to testify raised no presumption against him held not error, in absence of a request therefor, even though the defendant personally conducted a portion of his defense.

Thomas Foley was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan C. Coghlan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction of the crime of robbery. The offense alleged in the indictment was the robbery of the Bank of Alameda County, located at Alvarado, Cal. Two prior convictions for felonies were also charged against the defendant, to which he pleaded guilty.

The president, cashier, and another employee of the bank testified that on October 13, 1920, at about 11 o'clock in the morning, four men arrived at the bank in an automobile. While one of them remained outside on guard, the other three entered the bank and, after shooting the president through the shoulder, secured about $23,000 in money and escaped in the automobile after having locked the employees of the bank in a vault.

Appellant calls to our attention the fact that some of the witnesses for the prosecution were not absolutely positive in their identification of the defendant as one of the perpetrators of the crime. It is true that two of the witnesses were reluctant to positively identify the defendant. One of these witnesses, however, stated that the defendant "resembled the man that was there"; that his "features, and all, resembled the man that was there." Another witness, while not positive in his identification, stated that he recognized the defendant by some peculiarity on his cheek bone and hair, and by his hands, which were unusually small. Owing to the fact that the men who robbed the bank donned masks upon entering the building, it was difficult for the witnesses, who had not observed them until they were masked, to be absolutely positive in identifying the defendant because such identification, necessarily, depended upon a recognition of such physical peculiarities as were unhidden by the mask. But the effect of any reluctance upon the part of these witnesses to state beyond all possibility of doubt that the defendant was one of the men who entered the bank upon the occasion in question is entirely overcome by the positive identification of defendant by the witness Matoza. Matoza was a customer of the bank and arrived there while the robbery was going on. He heard the shots fired, and one of the men on guard forced him to enter the bank. He was later locked in the vault with the employees of the bank. He testified positively that he saw the defendant at the bank; that defendant was the first of the three men to enter the bank. He stated that he identified defendant by his face and his eyes, having seen defendant enter the bank before he was masked. The bank cashier also positively identified the defendant.

He saw the defendant go around to the directors' room and meet there the president of the bank. At that time defendant was adjusting his mask. Two shots were fired. This witness also saw the defendant gather up the money. Upon cross-examination this witness swore, positively, that defendant was one of the men who robbed the bank. He stated that he could not be mistaken; that he had a picture in his mind of the entire incident which he would never forget.

[1] Taken as a whole, the record contains abundant evidence in the testimony of the eyewitnesses to the robbery, to identify the defendant as one of its perpetrators. Added to this there is the unequivocal testimony of the witness Kirk. He testified that on the afternoon of October 13, 1920, he was injured while at his work and was obliged to return to his home in Alameda. There he found the defendant in company with Jack Beebe, a man whom Kirk had previously known and who has been convicted of participation in this bank robbery. The witness was sent with a note to the so-called "Howard Street Shack" in San Francisco, to be delivered to "Spanny" Valente. Kirk delivered the note and Valente returned with him to his home in Alameda, where the defendant and Beebe awaited them. Kirk then saw the defendant and his companions sorting and counting a large amount of money, some of it loose and some of it in packages. The defendant remained secluded at the home of this witness for two nights, and during that time the witness heard defendant talking with his companions about the details of the bank robbery.

Indeed, the evidence connecting the defendant with the crime is so convincing and so abundant in the record that it would seem idle to discuss this point at all were it not that the attorney for the appellant urges upon our attention the fact that the defendant at the trial insisted upon conducting, personally, much of his defense, although he had an attorney who was present in court and who attempted to conduct his case for him. In reply to the suggestion that the defendant was handicapped by his lack of legal learning, it is only necessary to observe that the part which defendant took in examining the witnesses was taken upon his own insistence in open court. It is also pertinent to observe that although the defendant was without training in legal procedure, he, nevertheless, showed great acuteness in questioning the witnesses, and it is apparent that his participation in the defense of his case in no way weakened or jeopardized his cause.

[2] Objection is made to a portion of an instruction that—

"All evidence tending to show that the accused was in another place at the time of the offense is in direct conflict with that which tends to prove that he was at the place where the crime was committed, and actually committed it."

It is argued that this instruction would lead the jury to believe that something more than a reasonable doubt as to the presence of the defendant at the time and place of the robbery was necessary for his acquittal; that the jury might understand that a preponderance of evidence in favor of the defendant was necessary to justify a verdict of "not guilty." It is difficult for us to see how such a construction could be placed upon this language, and especially so in view of the fact that the trial court, in the same instruction, went on to say that in this conflict of evidence the defendant was to be given the benefit of every reasonable doubt.

[3] It is also urged that the trial court erred in not giving the jury an instruction to the effect that the failure of the defendant to testify in his own behalf raised no presumption against him. Defendant would have been entitled to such an instruction had he requested it, but the record does not disclose that he did so. It was said in the case of People v. Flynn, 73 Cal. 511, 15 Pac. 102:

"The defendant did not take the stand as a witness in his own behalf, and the court did not instruct the jury in reference to his failure to do so. It is claimed that 'it was the duty of the court to charge the jury that no presumption of guilt followed from his failure to testify in his own behalf, and that they could not consider his failure to testify in arriving at a verdict.' It does not appear from the bill of exceptions that any such instruction was asked. If counsel for defendant desired such an instruction to be given, they should have asked it at the proper time; and as they failed to do that they cannot now be heard to complain. (People v. Haun, 44 Cal. 100; People v. Ah Wee, 48 Cal. 239; People v. Marks, 72 Cal. 46.)"

Appellant contends that he should not be held to this well-settled rule because he, personally, conducted a portion of his defense. This contention is without merit upon the record before us. As we have stated, defendant was provided with counsel. In the course of the trial, he twice insisted upon taking the conduct of the case into his own hands, but demanded, for at least a part of the time, that his counsel remain beside him in the courtroom and advise with him. The court and counsel acceded to defendant's demands and great latitude was allowed him in the conduct of his case. After he had, personally, examined some of the witnesses, he again turned the case over to his counsel, but toward the end of the trial he demanded that he be allowed to "take the lead" himself and stated that he desired his counsel to withdraw. The court then excused counsel from acting any further, stating that this was done upon the request of the defendant. It appears, therefore, that the defendant had the benefit of legal advice during almost the en-fire course of the trial, and that when he was left without legal assistance, it was because of his own demand and insistence. Under such circumstances, this fact should not militate against the well-settled rule of law above referred to. Most especially is this true in view of the entire record, which leaves no doubt of the justness of this verdict.

There are no other matters requiring discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte JARVIS. (Cr. 1058.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 2, 1922.)

1. Contempt — Findings of fact held sufficient to sustain charge of contempt of court by tampering with jury.

Findings that defendant had filed a complaint against a person charging him with burglary, and that at the trial, after the jury had heard testimony and before the case had been submitted to the jury, during a recess of court, defendant approached two jurors and stated to them that, if he had known the identity of the person charged with burglary, he would not have sworn to the complaint in the case, and that he said to the jurors, "You fellows should acquit that fellow," were sufficient to sustain a charge of contempt of court.

2. Contempt — Affidavit of juror sought to be influenced held sufficient to give court jurisdiction in proceeding for contempt.

In a proceeding for contempt of court in trying to influence jurors, an affidavit of a juror showing that defendant was the complaining witness in a prosecution for burglary pending before the court, and that on the same day he gave his testimony in the case he stated to the affiant and another juror, "You fellows should acquit that fellow," although it contained no express averment that defendant knew that the person addressed was a juror in the case, nor that defendant intended to influence the decision of the juror, was sufficient to confer jurisdiction on the court.

In the matter of Robert Jarvis in habeas corpus. Application for writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the sheriff of Alameda county to secure the release of petitioner. Writ denied.

Gilman & Harnden, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Ezra W. Decoto, Dist. Atty., and T. P. Wittschen and Chas. W. Snook, Deputy Dist. Attys., all of Oakland, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes before us on a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. The petition states that the petitioner is unlawfully imprisoned, detained, confined, and restrained of his liberty by Frank Barnett, sheriff of the county of Alameda, state of California, at the county jail in the city of Oakland, county of Alameda, state of California, by virtue of an order of the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Alameda adjudging petitioner in contempt of court for a violation of an order of said court and in interfering with the processes of said court. Petitioner alleges that the order committing said Robert Jarvis is in excess of the jurisdiction of said superior court; that the said affidavit or complaint upon which the original proceeding is based is insufficient in that said affidavit fails to allege that the said Robert Jarvis had any knowledge that said Katrina Wassman was a jury woman in the case then before said court at said time, and further that said Robert Jarvis had any knowledge of any orders issued to said jurymen in said matter, or intended to violate any orders or proceedings of said court; that said affidavit wholly fails to state that said Robert Jarvis intended or did influence the decision of said jury woman or said jury in any manner whatsoever or at all; further, that the evidence introduced upon the hearing of said contempt proceedings wholly fails to substantiate the charges set forth in said affidavit in whole or in part.

The affidavit in the contempt proceedings was made by Katrina Wassman, who was serving as a juror in a case then pending before the superior court of Alameda county, and, omitting the title and prayer of the affidavit, it is as follows:

"Mrs. Katrina Wassman, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

"That she is a citizen of the United States and of the state of California over the age of 21 years.

"That on the 14th day of February, 1922, Robert Jarvis swore to a complaint against one Peter Martioli in the police court of the city of Oakland charging said Martioli with the commission of felony, to wit, burglary; that on the 24th day of February, 1922, said Peter Martioli was duly and regularly held to answer on said charge of burglary to the above-entitled court by the Honorable Mortimer Smith, judge of said police court; that said action was thereafter immediately transferred to the above-entitled court and assigned to department No. 5 thereof; that ever since said time said action has been and is now pending in said court and said department, and is entitled 'People of the State of California v. Peter Martioli, No. 8196.'

"That on the 30th day of March, 1922, in the above-entitled court a jury was duly impaneled and sworn to try said cause, and that affiant and Marie Dorfel were two of said jurors so impaneled and sworn; that said cause proceeded to trial on said 30th day of March, 1922; and that during said trial on said date said Robert Jarvis was called as a witness for the people and gave testimony in said cause.

"That thereafter on said date, to wit, during the regular noon recess at about 12:10 p. m., and before said cause was submitted to the jury for their verdict, and before said jury was discharged, the said Robert Jarvis approached affiant on the steps of the courthouse in said county of Alameda, state of California, as affiant was leaving said building; that the said Robert Jarvis at said time and place made remarks to affiant, the exact purport and meaning of which affiant cannot state.

"That the said Robert Jarvis thereupon followed said affiant across from the west side of Broadway, Oakland, Cal., to the east side of Broadway, Oakland, Cal., where affiant seated herself in the automobile of a fellow jury woman, to wit, Mrs. Marie Dorffel, said Marie Dorffel having been duly sworn, examined, and accepted as a juror in the said case of the People of the State of California v. Peter Martioli; that while affiant was seated in said automobile as aforesaid Robert Jarvis stood by the side of said automobile and stated to affiant that if he had known the identity of the defendant he would never have sworn to the complaint in this case, and, addressing himself to said affiant and said Marie Dorffel, the said Robert Jarvis said, 'You fellows should acquit that fellow.'

[1] Upon this affidavit this matter came on regularly to be heard before the superior court, and after many witnesses, together with the petitioner, were examined in open court, and after hearing the arguments of counsel, the court made findings of fact and an order of commitment as follows:

"The above-entitled matter coming on regularly to be heard the 11th day of April, A. D. 1922, and being heard on said 11th day of April, A. D. 1922, and upon the 12th and 17th days of April, A. D. 1922, after continuances regularly had upon an order to show cause heretofore and on the 3d day of April, A. D. 1922, made and issued by this court requiring the above-named Robert Jarvis to appear before said court, department No. 5 thereof, on said 11th day of April, A. D. 1922, then and there to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt of court as alleged and set forth in a certain affidavit made and filed in the above-entitled action in said court by one Katrina Wassman on said 3d day of April, A. D. 1922, and said Robert Jarvis being personally present in court, and the above-entitled court having called said matter for hearing and trial, and witnesses having appeared and having been sworn, and having testified in support of said question of contempt alleged in said affidavit of Katrina Wassman and for and on behalf of said Robert Jarvis, and the said evidence and the whole thereof and the law pertaining to said matter having been duly and fully considered by the above-entitled court, and it appearing to the said court and the court now finding as follows, to wit:

"That on the 14th day of February, 1922, Robert Jarvis swore to a complaint against one Peter Martioli in the police court of the city of Oakland charging said Martioli with the commission of felony, to wit, burglary; that on the 24th day of February, 1922, said Peter Martioli was duly and regularly held to answer on said charge of burglary to the above-entitled court by the Honorable Mortimer Smith, judge of said police court; that said action was thereafter immediately transferred to the above-entitled court and assigned to department No. 5 thereof; that ever since said time said action has been and is now pending in said court and said department, and is entitled 'People of the State of California v. Peter Martioli, No. 8196.'

"That on the 30th day of March, 1922, in the above-entitled court, a jury was duly impaneled and sworn to try said cause, and that Katrina Wassman and Marie Dorffel were two of said jurors so impaneled and sworn; that said cause proceeded to trial on said 30th day of March, 1922.

"That during said trial on said date, and while said Katrina Wassman and said Marie Dorffel were sitting as jurors in said cause, said Robert Jarvis was called as a witness for the people of the state of California, and gave testimony in said cause; that said Robert Jarvis knew that said Katrina Wassman and said Marie Dorffel were jurors in the said cause of the People of the State of California v. Peter Martioli; that upon the completion of his said testimony said Robert Jarvis remained within the courtroom where the trial of the said cause was being conducted.

"That thereafter on said date, to wit, at about 12:10 o'clock p. m., the court took a recess until 2 o'clock p. m.; that immediately previous to taking said recess the jury so impaneled to try said cause was instructed and admonished by the court that it was their duty not to converse among themselves or with any one else on any subject connected with the trial, nor to form or express any opinion thereon until the cause was finally submitted to them, whereupon said jury was excused until the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. of said day; that said Robert Jarvis at the time of said admonition was personally present in the courtroom.

"That thereafter on said date, to wit, during the regular noon recess at about 12:10 p. m., and before said cause was submitted to the jury for their verdict and before said jury was discharged, the said Robert Jarvis was approached by Katrina Wassman, said juror, on the steps of the courthouse in said county of Alameda, state of California, as said Katrina Wassman was leaving said building; that the said Robert Jarvis at said time and place made certain remarks to Katrina Wassman, said juror concerning the trial of said cause of People of the State of California v. Peter Martioli, Defendant.

"That said Robert Jarvis thereupon followed said Katrina Wassman, said juror, across from the west side of Broadway, Oakland, Cal., to the east side of Broadway, Oakland, Cal., where said Katrina Wassman seated herself in the automobile of a fellow jury woman, to wit, Mrs. Marie Dorffel, said Marie Dorffel having been duly sworn, examined, and accepted as a juror in the said case of the People of the State of California v. Peter Martioli; that while said Katrina Wassman, said juror, was seated in said automobile as aforesaid, Robert Jarvis stood by the side of said automobile and stated to said Katrina Wassman that if he had known the identity of the defendant he would never have sworn to the complaint in said case, and, addressing himself to the said Katrina Wassman, said juror, and said Marie Dorffel, the said Robert Jarvis said, 'If I had known that Martioli was the man, I wouldn't have had him arrested,' and further said, 'You fellows should acquit that fellow':

"Now, therefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said Robert Jarvis be, and he is hereby, declared to be guilty of contempt of this court in the following particulars, to wit, in that the said Robert Jarvis, the said witness, then and there on the 30th day of March, 1922, in the manner aforesaid, unlawfully and willfully interfered with the proceedings of this court in the trial of the cause hereinabove named, and disobeyed the order of this court in the manner aforesaid, in that the said Robert Jarvis, said witness, did corruptly attempt to influence said Katrina Wassman, said juror, in respect to her verdict in and decision of said cause and proceeding pending before her by means of oral communications had with her except in the regular course of proceedings by means of persuasion and entreaty as hereinabove set forth; and now, whereas said Robert Jarvis has been duly adjudged guilty of contempt as hereinabove set forth:

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said defendant, Robert Jarvis, pay a fine of $200, and that, if he fail to pay said fine, he be imprisoned in the county jail of the said county of Alameda until the fine be satisfied in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every $2 of said fine."

[2] We think that the facts found by the court are amply sufficient to sustain the charge of contempt of court, and the only question in the case is as to the sufficiency of the affidavit to give the court jurisdiction. While it is true there is no express averment in the affidavit that petitioner knew that Mrs. Wassman was a juror in the case before the court, nor an express averment that petitioner intended to influence the decision of said juror, we think upon the face of the affidavit the knowledge of petitioner that Mrs. Wassman was a juror and the intention of petitioner to influence her decision in the matter then pending before the jury sufficiently appear. The affidavit shows that petitioner was the complaining witness in the case pending before the court; that on the same day that he gave his testimony in the case he followed the juror Wassman from the courthouse across Broadway street where she was seated in an automobile and stated to said juror: "You fellows should acquit that fellow." As was said in Ex parte Creeley, 8 Cal. App. 713, 719, 97 Pac. 766, 768:

"It was not necessary for the affidavit on which the proceedings were based to state any more than the facts, and they appear to be fully stated. The fact that the petitioner called out to the jury in a distinct tone of voice, 'Don't convict my friend Ruef,' appears to be all the fact that could be stated. No one but petitioner could look into his mind and tell the intent, object, and purpose of the remark. The remark itself from its very language tends to establish that petitioner knew Ruef was on trial; that the jury to whom the remark was made had charge of the case, and the power to either convict or acquit. Petitioner saw the jury and the deputy sheriffs in charge of them—four in number—and knew that Ruef was being tried. He must be presumed to have intended the ordinary consequences of his own deliberate act."

So in the instant matter the language set forth in the affidavit, "You fellows should acquit that fellow," can convey no other meaning than that the person to whom it was addressed was a juror in the case, and the language clearly shows an intention to influence the decision of the juror. The cases cited by petitioner do not overrule Ex parte Creeley, supra, and, under the authority of that case, the affidavit was sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the court, and the findings of the court show a clear case of contempt.

The writ is discharged, and the prisoner remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Alameda county.

Ex parte COLE. (Cr. 872.)

Criminal law — 1208(5), 1218—Police court of Los Angeles held to have jurisdiction of vagrancy prosecution and sentence to city jail.

Los Angeles being a city of the first and one-half class, St. 1913, pp. 469, 476, §§ 2 and 15, and not Pen. Code, § 647, apply to a prosecution for vagrancy, and the police court of such city did not exceed its jurisdiction in sentencing one, convicted of vagrancy, to imprisonment for 180 days, to be confined in the city jail and not in the county jail.

Application by George D. Cole for a writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles to secure his release after conviction of vagrancy. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

C. Franklin Baxter, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Erwin W. Widney, City Prosecutor, and J. Friedlander, Deputy City Prosecutor, both of Los Angeles, for the People.

CRAIG, J. The petitioner was prosecuted in the police court of the city of Los Angeles. He was charged with vagrancy under section 647 of the Penal Code of California, subdivision 5 thereof, and was convicted and sentenced to be confined in the city jail of Los Angeles for a period of 180 days. We are asked to hold that the police court exceeded its jurisdiction in pronouncing this sentence and particularly in that the petitioner was sentenced to the city jail, whereas it is contended that the law directs such imprisonment to be in the county jail. As authority for this claim it is said that article 10 of the charter of Los Angeles established a police court, and that section 647, Penal Code, is controlling as to the penalty for the offense of which petitioner was convicted. The provision of the charter above mentioned was held to be void by the Supreme Court in Fleming v. Hance, 153 Cal. 162, 94 Pac. 620. The same case also decided that although the present charter of the city of Los Angeles provides for the establishment of a police court, the city has not taken advantage of its authority in that regard, and that therefore the scope of legislative control remains as provided in section 1 of article 6 of the Constitution, in which the Legislature is given power to create police or other inferior courts in any incorporated city or town.

Sections 2 and 15 of chapter 267 of the Statutes of 1913 apply here, and not section 647 of the Penal Code. These sections expressly authorize the judgment pronounced against the petitioner. Los Angeles is a city of the first and one-half class and the provisions last mentioned confer jurisdiction on the police court of a city of that class over misdemeanors, punishable by fine or imprisonment or both, committed in the city where such police court is held and provide further that upon conviction of such an offense the person "shall upon the order of the judge before whom such conviction is had, be imprisoned in the city jail," etc.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

FASSIO v. E. L. GOLDSTEIN CO.
(Civ. 4122.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 1, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 29, 1922.)

1. Work and labor — 10—Owner who retained building on discovery that contractor had obtained contract by fraud liable for reasonable value not exceeding contract price.

Owner, who retained building after construction thereof, on discovery that the contractor had obtained the contract by fraud, was liable merely for the reasonable value not exceeding contract price.

2. Contracts — 94(1)—Construction contract held void for fraud.

Construction contract, let after the architect who had called for bids had induced other contractors to submit bids greatly in excess of the cost, and in excess of the bid made by the contractor when contract was awarded, and after owner had been misled as to the amount of steel required in the construction of the building, held void for fraud.

3. Witnesses — 268(13) — Cross-examination as to issue not raised by pleadings held reversible error.

In contractor's action against owner for balance of contract price in which it was proved that the contract was void for fraud, and in which the issue of the reasonable value was not raised by the pleadings, cross-examination of contractor's superintendent as to contractor's profit on the building held ground for reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Vincenzo Fassio, doing business under the firm name of the Mission Concrete Company, against the E. L. Goldstein Company, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Sloss, Ackerman & Bradley, of San Francisco, for appellant.

G. R. Perkins, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. [1] The plaintiff sued and relied on an express contract; the defendant pleaded an equitable defense sounding in fraud and mistake. If the defense was sustained by the evidence, then, under the pleadings as they were framed, there could be no recovery because, if there was actually fraud or mistake in drawing the contract the whole contract was vitiated. Conceding that the defendant received and now retains the building, its liability, if any, would rest upon the basis of the reasonable value thereof not exceeding the contract price. However, the pleadings did not put in issue the reasonable value of the building.

[2] We turn then to a consideration of the undisputed facts proved by the defendant in support of its equitable defense. The defendant had employed Mr. Stewart as its architect. What the relations were which existed between Mr. Stewart and the plaintiff does not fully appear, but that such relations were somewhat intimate will appear as we proceed. Having prepared plans and specifications for the defendant, Mr. Stewart called for bids for the general construction work. He also called for bids to do the steel work. Bids for the general construction work were called for from five or six different contractors, including the plaintiff. The plaintiff put in its bid for $30,500. Acting upon the request of Mr. Stewart, R. J. H. Forbes put in a bid. Before doing so he applied to the plaintiff to give him a figure which he should submit. In the same way L. J. Diebel put in a bid for $33,620. Barrett & Hilp, acting upon their own initiative, put in a bid for $37,487. Before any of those bids were received, Gunn, Carle & Co. put in a bid of $10,989 on the steel, estimating the amount of steel at 104 tons; whereas, the steel necessary for the building amounted to 104,000 pounds or 52 tons. That, in putting in said bid, Gunn, Carle & Co. was acting as the agent of the plaintiff appears from undisputed facts. In the first place, the bid of Gunn, Carle & Co. was, at first, accepted. But, notwithstanding that fact, Mr. Stewart obtained authority from the defendant to do so and awarded the steel contract to this plaintiff. Well knowing these facts, such act, on the part of Mr. Stewart, was approved in advance by Gunn, Carle & Co. That company, without objection, so abandoned its rights to a contract in which it had a profit of over 100 per cent. In the second place, although the bid of Gunn, Carle & Co. was made in the month of June, 1919, and the alleged mistake was soon after discovered by that company, nevertheless as late as December 15, 1919, that company wrote the defendant that the amount of steel incorporated in the defendant's building was "in round numbers, 100 tons of reinforcing bars. This 100 tons includes about 30,000 square feet of fire mesh and several sizes of wire used in wrapping columns, etc." After Gunn, Carle & Co. had written and submitted its bid, Mr. Stewart requested Mr. Carle to ask the Pacific Coast Steel Company to file a bid. That company was engaged in the manufacture of steel, but it was not engaged in steel construction. Thereupon Mr. Carle furnished that company a figure and it bid $12,480, which figure was 125 per cent. above the market price. Before the plaintiff bid on the general construction work, Mr. Stewart (without the knowledge of the defendant) opened the bids on steel and informed the plaintiff that Gunn, Carle & Co. had put in the lowest bid. When the plaintiff put in its bid, it also knew that the purported mistake had been made in the bid on the steel and that the plaintiff could get the steel for $5,400. Furthermore, Mr. Stewart did, at about the same time, promise the plaintiff that it could have the steel contract if it got the construction contract. None of the conniving above set forth was known to the defendant until it had made all of the payments excepting the payment which is sued for in this action. Under the facts as stated, it manifestly appears that all that Mr. Carle did was done as the agent of the plaintiff; that all that the Pacific Coast Steel Company did and all that Mr. Forbes did was done as the aids and assistants of Mr. Carle; and that at least part of the acts of Mr. Stewart were done in the interest of the plaintiff instead of in the interest of the defendant. Under these circumstances, the contract sued upon was saturated with the fraud imposed by the plaintiff on the defendant and no verdict based on the contract should have been returned.

[3] When the case stood in this form the plaintiff asked of Mr. Smith, who had formerly been the superintendent for the plaintiff:

"Do you know what the profit was on the Goldstein job? Mr. Ackerman: I object as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and in no way binding upon the defendant in this case. The Court: What is that? Mr. Perkins: I asked what the profit to the Mission Concrete Company was on this job, assuming that was to be $41,489 the contract price. The Court: I think that is proper cross-examination. A. We made in the neighborhood of about fifty-one or fifty-two hundred dollars on that job, as near as Mr. Fassio and I could check it up from our bills payable."

The result of the ruling of the trial court was that the jury were allowed to believe that, if the plaintiff in the foregoing conniving made only a reasonable profit, then and in that event the defendant should pay accordingly. However, as the issue of reasonable value was never tendered by the pleadings the case stands thus: The plaintiff was allowed to submit its testimony regarding reasonable value and the defendant was never given an opportunity to produce witnesses on the same subject.

For the foregoing reasons we think that the judgment should be reversed, that the parties should be allowed to amend their pleadings, and that a new trial should be had on the amended pleadings. It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. HURST. (Cr. 856.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 27, 1922.)

1. Criminal law — 878(1)—Conviction both of arson and burning of insured property with intent to defraud insurer proper.

Under Pen. Code, § 954, providing that an information may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, a conviction for arson and the burning of insured property and contents with intent to defraud insurer was proper.

2. Arson — 37(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

Evidence considered, and held sufficient to sustain conviction for arson and burning of insured property and contents with intent to defraud insurer.

3. Criminal law — 656(2)—Direction by court to answer questions evaded by accused on cross-examination not error.

Where accused as a witness repeatedly evaded questions asked by district attorney on cross-examination, it was not error for the court to direct him to answer the questions.

4. Criminal law — 419, 420(5)—Exclusion of hearsay evidence not error.

Where a witness whose testimony accused desired was ill, and he sought by another witness to prove statements made by her, it was not error to exclude such proposed testimony as hearsay.

5. Witnesses — 277(6)—Proper to question accused as to purported written confession not introduced in evidence.

Where a written confession, purported to have been made by accused, was ruled out on the ground that it was not signed, it was proper for the district attorney to question accused as to statements therein purported to have been made by him.

6. Criminal law — 448(1), 1170(1)—Evidence that business of accused, charged with arson, was profitable properly excluded as a conclusion, and any error therein was harmless.

Where, in a prosecution for arson and burning of insured property and its contents, with intent to defraud insurer, accused sought to prove that the business of accused was operating on a paying basis for the purpose of showing absence of motive, held, that the evidence was properly excluded as the conclusion of the witness, and in any event the exclusion thereof was harmless.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Leo W. Hurst was convicted of arson in the first degree and the burning of insured property with intent to defraud the insurer, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Mart Coles and Cooper, Collings & Shreve, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. By the first count of an information filed by the district attorney, defendant was charged with the crime of arson. By the second count thereof he was charged with the offense defined in section 548, Penal Code, to wit, the burning of insured property, alleged to be a dwelling house and contents, consisting of furniture therein, with intent to defraud the insurer.

No objection by motion or demurrer was interposed to the information by defendant, who, upon trial, was convicted of arson in the first degree, followed by a judgment thereon of imprisonment for the term prescribed by law, which, as specified in section 455, Penal Code, is not less than two years. He was likewise convicted as charged in the second count, and adjudged to suffer imprisonment for the term prescribed by law, which, as specified in section 548, Penal Code, is not less than one year; it being provided that such last-mentioned judgment should run concurrently with the judgment pronounced upon defendant's conviction of the crime of arson.

[1] On appeal from these judgments defendant, without objection urged in the court below, insists, for some reason not appearing in his brief, that it was error to convict him upon both charges. In the absence of any reason assigned therefor, we are unable to perceive any ground upon which the objection could be based. Section 954, Penal Code, provides that—

"The * * * information may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, * * * or two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses, under separate counts."

The offenses are different, and connected together in their commission; one being for arson, and the other for burning insured property, its contents, with intent to defraud. By the one act, since the property was insured, and the burning accompanied with the intent to defraud, two crimes were committed.

[2] That the evidence was clearly sufficient to show defendant's guilt admits of no doubt whatsoever. He occupied the house as a tenant of another, and at the time of the fire he held a policy of insurance upon the furniture in the sum of $2,000 for his own benefit. With an associate, likewise charged with the commission of the crime, and who pleaded guilty to the second count, defendant participated in the burning of the house, the purpose thereof, as clearly appears from the evidence, being to obtain the insurance money, with which he and his associates were to go to Mexico. The fact that, in accordance with their agreement, the fire was ignited by King, who obtained the kerosene therefor, renders defendant none the less guilty.

[3] It is next claimed that the attitude of the court prevented defendant from having a fair trial. This contention is based upon the fact that, when defendant upon the witness stand repeatedly evaded questions asked him by the district attorney on cross-examination, the court as often directed him to answer the questions. There was no error in the action of the court in this regard; indeed, it could not have done otherwise without loss of dignity and ceasing to function.

[4] Upon the ground that a Mrs. Hammond, whose testimony defendant desired, was ill, defendant sought by another witness to prove statements made by her to the effect that she was with defendant at about the time the fire occurred. Clearly such proposed testimony would have been hearsay.

[5] It appears that the people offered in evidence a written confession purporting to have been made by defendant, which, upon objection, was ruled out upon the ground that it was not signed by defendant. Whereupon defendant was questioned as to whether he had not made certain statements contained in the typewritten document, some of which he admitted having made, and others of which he denied. The confession was not, as claimed by appellant, introduced in evidence, and we perceive no impropriety in the court permitting the district attorney to question defendant with reference to statements made by him as to his participation in the burning of the building.

[6] A witness called by defendant was asked, "Did you have any interest in that business?" to which question the court sustained an objection upon the ground that it was immaterial. Defendant's attorney then stated, "I want to show the absence of motive;" whereupon the court asked defendant's attorney, "What do you propose to prove by this witness?" to which he replied, "I propose to prove that the business was operating on a business basis and that the business was paying;" in answer to which the court stated, "That would be a conclusion of the witness," and sustained an objection thereto. In so ruling we think the court was correct. While defendant was entitled, as he claims, to introduce evidence showing an absence of motive, which, if established, is a fact for the consideration of the jury in weighing the evidence against him, since without motive therefor it is improbable that one will commit a criminal offense, nevertheless no question was asked of the witness tending to bring out any facts from which the jury could determine whether or not the business was profitable, and, clearly, had the witness answered that it was a paying business, it would have been merely a conclusion. However this may be, and conceding the ruling to have been erroneous and that the answer to the question would have been favorable as tending to show want of motive, nevertheless, since an examination of the entire record leaves no doubt as to defendant's act in burning the building, which was insured for his benefit in the sum of $2,000, he could not have been prejudiced by the alleged error.

Upon the record presented there can be no possible question as to defendant's guilt, and there were no errors in the rulings of the court prejudicial to his substantial rights.

The judgment is affirmed.

JACKSON v. LEONARDT & PECK.
(Civ. 3799.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 29, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 26, 1922.)

1. Municipal corporations ⚡809(2)—Contractor having permit to operate concrete mixer in street must exercise care.

A contractor holding a regular permit from the city authorities to use a concrete mixer in the street in connection with the construction of a building was not a trespasser upon the street, but, nevertheless, owed the duty to place the machine so that it would not unnecessarily obstruct travel, or be likely to produce injury to those who, using reasonable care, might travel upon the street.

2. Municipal corporations ⚡819(1)—Evidence held not to show negligence in leaving concrete mixer in street.

Evidence that the concrete mixer which defendants had a permit to use in the street was standing close to the curb, 100 feet from a street intersection, having the hopper raised in which position it would cause less obstruction than if it were lowered, when plaintiff ran her automobile into it in broad daylight, held not to show any negligence by the defendant.

3. Municipal corporations ⚡809(2)—Due care does not require barricade around concrete mixer in street.

Due care does not require a contractor having a permit to operate a concrete mixer in the street to erect a barricade around the mixer, which would have added to the obstruction of the street and could not have served to give any better notice of the presence of the mixer than did the object itself.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by Luella P. Jackson against Leonardt & Peck, a copartnership composed of H. Leonardt and C. L. Peck, to recover damages to an automobile. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Le Roy M. Edwards, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Cooper, Collings & Shreve, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff, by the judgment of the trial court, was awarded damages because of the alleged negligent act of the defendant in maintaining upon the street an obstruction with which the automobile of the plaintiff collided. Defendant has appealed.

It is the contention of appellant that the plaintiff failed to establish against it any negligent act authorizing the recovery. This contention seems to be borne out by the evidence as the record shows it. At the time in question a building was being constructed at the northwest corner of Seventh and Figueroa streets in the city of Los Angeles. On Seventh street and approximately 100 feet from the corner, in the street but close to the curb line, was a concrete mixer owned by the defendant and used in mixing the cement which entered into the construction of the building. Seventh street at that point runs in an approximately easterly and westerly direction, and its intersection with Figueroa forms nearly, if not quite, a right angle. Plaintiff driving a motor coupé, and in full daylight, drove south along Figueroa and turned west on Seventh street. Seventh street was sufficiently broad to permit of free passage of vehicles without use of the space upon which the concrete mixer was placed. The width of the mixer at its base, as it extended from the curb into the street, was about 8 feet. There was a metal hopper attached to an arm of the machine, which could be let down or raised up by a cable attachment. On the day in question (being Sunday, and the machine not being in use) the hopper was in a raised position. When raised the metal part of the hopper, at a distance of about 6½ or 7 feet from the ground, extended out about 2 feet beyond the main body of the machine and toward the center of Seventh street. When in that position the machine furnished less obstruction to traffic on the street than with the hopper lowered. As plaintiff was driving her automobile past the mixer, the right-hand front corner of the top collided with a corner of the hopper. The force of the contact partially broke the hopper loose from its attachment, and it came down and rested, when plaintiff's machine finally stopped, on the rear fender. The automobile of plaintiff was damaged considerably and several hundred dollars were expended to cover the cost of repairs.

[1, 2] Defendant was not a trespasser upon the street, as it held a regularly issued permit from the city authorities allowing it to maintain and use the mixer at that point. Its duty, of course, nevertheless, was to so place the machine that it would not unnecessarily obstruct travel, or be likely to produce injury to those who, using reasonable care, might travel upon the street. The mixer was a large contrivance standing about 8 feet high and presented its whole outline to persons who might be approaching it. At the time of the accident, being the open day, there was no necessity for the placing of lights about it. Neither was it a thing which plaintiff, upon making the turn from Figueroa street onto Seventh, was suddenly confronted with, for in her own testimony she stated that after turning the corner of the street she traveled for a distance of about 100 feet before her automobile struck the mixer. Moreover, she testified that she did not see the mixer at all before she collided with it, which must be interpreted to mean that she did not look in the direction of it. If the machine, as was the fact, was plainly discernible in all of its projecting parts to those who traveled upon the street, and was so placed that contact with it might easily be avoided, it would follow that defendant had exercised all the care required of it in the circumstances. The negligence, if any there was, which produced the damage must be said to have been that of the driver of the automobile.

[3] Counsel for respondent argues that a barricade should have been built about the mixer. Such a barricade would merely have added to the obstruction presented by the machine and could not have served to give any better notice of the presence there of the mixer than did the object itself. The evidence does not sustain the findings made by the trial judge.

The judgment is reversed.

RAY v. LANKERSHIM GRAIN CO.
(Civ. 3819.)

1. Costs ☞205, 206—Memorandum of costs with affidavit attached prima facie right to insert amount in judgment.

The memorandum of costs, with an affidavit attached containing all the requisite statements as the same are specified in Code Civ. Proc. § 1033, establishes the prima facie right to have the total amount shown by those items inserted in the judgment, and it devolves upon the party objecting to show that the items were not properly included within the cost bill.

2. Costs ☞184(1)—Party claiming witness fees as costs need not have paid the fees.

It is not essential to the right of a party, who claims witness fees as costs, that he should first have paid the fees.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; T. N. Harvey, Judge.

Action by Carl Ray against the Lankershim Grain Company, a fictitious name, owned and operated by H. D. Clarke. From an order denying motion to retax costs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wetherhorn, Hoyt & Jones, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred W. Morrison, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. The defendant asked to have certain items, appearing in a memorandum of costs which the plaintiff filed, disallowed. The court denied the motion. Defendant has appealed from the order.

[1, 2] After notice of decision and within the time required by section 1033, Code of Civil Procedure, the plaintiff, in the court below, filed his memorandum of costs. In this memorandum, various items appeared as for fees of witnesses, who were seven in number, such fees including the per diem fixed by the statute, together with the mileage charge which is allowed to be collected. It included notary charges for taking a deposition of one Nye at Cheyenne, Wyo., amounting to $5, and a witness fee of $2, with a mileage charge of 10 cents for the attendance of the witness upon the taking of his deposition. The other charges were for the serving of subpoenas. Plaintiffs' attorney attached to the memorandum his affidavit, which in all respects was sufficient to establish prima facie the regularity of the charges made. This affidavit contained the statement that, to the best of his knowledge and belief, the items "in the within memorandum of costs and disbursements are true and correct and have been necessarily incurred in this cause." It was further set out in the affidavit that the witnesses actually attended at the trial and actually traveled the number of miles claimed for each, and that in the judgment of the affiant, each of the witnesses was a necessary and material one. A statement as to the correctness of the service charges was also included. In the notice of motion to have the court tax the costs, it was stated generally that the motion would be upon the ground that the charges were not correct and were not taxable against the defendant, and would be based upon an affidavit and the records and files in the case. Appellant does not claim that the witnesses were not legally required to attend upon the trial, or that they did not so attend, but makes the contention that, because they did not demand their fees when subpoenaed, they could not afterwards collect compensation. The second contention is that a party may not include in his cost bill items as for fees due witnesses, unless he has actually paid such fees. The affidavit attached to the cost bill contained all the requisite statements as the same are specified in section 1033, Code of Civil Procedure. The memorandum of costs, with such an affidavit attached, established prima facie the right of the plaintiff to have the total amount shown by those items inserted in the judgment. Barnhart v. Kron, 88 Cal. 447, 26 Pac. 210; Miller v. Highland D. Co. et al., 91 Cal. 103, 27 Pac. 536. It devolved upon the moving party to show that the items were not properly included within the cost bill, and this it failed to do. There was no showing that any witness had waived his costs and presumptively, each having been duly required by subpoena to attend at the trial, each would have a legal claim against the plaintiff for the amount of his fees. Plaintiff having incurred such liability was entitled to have judgment to cover it. It is not essential to the right of a party who claims witness fees as costs that he should have first paid the fees. Linforth v. S. F. Gas & Electric Co., 9 Cal. App. 434, 99 Pac. 716. No showing was made that the notary charge of $5 for the taking of the deposition of the witness Nye in Wyoming was excessive, or that the witness fee of $2 and mileage of 10 cents, presumably paid to the witness to secure his attendance before the notary, was not proper to be collected.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GROENIG. (Cr. 604.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 28, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 26, 1922.)

1. Indictment and information $\S$ 174—Indictment as principal sustains conviction for aiding and abetting.

Under Pen. Code, $\S$ 31, 971, an indictment charging defendant in the usual form as principal with the crime of grand larceny is sufficient to sustain a conviction, though the evidence shows he aided and abetted the commission of the offense.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 785(15)—Instruction as to witness testifying falsely held not to require reversal.

The giving of an instruction that, if any witness had willfully sworn falsely as to any material matter the jury should distrust his entire evidence, does not require reversal.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 792(2)—Evidence held to authorize instruction as to aiding and abetting.

An instruction in the language of Pen. Code, $\S$ 31, that all persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether directly committing the act or aiding and abetting in the act, are principals, was proper where there was evidence on the charge of larceny of an automobile tending to show that defendant had employed others to steal the automobile and drive it into another state.

4. Larceny ☞73—Evidence held not to warrant charge on defendant's ownership of stolen automobile.

Where defendant and the owner of an automobile had a contract whereby defendant was to receive an automobile in a trade for land, and, pending consummation of the trade, the automobile was stored in a garage from which defendant had the right to take it for demonstration purposes only, and defendant had expressly refused to accept title to the automobile on the ground it would impose the risk of loss on him, the title had never passed to defendant, under Civ. Code, § 1141, so that it was not error in a prosecution of defendant for larceny of the automobile to refuse a requested instruction based on the theory that the title to the automobile had passed to the defendant before it was stolen.

5. Criminal law ☞531(3)—Evidence held to sustain finding confession was voluntary.

Where there was no evidence that any threats or promises had been made to defendant to induce him to make a confession, and it appeared that, immediately before he made the statement, the district attorney stated the charge against him, informed him he did not have to talk but that they would listen to any explanation he chose to make, the court and jury were justified in concluding that the confession was free and voluntary.

6. Criminal law ☞535(2)—Evidence aside from confession held to show corpus delicti.

Evidence that the automobile defendant was charged with having stolen was in a locked garage on a certain evening, and that next morning the garage was discovered to have been broken open and the car was gone and it was later found in another state, is proof sufficient to sustain the corpus delicti of larceny of the automobile aside from defendant's confession.

7. Criminal law ☞511(7)—Evidence held sufficient to corroborate testimony of accomplice.

In a prosecution for larceny of an automobile, where a witness for the state testified defendant had employed witness and another to steal the car, defendant's written confession and his testimony at the trial held sufficient to corroborate the testimony of the accomplice and sustain the conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Gus Groenig was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

R. W. Dodge and H. C. Stanley, both of Stockton, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction of the crime of grand larceny and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. He was charged with the theft of an automobile, alleged to belong to Henry Boehm.

The defendant and his wife agreed to sell the latter's house and lot to Boehm on the terms set out in the following contract executed by the parties on the day it bears date:

"This agreement made this 12th day of Jan., 1921, between Gus Groenig and Lydia I. Groenig, wife of Gus Groenig, first party and Henry Boehm second party. First party is agreed to sell and second party is agreed to buy property on lot 7, block 11, Lodi, Barnhart tract, for the sum of $2,000, difference in trade on automobile (Buick 7 passenger). First party furnishes deed certif. of title insurance policy to date. Deposit $2,000 in the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank at Lodi, Cal., payable to Lydia I. Groenig on delivery of above stated papers about 17th of Jan., 1921.

"Lydia I. Groenig.

"G. Groenig.

"Heinrich Boehm."

On the same day Boehm's check was deposited with the bank, together with a letter of instructions reading as follows:

"Inclosed herewith is my check for $2,000 on the Farmers' & Merchants' State Bank of Lacrosse, Kansas, payable to you. You are authorized to forward said check for collection and when paid you are to deliver the said sum of $2,000 to Lydia I. Groenig and G. Groenig, upon delivery to you by them of a deed properly executed conveying to me the following premises: Lot 7, block 11, Lodi, Barnhart tract, said deed to be accompanied by a certificate of title showing premises free and clear of any and all incumbrances. Also an insurance policy assigned to me of $2,000, covering buildings now on premises. You are also authorized to have said deed placed on record for me. * * * Heinrich Boehm."

The defendant testified that he delivered the deed, certificate of title, and assignment of the insurance policy to the bank on the 19th day of January. The manager of the bank, Mr. Mettler, denied this statement and testified that such papers were not produced by defendant until February 2d. The defendant testified that, when he delivered these papers, he asked Mettler to give him the $2,000 deposited, but that Mettler refused, saying that "he could not turn that over to me until Mr. Boehm got back."

J. H. Boehm testified that the automobile was placed in a garage in Lodi on the day the agreement was executed, with instructions to the proprietor thereof to keep it—

"until Mr. Groenig would have time to bring down the papers of the place and until we got our license for the car and everything in shape so we could turn the things over, and * * * that if Mr. Groenig brought anybody there to demonstrate the car * * * he would have the right to demonstrate it, but to bring it back after it was demonstrated."

About January 21st defendant and one R. L. Brown took the automobile out of the garage and later returned it. On the evening of January 23d the automobile was in the garage, which was locked for the night. The next morning it was discovered that the garage had been broken into and the automobile taken. It was finally located in El Paso, Texas. Malcolm Lee testified that, during the afternoon of January 23d, he was riding in an automobile with the defendant and Brown, they two being in the front seat and Lee in the rear, and that, in a conversation between the defendant and Brown, "I heard about $200 to take it to El Paso but I didn't get all the words that were in there"; that between 1:30 and 3 o'clock the next morning Brown, a man named Henry Bechtold, and the witness took the automobile from in front of defendant's residence and drove it away, finally reaching El Paso with it; that the witness assumed the name Earl McDonald on the trip; that the witness wrote the defendant from some town near Phoenix, Ariz.; and that in reply he received a money order from defendant for the sum of $80. About January 25th the defendant informed Boehm that he could not wait any longer to consummate the sale of the house and lot, as he had an opportunity to sell to another person, and the parties then agreed upon a sale to Boehm for $3,000 in cash, in lieu of the original agreement, Boehm to keep the automobile if recovered. On February 2d the transfer of the property was made on that basis.

After his arrest the defendant made a statement to the district attorney. The statement was taken down in shorthand by the court reporter, who testified to the contents thereof at the trial. After stating the substance of the agreement with Boehm, the defendant said:

"I was to clear this house, which I did, and he was to clear this car and, being a Kansas car, we were to have 10 days in which to do this. * * * He had left the car in the garage there. * * * He gave me the privilege of using it or selling it, or anything like that. * * * I met this man Brown. I asked him if he didn't know somebody that wanted to buy a Haines. * * * I told him I had another car that I had just taken in on a trade, and I described it to him. He says right away, 'I know where we can sell that.' * * * We went over to the garage and I told the garage man, I says let him have the car. * * * So I went along with him out here to Elk Grove, somewhere by Galt, the fellow wanted to buy, but he didn't. * * * Brown seemed to be kind of pressed. * * * On the way back I gave Brown $70 or $75. * * * I will tell you the truth and take what comes; I will be candid with you. * * * I had given Brown this money, and I says now, 'If you don't sell the car I will be loser here.' * * * I took this car back that evening to the garage. * * * I seen him somewhere, I think it was on Main street there again that day, and we said something about this money and so on. Well, he says, there is more than one way to get around things. * * * He said if he had a car he could go out and make big money bootlegging. * * * I opposed the proposition. * * * He said he would see that I got rid of that car if we had to steal it. And there is where the trouble started, gentlemen, and there is where I should have said something else; but, of course, I didn't say anything. Well, I don't really know just how these things went on and so on, anyway they occurred. Now then, I didn't see Brown from that day on—I believe it was Friday—until Sunday when he came to my house, he says that he had hired a man, I don't know what his name is, but he had hired a fellow, and he says we are going to do the business. He says you stay at home to-night; stay with your family so you won't get into trouble and your family will be with you. This was Sunday night and Brown asked me for some money. Well, the long and short of it, gentlemen, I gave him some money. I know I was a fool, but I did it. * * * I hadn't told Brown where to take this car. That was up to him to do with as he liked. * * * I don't know whether I asked him to destroy it or sell it, or what. I had the opinion that Brown was going to sell this car. * * * My wife didn't know anything about this. * * * On Sunday afternoon I says to him: 'Now here Brown, if something goes wrong here, you know I have a family here,' and I says, 'I don't mind giving you any money, as far as money is concerned, if you need it so bad as that,' but I says, 'I don't want to get into trouble here in any way.' I says: 'If you go to work and do this and there is any trouble, you will put me into it and I with a family will have to stand for it.' He says: 'No, I won't do no such a thing. I will go to jail first.' * * * He said he would not be caught."

The defendant stated that several days after the theft he received a letter from Phoenix, Ariz., and continued his narrative, saying:

"It said something like this: 'Dear Cousin: I am coming to see you. Everything is dried up here. I haven't any money. Send me $80.' * * * It was signed 'McDonald.' * * * I didn't know I had a cousin by that name. * * * I didn't say anything to my wife. I wish I had, maybe things would have been different, and of course, I was scared too. * * * I got a money order for $80.00. * * * About the time I went to get this money order I decided it was Brown that had written that letter, see, and I was afraid somebody was on my track, either to get the money or do me personal harm. * * * In order to keep my good name over there I substituted another. * * * I sent that money order from Lodi. I got it at Woodbridge."

At the trial the defendant attempted to explain away the incriminating statements made to the district attorney. His explanation is far from convincing and it was for the jury to determine which story to believe.

The defendant further testified that, after the original contract had been signed:

"John and I we drove up to my house, I believe he talked with my wife a little bit * * * and he says: 'Well, what will we do with the automobile?' 'Well,' I says, 'We will leave it right here if I had a garage to put it in but I haven't got it and it can't stay outside.' * * * I suggested that we run it over there in the Central avenue garage, * * * so we got in and drove it over there. I says to this man Olenberger (the proprietor of the garage): 'I want to leave the car here for a short period of time until we get settled up on the deal; * * * I have took this car in on a trade and we got to get papers for it.' So this man Boehm took the key and gave it to him, what he done with it I don't know, he went into the office and talked with the man."

The defendant testified that, at the time of the transfer of the house and lot on February 2d, he said to Mettler, in explanation of the change of terms:

"If you remember this deal we made, John and Henry Boehm and myself, * * * this automobile had disappeared and under the conditions these papers cannot be transferred as they are under that contract."

Relative to his right to use the automobile, the defendant testified on cross-examination:

"I didn't hear Mr. Boehm say anything to this Mr. Olenberger. I asked Olenberger what the instructions were and Olenberger told me that I could use the car for demonstrating purposes and so on as per Mr. Boehm's orders."

Mr. Mettler testified that, a few days before the car was stolen, the defendant asked him whether, if the car was delivered to him and thereafter stolen, Boehm or defendant "would be loser"; that witness replied that he thought the defendant would have to stand the loss; and that the defendant then said that he would not accept it under those circumstances. Mettler's testimony as to this conversation stands wholly uncontradicted. The foregoing lengthy statement of the evidence is deemed necessary to an intelligent understanding of the points made on this appeal.

[1] The indictment was in the usual form and charged the defendant as a principal. The evidence shows that he aided and abetted in the commission of the crime. The appellant contends that the indictment is insufficient in that it fails to allege that defendant so aided and abetted. There is no merit in the contention. Pen. Code, §§ 31 and 971; People v. Nolan, 144 Cal. 75, 77 Pac. 774.

[2] It is claimed that the court erred in giving the following instruction: "If any witness examined before you has willfully sworn falsely as to any material matter, it is your duty to distrust his entire evidence." This instruction was criticized in People v. Delucchi, 17 Cal. App. 96, 102, 118 Pac. 935, and People v. Vertrees, 169 Cal. 404, 413, 146 Pac. 890, but in neither case was the giving thereof held prejudicial. Instructions in the identical language above quoted, or in stronger terms, have often been approved. People v. Plyler, 121 Cal. 160, 163, 53 Pac. 553; People v. Fitzgerald, 138 Cal. 39, 45, 70 Pac. 1014; White v. Disher, 67 Cal. 402, 7 Pac. 826; People v. Lon Yeck, 123 Cal. 246, 55 Pac. 984; People v. Kelly, 146 Cal. 119, 123, 79 Pac. 846; People v. Thomson, 145 Cal. 717, 722, 79 Pac. 435.

[3] The court instructed the jury in the language of section 31 of the Penal Code. It is urged that such instruction was not applicable to the charge or the evidence. The evidence quoted clearly shows that the instruction was proper.

[4] Appellant complains of the court's refusal to instruct the jury that if, prior to the 23d day of January, the defendant deposited with the bank the deed admitted in evidence, the certificate of title, and an assignment of the insurance policy on the buildings, "then the title to said automobile vested absolutely in said Gus Groenig and Lydia Groenig by such delivery of said papers, and said Henry Boehm ceased thereby to be the owner of said Buick car and defendant could not be guilty of a larceny thereof"; that, if the automobile at the time of the alleged theft was the property of the defendant, the defendant could not be guilty of stealing the same; and that if, "on or about January 23, 1921, defendant had done all that was required of him to consummate the agreement with Henry Boehm, whereby said automobile was to be turned in to defendant as part payment for a house and lot to be conveyed to said Henry Boehm, then you will find the defendant not guilty." The only instruction given by the court relative to the ownership of the automobile was, in appropriate language, that, if the defendant stole the automobile at the time alleged and the same was then the personal property of Henry Boehm, the jury should convict.

The whole testimony, even that of the defendant, shows that title to the automobile never passed to him. Section 1141, Civ. Code. There is no evidence whatever that Boehm delivered it to defendant or that the latter accepted it with the intention of passing title but, to the contrary, the evidence shows that both parties understood that title had not passed. The defendant told Mettler he would not accept delivery until the transaction was completed. When it was learned that the automobile was gone, the defendant and Boehm entered into a new agreement by the terms of which Boehm paid an additional thousand dollars for the house and lot in lieu of the delivery of the automobile and neither of them contended or suggested that title to the automobile had passed prior to the theft. Neither in his lengthy statement to the district attorney nor in his testimony, given at the trial did the defendant once say that he even thought that the automobile belonged to him or that he had the right to take it. There was no evidence to which the refused instructions were applicable.

[5] The admission in evidence of the defendant's statement to the district attorney is assigned as error on the ground that it was not voluntary. The testimony shows that no threats or promises were made to induce the defendant to make the statement and that the statement was voluntary on his part. Immediately before the defendant made the statement, the district attorney said to him:

"Gus, you are brought back as you probably know, on a charge of grand larceny of an automobile, for taking an automobile belonging to a man by the name of Boehm, a preacher out here at Lodi; I had you brought up here. If you have anything to say about the matter we will listen to you. You don't have to talk; we are not going to attempt to make you talk. If you have an explanation to make we will be glad to listen to you."

From this testimony the court and jury were justified in concluding that the statement was free and voluntary.

[6] Appellant contends that, independent of the defendant's statement or confession, the corpus delicti was not established. The evidence shows that, on the evening of January 23d, the automobile was in a locked garage, that the next morning it was discovered that the garage had been broken open and that the car was gone, and it was later found in El Paso, Tex. Certainly, such proof is sufficient to show that the machine was stolen.

[7] It is lastly urged that the witness Lee was an accomplice in the commission of the crime and that there is not sufficient corroboration of his testimony. The defendant's testimony, given at the trial, and his statement made to the district attorney are, either of them, amply sufficient corroboration. The evidence establishes the defendant's guilt with unusual certainty.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

CRUM v. CRUM. (Civ. 2441.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 2, 1922.)

1. Divorce — 127(3)—Corroboration of plaintiff's testimony as to cruelty is required to prevent collusion.

The main purpose of Civ. Code, § 130, providing that no divorce can be granted upon the uncorroborated statement, admission, or testimony of the parties, was to prevent collusion.

2. Divorce — 127(4)—Plaintiff need not be corroborated as to every act of cruelty charged by her.

In an action for divorce on the ground of cruelty, where plaintiff alleged and testified to a large number of acts of cruelty on the part of defendant, it was not necessary that her testimony be corroborated as to every act of cruelty.

3. Divorce — 127(4)—Testimony of daughter of parties held to corroborate wife's testimony as to husband's cruelty.

In an action for divorce brought by the wife on the ground of the husband's cruelty, testimony by the daughter of the parties as to some of the acts of cruelty alleged by plaintiff held sufficient corroboration of plaintiff's testimony to entitle her to a divorce, especially where the husband vigorously resisted the divorce at the trial and on appeal, so there could be no suspicion of collusion.

4. Divorce — 27(3)—Cruelty is not limited to physical violence.

Extreme cruelty as a ground for divorce embraces not only physical violence, but also any conduct in one of the married parties which may produce mental anguish or suffering in the other, or which furnishes reasonable apprehension that the continuance of cohabitation under the circumstances may be attended with bodily harm committed by one upon the other.

5. Divorce — 184(10)—Defendant's evidence not necessarily considered on question of sufficiency of evidence to support decree for plaintiff.

Where the single question submitted on appeal from a judgment granting divorce to plaintiff is whether the decision of the trial court is sufficiently supported by the evidence, the limit of inquiry by a reviewing court is whether there is sufficient evidential support to uphold the findings, and the appellate court is not always required to consider the evidence presented by defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action for divorce by Essie B. Crum against Samuel D. Crum. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. C. Russell, of Hanford, for appellant. Clark Clement, of Lemoore, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff was granted an interlocutory decree of divorce from the defendant on the ground of extreme cruelty. The decree also awarded to plaintiff the custody of the minor child of the parties, Mabel Ruth Crum, age seven years, the only issue of the marriage of said parties, and one-half of the community property, consisting principally of real estate. The personal property, of which there was a small amount, and which also belonged to the community, was awarded to the defendant.

The defendant appeals from the judgment under the alternative method upon the sole ground that the testimony of plaintiff as to the acts of cruelty alleged to have been committed by the defendant upon her was not legally corroborated.

The parties intermarried in the state of Missouri, in the month of May, 1908, and removed to Kings county, this state, about two years later.

The complaint alleges that on numerous occasions from the year in which the parties were married until May 12, 1920, on which latter date they separated and ceased living together, the defendant "has treated plaintiff in an extremely cruel and inhuman manner," following which averment is a specification of certain acts of cruelty on plaintiff by the defendant in the years 1910, 1911, 1915, 1916 and 1919. It is alleged that on one of these occasions the defendant, in the presence of others, called plaintiff a "d—n fool," a "d—n b—ch," and cursed and threatened to inflict bodily injury upon her by saying, "God d—n you; I will bust your head," and threatened to kick plaintiff out of the house; that at another time, the defendant, becoming very angry at plaintiff, struck her a violent blow "over the head with his gun case," and that, on another occasion specifically mentioned in the complaint, the defendant, having been asked by plaintiff "a few friendly questions," became sullen and morose and refused to answer said questions; that thereupon plaintiff insisted on answers, when defendant became very angry, "grabbed her with both hands, and jammed her up against some shelves saying that he was going to kill her"; that at this time defendant, without cause, "twisted plaintiff's arm painfully, and cracked a bone in one of her fingers"; that in April, 1919, "while plaintiff and defendant were living near Lemoore, in said county, defendant, without cause, grabbed hold of plaintiff forcibly with his hands, and jammed her against the wall a number of times, and said that he was going to kill plaintiff"; that, during the four years immediately preceding the date of their separation, the defendant has practiced sexual abuse upon the plaintiff, by reason whereof she has become a nervous wreck. The complaint then charges generally numerous other acts of cruelty practiced upon plaintiff by defendant during the four years the couple resided in Lemoore, it being stated that, without cause, the defendant "constantly reviled plaintiff, and cursed her with the vilest language"; that defendant "has constantly been sullen and morose, without cause, around home; that he has constantly and habitually refused to talk to plaintiff, and has never talked to her except when compelled by necessity to do so." There are some other charges of cruelty in the complaint of a more or less specific nature, as to which no findings were made, and which, therefore, require no specific notice herein.

The complaint describes and specifies the value of the several pieces of real estate which it alleges is the community property of the parties, and asks for a division thereof between said parties. The defendant, by his answer, denies specifically each and every material allegation of the complaint, and, while not asking for a decree, alleges that the trouble between the parties has been due to the ungovernable temper of the plaintiff; that she would "fly into a rage and run all the hired men off the ranch, and would not allow any one to come on the ranch to work for defendant," and that she otherwise frequently so annoyed and harassed the defendant that he could not do the work on his farm which was required of him, etc.

The court found generally that, since the date of the marriage between the parties "the defendant has treated plaintiff in an extremely cruel and inhuman manner," and also specifically found that the several acts of cruelty particularized in the complaint, and which are therein alleged to have occurred in the years 1910, 1911, and 1915, were committed by the defendant as so alleged. It was further found that during the period of four years immediately preceding the date of the separation of the parties the defendant practiced sexual abuse upon plaintiff, "with the result that her nervous system was impaired thereby."

Reading the testimony in this case, without reference to the findings of the court, one could hardly dodge the conclusion that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant was, in the maintenance of their domestic relations, a paragon of amiability in disposition. The plaintiff herself admitted that, on one occasion, having been provoked by the insulting language with which the defendant addressed her, after she had asked him in a singularly civil way some very decent questions, emphasized her indignation thereat by hurling at him a china coffee cup with such accuracy of aim that it landed on the side of his face with sufficient force to inflict thereon a slight wound. This circumstance, however, does not mean that there is not sufficient corroboration of the plaintiff's testimony as to the general cruel treatment of her by the defendant during much of their married life. Indeed, she claimed and testified (and her testimony supporting this claim was corroborated by her adopted daughter) that she never at any time, including the occasion on which she hurled the coffee cup with such telling effect, betrayed ill-temper in controversies with her husband until she had become so overwrought through his gross and inhuman mistreatment of her that she was unable to control herself.

That the testimony of the plaintiff is sufficiently corroborated will readily appear from an examination of the evidence. There is no need for a detailed recapitulation herein of the testimony for the purpose of confirming this declaration. It will suffice merely to refer in a general way thereto.

The plaintiff testified that the defendant, sometimes, in the presence of persons not members of their immediate family, had, on frequent occasions, addressed to her opprobrious epithets, and cursed her, such as "God d—n you;" "you d—n b—ch," and that he had threatened to break her head, and had at different times violently struck her; that he was of a morose and sullen disposition, and very seldom would answer her with civility, sometimes not at all, when she would ask him about the business of the farm. She testified that his manner of maintaining sexual relations with her, against objection by her, was such that it resulted in the production of serious female trouble, and, consequently, in a corresponding impairment of her health.

The adopted daughter of the parties testified that she had, on two occasions, witnessed the infliction of physical violence upon the plaintiff by the defendant. One of these occasions, though, was when the plaintiff struck the defendant with the coffee cup. As to this circumstance, the little girl said that, after the cup was thrown by the plaintiff, the defendant grabbed hold of her mother and "jammed her up against the wall," and repeatedly bumped her head against the wall. She testified that the immediate cause of this particular trouble between them was that, after her mother had asked defendant some questions "in a nice way," and he had refused to answer the same, except to say to the plaintiff, "God d—n you, keep your mouth shut," the latter became very angry, and thereupon hurled the cup at defendant. The other occasion on which the witness saw the defendant use physical force on plaintiff was after the couple had retired for the night. The witness said that she heard a noise in the room occupied by the plaintiff and the defendant, and heard her mother scream, and that she (witness) then ran into the room, and saw her father in the act of choking her mother while they were in bed. The witness undertook to interfere, when the defendant ordered her from the room. The little girl further testified that "every day or so," for a long period of time prior to the date of the separation of the parties, she had heard the defendant curse the plaintiff and call her offensive names, and threaten to injure her. It is not necessary to repeat here the language which the young witness testified that she so often heard her father use towards her mother. It is sufficient to say that said language was about as vile and offensive as can well be imagined. The witness, in effect, testified that such abuses of the plaintiff by the defendant were a common occurrence.

The family physician testified that he had, in the year 1920, professionally attended the plaintiff, and upon examination found that she was suffering from severe female trouble and a general impairment of her nervous system by reason thereof, and that the "sexual abuse" which the plaintiff stated to him that defendant had habitually practiced upon her would produce the condition which he found in the plaintiff.

It should be added that the testimony tends to show that the plaintiff was a woman of education and refinement, that for a period in her life she had taught school, and that she was to some extent accomplished along musical lines.

[1, 2] Thus the evidence has been sufficiently referred to to show that, except as to the charge that the defendant practiced sexual abuse upon the plaintiff, the latter's testimony was corroborated—that is, her testimony bearing upon the charge that the defendant otherwise cruelly treated her is corroborated. The corroboration, it may be conceded, is not of her testimony as to all the acts of cruelty charged in the complaint and to the commission of which by defendant the plaintiff testified, but the corroboration does go to the testimony of the plaintiff as to many acts and words of cruelty charged in the complaint either specifically or generally, and, since from the fact that the defendant at the trial vigorously resisted, and on this appeal likewise opposes the granting of the decree to the plaintiff, it is obvious that there was and is no collusion between them to procure a divorce, the corroboration is legally sufficient. The main purpose of section 130 of the Civil Code, providing that no divorce can be granted upon the uncorroborated statement, admission, or testimony of the parties, is, as is said in Andrews v. Andrews, 120 Cal. 184, 52 Pac. 298, to prevent collusion. It is further said in that case, quoting from the syllabus:

"Where a divorce is sought on the ground of extreme cruelty, consisting of successive acts of ill treatment, it is not necessary that there should be direct testimony of other witnesses to every act sworn to by the plaintiff, but it is sufficient corroboration if a considerable number of important and material facts are testified to by other witnesses, or if there is other evidence, circumstantial or direct, which strongly tends to strengthen and confirm the statements of the plaintiff."

[3] As suggested, there can be no doubt that the testimony of the adopted daughter of the parties, if believed by the trial court, as manifestly it was, strongly tended to "strengthen and confirm the statements of the plaintiff" as to many of the acts and words of cruelty practiced by the defendant upon her. The trial court was justified in finding from the testimony of the plaintiff, as corroborated by the testimony of the adopted daughter, that the defendant had carried on a systematic abuse of the plaintiff, at least by words, if not by acts, and was further justified in finding that the cruelty thus inflicted upon the plaintiff was, when considered in view of the fact that she was a woman of education, some culture, and a corresponding degree of refinement, legally sufficient to warrant the decree.

[4] It has often been held that extreme cruelty, as specified by the law as one of the grounds upon which the married relation may be dissolved, embraces not only physical violence inflicted upon the complaining party by the other, but also any conduct in one of the married parties which may produce mental anguish or suffering in the other, or which furnishes reasonable apprehension that the continuance of the cohabitation under such circumstances might be attended with bodily harm committed by one upon the other. See Morris v. Morris, 14 Cal. 76, 73 Am. Dec. 615, and Kapp v. District Court, etc., 31 Nev. 454, 103 Pac. 235, 238. But the court in this case was also apparently justified in finding that some of the alleged acts of cruelty, consisting of the infliction of physical violence upon the plaintiff by the defendant, were sufficiently established by the proofs.

[5] We have not considered herein the testimony presented by the defendant. This we are not always required to do where the single question submitted on appeal is whether the decision of the trial court is sufficiently supported by the evidence. In such case the limit of inquiry by a reviewing court is whether there is sufficient evidentiary support to uphold the findings, and, if it be found, as we have found to be true in this case, that the decision derives such support from the evidence produced by the plaintiff, then further inquiry to that end is entirely supererogatory.

We conclude that the judgment appealed from cannot justly be disturbed, and it is therefore affirmed.

CITY NAT. BANK IN LONG BEACH v. LEMCO MFG. CO. et al. (Civ. 3895.)

Guaranty ⚡5—Guarantor of void note not liable.

One who has guaranteed payment of a note cannot be held liable when the note itself has not been executed by its purported maker and is void for want of consideration under Civ. Code, §§ 2787, 2809.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Crail, Judge.

Action by the City National Bank in Long Beach against the Lemco Manufacturing Company, Jess H. Clark, and others. From an adverse judgment, the last-named defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. G. Ames, of Anaheim, and Delmas & Brown, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

CONREY, P. J. There is no brief or appearance herein on behalf of respondent. The case is stated, and the point relied upon by appellant is presented as follows:

"The plaintiff sued as payee of a note purporting to be executed by the defendant Lemco Manufacturing Company, and guaranteed as regards payment by the defendant Clark. These defendants pleaded that the note had been signed in the name of the company without its authority, and that it was void for want of consideration. The court found the plea true; and thereupon rendered judgment in favor of the company, but against Clark for the full amount of the note. From that part of the ensuing judgment which runs against him Clark appeals. There is presented, then, for decision the single question: Can one who has guaranteed payment of a note be held liable, when the note itself has not been executed by its purported maker, and is void for want of consideration? This question admits, we think, of but one answer. The obligation of the guarantor being accessory to that of the principal obligor, it would seem to be as self-evident in law that if there is no principal there can be no accessory, as in physics it is self-evident that there can be no shadow where there is no substance. Brandt on Suretyship and Guaranty (3d Ed.) §§ 4, 19, 163, and notes."

The contention of appellant appears to be correct, and is supported by authority in this state. Civ. Code, §§ 2787, 2809; Glassell v. Coleman, 94 Cal. 260, 266, 29 Pac. 508; Kilbride v. Moss, 113 Cal. 432, 45 Pac. 812, 54 Am. St. Rep. 361.

The judgment against appellant is reversed.

Ex parte MAZURAN. (Cr. 1055.)

1. Criminal law ⚡228—Jurisdiction of the police court not divested by reason of postponement.

A departure from Pen. Code, § 861, providing that a postponement of the preliminary examination cannot be for "more than six days in all," by granting postponement beyond that period does not divest the police court of jurisdiction.

2. Habeas corpus ⚡3—Remedy for improper postponement must be asserted at time of illegal confinement.

The remedy under Pen. Code, § 861, for illegal confinement by reason of erroneous postponements lies at the time of such postponements, and not by habeas corpus after hearing and upon commitment to answer to the superior court.

Original application for writ of habeas corpus by M. J. Mazuran, on behalf of Christopher Miramontes, directed to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco. Writ denied.

A. J. Hennessy, of San Francisco, for petitioner Mazuran.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Richard E. Fitzgerald, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes before us on a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner is confined in the county jail in the city and county of San Francisco by virtue of a warrant of commitment of the police court of said city and county holding said defendant to answer before the superior court on a charge of burglary.

It is contended by appellant: First, that the police court lost jurisdiction of the case by the various postponements made in violation of section 861 of the Penal Code; and, second, that the defendant was committed without reasonable or probable cause. There is no merit in either of these contentions.

[1, 2] A postponement of the preliminary examination beyond six days, whether erroneous or not, does not divest the court of jurisdiction. As was said in People v. Van Horn, 119 Cal. 323, 51 Pac. 538:

"If the postponement worked appellants any legal wrong, such wrong consisted in their temporary illegal confinement by the officer who had them in custody, for which, if not lawful, there would have been a remedy at the time."

Furthermore, the record shows at least one continuance was given at the request of the defendant.

After a careful examination of the record before us, we are satisfied that the evidence is amply sufficient to warrant holding defendant to answer to the charge of burglary before the superior court.

The writ is discharged, and the prisoner remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

BLOCK v. CITIZENS' TRUST & SAVINGS BANK. (Civ. 3668.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⚡130(1)—Contract to give good and sufficient deed requires conveyance of good title.

A contract by a vendor of land to give a good and sufficient deed, when standing alone, refers not merely to the form of the instrument, but also requires that the vendor shall transfer a marketable title which shall be free from all reasonable doubt and clear of all incumbrances or material defects.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⚡133—Contract to give deed and certificate of title free from incumbrances by vendor does not require conveyance of clear title.

Where the contract required the vendor to execute a good and sufficient deed conveying the land, and to deliver a certificate showing title free from all incumbrances made, done, or suffered by appellant, the clause relating to the deed to be furnished must be construed with the clause relating to the certificate of title, the purpose of which was to enable the purchaser to ascertain whether the deed conveyed what he was to receive, so that the contract requires a conveyance of title free only from incumbrances made, done, or suffered by the vendor.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⚡133—Pendency of condemnation proceedings is an incumbrance, but not one made, done, or "suffered" by vendor.

The pendency of proceedings to condemn a portion of the land covered by the contract of sale constitutes an incumbrance on the property, but not an incumbrance made, done, or suffered by the vendor; the word "suffered" in that connection implying responsible control, not something caused without the act of the party and beyond his power to prevent, and therefore the pendency of such proceedings does not warrant rescission of a contract to convey the property free from incumbrances made, done, or suffered by the vendor.

Craig, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by G. F. Block against the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, to recover the purchase price of certain real property. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Randall, Bartlett & White and Walter J. Little, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover the purchase price of a certain parcel of land that defendant had agreed to convey to plaintiff, the latter claiming the title to be defective. The true construction of defendant's contract of sale is the only question involved.

The findings disclose a situation substantially as follows: On September 11, 1913, plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract whereby defendant agreed to sell and plaintiff agreed to buy a lot of land in Los Angeles county for the sum of $600, payable in certain monthly installments. The agreement contains a clause as follows:

"The first party [defendant] upon receiving payment of the full amount, * * * agrees to execute and deliver unto the party of the second part [plaintiff] a good and sufficient deed of grant conveying said land, and to deliver a good and sufficient certificate of title issued by the Title Insurance & Trust Co., showing title to said property vested in the party of the first part [defendant], free from all incumbrances, made, done, or suffered by said first party."

Plaintiff, who seems to have been put in possession immediately upon the execution of his contract to purchase, made all the payments required of him under the terms of his contract, including taxes; and on May 10, 1919, he made his final payment, which at that time was five months overdue.

On April 29, 1919, which was shortly prior to plaintiff's final payment, the Los Angeles County Flood Control District, a political subdivision of this state, commenced in the superior court for Los Angeles county an action of eminent domain to acquire by condemnation an easement in and over certain lands, including an easement in and over the westerly 60 feet of the land which defendant had agreed to convey to plaintiff. Such easement was sought by the flood control district for the purpose of providing and maintaining a fixed and definite channel for certain waters by erecting embankments and walls on the right of way sought to be condemned. The plaintiff here, the vendee, was not a party to that action. His vendor, this defendant, was, however, made a party defendant to the condemnation suit, though its time to answer therein had not expired when this action was tried. On the day when the condemnation suit was commenced, April 29, 1919, a lis pendens was recorded in the office of the county recorder, giving due notice of the pendency of that action. At the date of the trial of the present action the condemnation suit had not been set for trial. Pursuant to the power conferred by section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution, as amended on November 5, 1918, an order was made in the condemnation suit on May 14, 1919, authorizing the flood control district to take immediate possession and use of the right of way described in the eminent domain proceedings. Though the flood control district has not as yet taken actual possession of the right of way which it is seeking to obtain over the westerly 60 feet of the land in question here, it has taken constructive possession thereof.

Some time between the 19th and 25th of May, 1919, defendant tendered to plaintiff a deed, duly signed and acknowledged, and sufficient as to form, purporting to convey to plaintiff the property in question. At the same time defendant tendered to plaintiff a certificate of title, issued and executed by the Title Insurance & Trust Company of Los Angeles on May 19, 1919, certifying that the title to the whole parcel of land is vested in defendant free from all incumbrances except "an action commenced April 29, 1919, and now pending in the superior court, entitled, Los Angeles County Flood Control District v. Stephen A. Armstrong, Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, a Corporation, et al., brought to condemn the west 60 feet of said lot for the construction and maintenance of a channel for the flood waters of the Los Angeles, San Gabriel, and other rivers." The certificate of title further stated that "notice of the pendency of the said action was recorded April 29, 1919, in Book 76, p. 19, of notices of actions"; and also that "on May 15, 1919, an order was entered authorizing plaintiff [the flood control district] to take immediate possession and use of the right of way as described in the complaint [in the condemnation action], the money deposits required by law as security having been made pursuant to the order of the court."

Though defendant has continued ready and able to make his tender good, plaintiff refuses to accept the offered deed and certificate of title because of the pendency of the condemnation proceedings, the recording of the lis pendens, and the making of the order authorizing the flood control district to take possession of the right of way sought to be condemned.

Whether respondent, the vendee, is entitled to rescind his contract to purchase and recover the purchase money which he paid to appellant, the vendor, depends upon the construction that should be placed upon appellant's covenant "to execute and deliver unto the party of the second part [respondent] a good and sufficient deed of grant conveying said land, and to deliver a good and sufficient certificate of title * * * showing title to said property vested in the party of the first part [appellant], free from all incumbrances made, done, or suffered by said first party."

There are cases which lend color to the view that, where condemnation proceedings are commenced after the making of a contract of sale, but before the time for its completion by a conveyance, the institution of such proceedings will not affect the vendee's duty to complete the purchase. The reason given by the courts which adhere to this view is that the purchaser is regarded in equity as the owner from the time of the making of the contract, and, as such equitable owner, is entitled to the damages which may be awarded in the condemnation proceedings, and the exercise of the right of eminent domain confers upon the plaintiff in the condemnation suit an independent and not a derivative title. 27 R. C. L. p. 500; Nixon v. Marr, 190 Fed. 913, 111 C. C. A. 503, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1067; Clarke v. Long Island Realty Co., 126 App. Div. 282, 110 N. Y. Supp. 697. See, also, Stevenson v. Loehr, 57 Ill. 509, 11 Am. Rep. 36. Other cases take the view that, if the vendor has agreed to convey a good title, free and clear of all incumbrances, the condemnation proceeding, if pending when the time arrives for the execution of a conveyance to the vendee, constitutes an incumbrance or defect in the vendor's title justifying the purchaser in refusing to complete the purchase and giving him the right to recover the purchase price. 27 R. C. L. p. 500; Kares v. Covell, 180 Mass. 206, 62 N. E. 244, 91 Am. St. Rep. 271; Cavengaugh v. McLaughlin, 38 Minn. 83, 35 N. W. 576; Johnston v. Callery, 173 Pa. 129, 33 Atl. 1036; Miller v. Phillips & Co., 44 Wash. 226, 87 Pac. 264. The cases on both sides of the question are reviewed in the majority and dissenting opinions in Nixon v. Marr, supra. We do not find it necessary to determine which of those two conflicting views is supported by the better reasoning. We shall assume, for all the purposes of this decision, that the correct doctrine is that last stated; that is, we shall assume that, where the vendor has obligated himself to convey a good title, free and clear of all incumbrances, the pendency of condemnation proceedings at the time when the vendee becomes entitled to his deed will entitle the latter to reject the title and sue for the recovery of any purchase money that may have been paid by him to his vendor.

As we construe the language of appellant's covenant, there was no agreement to give respondent a good title, free and clear of all incumbrances. Appellant covenanted to do two things: (1) To execute "a good and sufficient deed of grant conveying said land"; and (2) to deliver a certificate of title showing title to the property vested in appellant as the vendor, free from all incumbrances "made, done, or suffered" by appellant. Though there are two parts to appellant's covenant, each part calling for the performance of a separate and distinct act, the subject-matters of the two are so correlated that the two clauses should be read together, and the intention of the parties respecting the meaning of each division of the covenant be ascertained by a consideration of the covenant as a whole, each clause throwing an illuminating light upon the other and disclosing the exact limits of the covenant and the true meaning of appellant's promise to execute "a good and sufficient deed." The whole question is one of intention, to be ascertained by a consideration of all the language used by the parties.

[1] If, instead of covenanting to execute a good and sufficient deed, and to give a certificate of title showing title in itself free and clear of all incumbrances "made, done, or suffered" by it, appellant had simply covenanted to execute "a good and sufficient deed," making no mention of any certificate of title, we would have had no trouble in construing appellant's covenant as meaning that the parties intended that a good and sufficient title should be conveyed as well as that a deed good and sufficient in form should be executed; for the doctrine recognized by the later authorities is that, as a general rule, a covenant simply calling for a good and sufficient deed goes not merely to the form of the instrument, but also requires that the vendor shall transfer a good title, i. e., a marketable title, such as shall be free from all reasonable doubt and clear of all incumbrances or material defects. 27 R. C. L. p. 486; 11 Am. Dec. 34 et seq., note to Porter v. Noyes; 39 Cyc. 1446; Haynes v. White, 55 Cal. 38.

[2] Or if, instead of covenanting to execute "a good and sufficient deed," appellant had expressly covenanted to execute a good and sufficient deed, and to convey a good title, its express promise to convey a good title doubtless would have been construed as calling for such title, even though the covenant also contained a provision that appellant, as vendor, would furnish a certificate showing title vested in itself free only from incumbrances "made, done, or suffered" by it. But appellant did not expressly covenant to give a good title. It covenanted to execute a good and sufficient deed, and to furnish a certificate of title that was not required to show the title free of all incumbrances, but only of such incumbrances as might be "made, done, or suffered" by appellant. And, though a covenant to execute "a good and sufficient deed" is usually construed as calling for the conveyance of a good title, nevertheless the context may show a contrary intention, as we think it does in the present case. When appellant's undertaking to give a "good and sufficient deed" is read in the light of the contextual undertaking to furnish respondent with a certificate showing title in appellant free from incumbrances made, done, or suffered by the latter, it is clear that in this case the parties intended, by their use of the words "good and sufficient deed," no more than a grant conveying to respondent a title free from such incumbrances as might have been made, done, or suffered by appellant; that is, free from such incumbrances as the certificate of title was required to show. This is so because the very object of a certificate of title is to enable the vendee to pass upon the validity of the title for which he is bargaining. It is to enable him to know if he can get what he has purchased, and whether his vendor has and can convey all he has undertaken to sell. Mead v. Fox, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 199, 201. Though this Massachusetts Case presents the reverse of the situation that we have here, it is quite in point with respect to the construction which should be placed on appellant's covenant. It has been held in Massachusetts from an early date, as it formerly was in this state (Brown v. Covillaud, 6 Cal. 566, 573, Green v. Covillaud, 10 Cal. 317, 322, 70 Am. Dec. 725) that a covenant for "a good and sufficient deed" relates to the form and execution of the deed, and not to the title (Aiken v. Sanford, 5 Mass. 494). But in Mead v. Fox, supra, it was held that, because the parties stipulated that the vendee should have "ten days to examine the title," it manifestly was their intention that the vendors should convey a good and clear title, the court saying:

"By the terms of the sale, ten days were allowed purchasers to examine the title. Purchasers could have no other object in examining the title, than to see if the plaintiffs could make a good title; and there could be no object whatever in ascertaining whether or not the plaintiffs could make a good title, unless they were bound to make such title, and the purchaser was entitled to have a good and clear title made to him, in order to bind him to the performance of his contract of purchase. The purchaser was allowed time to examine the title, to see if he could get what he had purchased, and whether the plaintiffs actually had and could convey what they had undertaken to sell."

By a parity of reasoning, it should be held that in the present case the purpose of the certificate of title was to enable the purchaser to see if he could get what he had purchased and whether his vendor had and could convey what he had agreed to sell, and that, therefore, the parties contemplated the conveyance of such title as was to be shown by the certificate of title, namely, a title free only of incumbrances made, done, or suffered by appellant.

[3] That the pendency of a condemnation action is an "incumbrance," but that it is not one which is "made, done, or suffered" by the vendor, seems obvious. If any authority be needed for the proposition that the pendency of condemnation proceedings constitutes an incumbrance, it may be found in the reasoning pursued by Circuit Judge Sanborn in his dissenting opinion in Nixon v. Marr, supra. It is not, however, an incumbrance that is "made" or "done" by the vendor; nor is it one that is "suffered" by him. An incumbrance upon property suffered by the vendor means one within his power or duty to avoid. "Suffer," in this connection, implies responsible control; and it cannot be held to apply to a thing not caused by the act of the party nor within his power to prevent. Crist v. Fife, 41 Cal. App. 511, 183 Pac. 197; Smith v. Eigerman, 5 Ind. App. 269, 31 N. E. 862, 51 Am. St. Rep. 281.

For the foregoing reasons we conclude: (1) That appellant undertook, not to execute a deed conveying the title free and clear of any and every incumbrance, but to execute a deed conveying the title free of all incumbrances "made, done, or suffered" by appellant; (2) that neither the pendency of the condemnation suit nor the order authorizing the plaintiff therein to take possession of the easement which it was seeking to condemn was an incumbrance "made, done, or suffered" by appellant; and (3) that, as a consequence, the deed which appellant tendered to respondent would convey to the latter all the title that appellant, as vendor, had agreed to convey. It follows, therefore, that, upon the facts found by the court below, the judgment should have been in appellant's favor.

The judgment is reversed, and the lower court is instructed to enter a judgment on the findings adjudging that plaintiff take nothing by his action and that defendant recover its costs.

WORKS, J., concurs.

CRAIG, J. I dissent. As is stated in the opinion of the majority of the court, the appellant, the vendor in the contract, covenanted to do two things: First, to execute "a good and sufficient deed of grant conveying said land"; second, to "deliver a good and sufficient certificate of title * * * showing title to said property vested in the party of the first part free from all incumbrances made, done, or suffered by said first party." The dispute between the parties upon this appeal centers upon the construction of the provisions above quoted. The appellant concedes that, if he had simply agreed to deliver a good and sufficient deed without mentioning the character of the title to be conveyed, a stipulation would exist by implication that the deed must carry with it a good and sufficient title. Haynes v. White, 55 Cal. 38. 39 Cyc. 1446, is authority for this proposition. But it is argued that the provision, "and to deliver a good and sufficient certificate of title showing title to said property vested in the party of the first part free from all incumbrances made, done, or suffered by said first party," is a qualification of the phrase just preceding it, to wit, "agrees to execute and deliver to the party of the second part, a good and sufficient deed of grant conveying said land." However, the plain meaning of the entire provision under consideration, governed by rules of grammatical construction, is that the vendor was to do two distinct and independent acts. The purpose of the provision for a certificate of title is not merely to describe the kind of title required. Such a stipulation was unnecessary. It had been definitely defined by the agreement to execute "a good and sufficient deed of grant conveying said land." The intention of the parties concerning a requirement for a certificate of title is rather to be ascertained by a consideration of the following well-recognized legal principles.

The rule in the purchase of land is caveat emptor. In the absence of an agreement by the vendor to furnish an abstract or certificate of title it is incumbent upon the purchaser to provide the same, and to satisfy himself as to the condition of the title. Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 27 Pac. 280, 25 Am. St. Rep. 123. The object of an abstract is to benefit the purchaser and to enable him or his counsel to pass more readily upon the sufficiency of the title. Kane v. Rippey et al., 22 Or. 296, 23 Pac. 180; Taylor v. Williams, 2 Colo. App. 559, 31 Pac. 504. In the case last cited it was further held that a provision for the delivery by the vendor "of warranty deed conveying clear title with abstract" was not complied with by proof that the title was in fact complete and perfect. The court held that the contract was to furnish a certain abstract, and not merely good title. Smith v. Taylor, 82 Cal. 538, 23 Pac. 217, is another case of the same character. The contract called for an abstract of title which would show good title. The vendor furnished an abstract of title which showed defects. Upon the trial he claimed the right to show that the claims of persons appearing in the abstract which constituted the apparent defects were groundless. The court held that, under the contract there in question, proof of the actual condition of the title was inadmissible to show compliance with the stipulation that the abstract should show good title. In Kane v. Rippey, supra, the contract provided that the vendor should convey "in fee simple, clear of all incumbrances, by a good and sufficient warranty deed and abstract of title." The court held that by this stipulation the vendor agreed to convey a good title free from all incumbrances whatsoever, and to furnish an abstract of such title, and that the abstract which was furnished was admissible in evidence, not, however, for the purpose of proving title, but to show the condition of the abstract itself. From these cases it is apparent that the covenants for good title and for abstract of title are not interdependent.

As to whether or not any abstract of title shall be required is purely a matter of contract between the parties. Where the vendor agrees to the purchase "with abstract showing good title," this refers to record title only. However, the contract sued upon in Moot v. Business Men's Ass'n, 157 N. Y. 201, 52 N. E. 1, 45 L. R. A. 666, provided for a search as to the actual title and not as to the record title of the property in question. It is obvious that the nature and scope of the certificate of title is purely a matter of agreement. In the instant case the parties expressly stipulated that the vendor should not only execute and deliver to the vendee "a good and sufficient deed of grant conveying said land," but also deliver to the vendee "a good and sufficient certificate of title issued by the Title Insurance & Trust Company showing title to said property vested in the party of the first part free from all incumbrances made, done, or suffered by said first party." The purpose of the latter requirement for a certificate of title was to relieve the vendee from the necessity of investigating the public records of the county concerning the existence of any incumbrances "made, done, or suffered by the vendor." As to all other incumbrances, however, the vendee impliedly agreed to make his own investigation, and the rule caveat emptor applies. In our endeavor to discover the intention of the parties another fact worthy of consideration, and one which can hardly be in doubt, is that the vendee would not have signed a contract to this purchase lot, being an ordinary residence lot 50 by 130 feet, with the expectation and understanding that the vendor might only convey to him a lot 50 by 70 feet. If this is true, unless the language of the contract necessarily requires such a construction, a court of equity should not interpret it in such a manner as to force the vendee to accept a piece of property which he obviously had no intention of buying. I conclude that the provision of the contract concerning the furnishing of a certificate of title does not relieve the vendor from the obligation to supply "a good and sufficient deed of grant conveying said land," which means that the vendor must have good and sufficient title, one complete and perfect for alienation; that although the provision concerning the certificate of title may have been complied with by the vendor, the stipulation to execute and deliver a good and sufficient deed of grant conveying the land required the vendor to possess and tender a good and sufficient title. Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 27 Pac. 280, 25 Am. St. Rep. 123, and Whittier v. Gormley, 3 Cal. App. 489, 86 Pac. 726. The pendency of the condemnation proceeding, the lis pendens, and the order of the court giving the flood control district possession of the strip being condemned are clearly such defects of title as to violate the agreement in that respect. If authority is needed for this proposition, Prentice v. Erskine, 164 Cal. 446, and Koshland v. Spring, 116 Cal. 689, 48 Pac. 58, supply it. Appellant attempts to distinguish these cases from the one at bar upon the ground that the defects in the title existed at the time of the execution of each of the contracts. The vendor having contracted to deliver a good title, no reason is suggested, nor do we perceive any to exist, relieving the vendor from a violation of his covenant because of the fact that such violation is due to an occurrence taking place subsequent to the time that the contract was executed.

1. Municipal corporations — 636—Jurisdiction over person can be acquired by consent of defendant.

Where the court had jurisdiction over the subject-matter of a prosecution for violation of a city ordinance, it could acquire jurisdiction of the person of defendant by his consent, or by his failure to object to such jurisdiction in time.

2. Arrest — 63(3)—Officers can arrest without warrant for possession of liquors in their presence.

The unlawful possession of alcoholic liquors is a continuing public offense, so that a peace officer may arrest without a warrant a person having possession of such liquor in the immediate presence of the officer.

3. Criminal law — 394—Evidence obtained by unlawful seizure is admissible.

Even though a search of defendants' premises without a warrant was unlawful, the evidence of possession of liquors so unlawfully obtained was admissible against defendants.

4. Arrest — 63(3)—Officers may make arrest for offense in their presence, though unlawfully on the premises.

The fact that officers were unlawfully on the premises of defendant does not divest them of their statutory authority to arrest for an offense committed in their presence while they were there.

Application by Lucio Ajuria and another for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the sheriff of Yuba county to secure their release from custody, after conviction of a violation of an ordinance of the city of Marysville prohibiting the possession of intoxicating liquors. Writ denied.

W. E. Davis, of Marysville, for petitioners.

FINCH, P. J. The petitioners were convicted of the violation of an ordinance of the city of Marysville and sentenced to pay fines and to be imprisoned in the county jail. They herein seek their discharge upon a writ of habeas corpus. The petition does not set out the terms of the ordinance or state the offense of which the petitioners were convicted, other than that it was a misdemeanor. It may be inferred from the facts alleged, however, that they were found guilty of having wine in their possession contrary to the terms of the ordinance.

that thereupon, without a warrant and without a complaint having been filed charging the defendants with the commission of any offense, the officers arrested them and took them to the police station; that three days later a complaint was filed charging the defendants with the misdemeanor of which they were later convicted; that no warrant of arrest was ever issued out of the police court or served upon the defendants, and that by reason of the failure to so issue and serve a warrant the police court did not acquire jurisdiction of the persons of defendants; and that thereafter the defendants were tried and convicted. In his points and authorities, counsel for petitioners states that on their arrest they were released on bail; but the petition does not so allege. It does not appear that petitioners made any objection to the jurisdiction of the police court at any stage of the proceedings. There can be no contention that the court did not have jurisdiction of the offense charged. Jurisdiction of the offense cannot be acquired by consent, but "everywhere jurisdiction of the person of the defendant may be acquired by consent of the accused or by waiver of objections. If he fail to make his objection in time, he will be deemed to have waived it. He cannot, for instance, raise such a question for the first time in the appellate court." 8 R. C. L. 96; 16 C. J. 174.

[2, 3] It is contended that the officers were not authorized to make the arrest without a warrant. A peace officer may make an arrest without a warrant for a public offense committed in his presence. The unlawful possession of alcoholic liquors is a continuing offense. The defendants were in possession of the wine in the immediate presence of the officers. It is not perceived why the officers were not as fully authorized to make the arrest without a warrant as they would have been had they seen the defendants on a street corner with the wine in their possession. Jenkins v. State, 4 Ga. App. 859, 62 S. E. 574. The search of the premises without a warrant was unlawful, but the evidence so unlawfully obtained was admissible against the defendants. People v. Mayen (Cal. Sup.) 205 Pac. 435.

[4] For like reasons had the officers may have been unlawfully on the premises could not divest them of their statutory authority to arrest for an offense committed in their presence while there. Petitioners rely on People v. Howard, 13 Misc. Rep. 763, 35 N. Y. Supp. 233, and People v. James, 11 App. Div. 609, 43 N. Y. Supp. 315, in support of their contention that a conviction cannot be upheld where the arrest was made, without a warrant, for a misdemeanor not committed in the presence of the arresting officer. In the first case, decided by the Court of Special Sessions of Albany county, the objection to the court's jurisdiction was made and sustained on the arraignment of the defendant. In the other case, no information was filed and no warrant of arrest issued. In the case of People v. Park (Erie County Court) 92 Misc. Rep. 369, 156 N. Y. Supp. 816, where the defendant was arrested, without a warrant, for a misdemeanor not committed in the presence of the arresting officer, the court reviewed the cases cited by petitioners and many others and affirmed the judgment, holding that the court acquired jurisdiction of the defendant when she was brought before it charged with the offense, regardless of the illegality of the arrest. It may be further stated that in that case objection to the court's jurisdiction was made at the time of the trial. See, also, People v. Pratt, 78 Cal. 345, 20 Pac. 731, and Ex parte Clark, 85 Cal. 203, 24 Pac. 726.

The petition for the writ is denied.

(Supreme Court of California. May 22, 1922.)

1. Habeas corpus ☞85(1)—Complaint charging offense not brought before Supreme Court is presumed to have been sufficient.

Where the complaint on which applicants for writ of habeas corpus were tried and convicted is not presented to the court to which application is made, it is presumed that it sufficiently charged the offense.

2. Intoxicating liquors ☞17—City ordinance making unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors is valid.

A city ordinance declaring it unlawful for any person to have in his possession any intoxicating liquors is valid.

3. Criminal law ☞562—Conviction for possession of liquors is not void because liquors were seized without warrant.

A conviction of possession of intoxicating liquors contrary to a city ordinance is not void, because the liquor was found on defendant's premises without a warrant to search such premises having previously been obtained.

Application by Lucio Ajuria and another for a writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the sheriff of Yuba county to secure the release of petitioners from custody, after conviction of violation of an ordinance of the city of Marysville prohibiting the possession of intoxicating liquor. Writ denied. See, also, 207 Pac. 515.

W. E. Davies, of Marysville, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM. The petitioners are imprisoned after conviction upon a charge of violating an ordinance of the city of Marysville declaring it unlawful for any person to have in his possession any intoxicating liquors.

[1, 2] The complaint on which they were convicted is not presented to us, and we must therefore presume that it sufficiently charges the offense. We have heretofore had similar attacks made upon local ordinances of this character, and our decisions therein are against the petitioners on all the points presented in this case with relation to the validity of this ordinance. See In re Polizzotto (Cal. Sup.) 205 Pac. 676; People v. Collins (Cal. App.) 202 Pac. 344; People v. Capelli (Cal. App.) 203 Pac. 837; Ex parte Kinney (Cal. App.) 200 Pac. 967, and Ex parte Volpi (Cal. App.) 199 Pac. 1090.

[3] The claim that the judgment is void because the intoxicating liquor was found on the premises without previously having obtained a search warrant for the discovery thereof is answered by the decision in People v. Mayen (Cal. Sup.) 205 Pac. 435. On the authority of these cases the petition is denied.

RAMSAY v. RODGERS et al. (S. F. 10220.)

1. Appeal and error ☞631—Motion to dismiss appeal denied, where clerk's typewritten copy of judgment roll had been filed.

Where appellant had filed the clerk's typewritten copy of the judgment roll, a motion to dismiss the appeal was denied, since, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 950, 953, a clerk's certificate is ordinarily a sufficient authentication, and, as printing of the record is not necessary under section 953c, where prepared under section 953a, as amended in 1915, and the latter section, in providing that a transcript of the proceedings made by the official reporter and authenticated by the trial judge becomes a portion of the judgment roll, requires only the proceeding at the trial to be so authenticated and prepared.

2. Appeal and error ☞672 — Judgment roll held sufficient record for review.

The judgment roll alone is a sufficient record for the review of all rulings which appear thereon and of the sufficiency of the pleadings and findings to support the judgment.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by T. H. Ramsay against Elizabeth A. Rodgers and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. On motion to dismiss appeal. Motion denied.

John E. Bennett, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Creed, Jones & Dall, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, C. J. The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal on the ground that no transcript, prepared and authenticated as required by law, has been filed within the time allowed by the rules of this court.

[1] Prior to the filing of the notice of motion to dismiss the appeal, the appellants had procured from the clerk of the superior court and had filed in this court a transcript of the papers included in the judgment roll, duly certified by the clerk of said superior court. We are of the opinion that, under the rules of court and the law as they now exist, this is a sufficient compliance with the law and with our rules. Section 950 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, on appeal from a final judgment, the appellant must furnish the court with a copy of the notice of appeal, the judgment roll, and any bill of exceptions upon which he relies. Section 953 provides that the copies provided for in section 950 must be certified to be correct by the clerk or the attorneys. A certificate of the clerk is therefore a sufficient authentication. Our rules require the printing of the judgment roll, except when it is prepared under section 953a. Section 953a, as amended in 1915, provides that any person desiring to appeal from any judgment may, in lieu of a bill of exceptions "or for the purpose of presenting a record on appeal from any appealable judgment or order, or for the purpose of having reviewed any matter or order reviewable on appeal from final judgment," procure a transcript of the proceedings had at the trial, to be made up by the official reporter, and to be settled and authenticated by the judge of the superior court, and that, when so settled and allowed, such transcript shall "become a portion of the judgment roll." The portions of the section first quoted authorizes a record under the provisions of section 953a for the purpose of presenting an appeal from the judgment.

of the record, must transmit it to the court to which the appeal is taken, and that no transcript thereof need be printed. It will be observed that section 953a does not require the judge of the superior court to settle and certify the judgment roll, nor does it require the official reporter to make a typewritten record thereof, in pursuance of the notice to be given thereunder. His transcript includes only the testimony offered or taken, evidence offered or received, and the rulings and other proceedings on the trial, but does not include the pleadings, finding, or judgment. The preparation and certification of those documents are not provided for, but are to be prepared in accordance with section 950 and certified in accordance with section 953. Section 953c, however, provides that, on appeals from judgments and other appealable orders, when the record is prepared under section 953a, it must be filed and need not be printed.

In the present case the appellants proceeded under section 953a, but failed to procure a reporter's transcript, and succeeded only in getting the clerk's transcript of the judgment roll. Formerly, under section 953a before it was amended so as to include the passage first above quoted, it had been decided that a judgment roll alone could not, under our rule, be presented in typewriting. Harpold v. Slocum, 168 Cal. 364, 143 Pac. 609; Lapique v. Plummer, 33 Cal. App. 317, 165 Pac. 56. We think that, by fair intendment, the Code as it now stands allows the filing of a typewritten transcript of the judgment in cases where an attempt has been made to proceed under section 953a and the appellant has failed to procure the reporter's transcript of the proceedings and evidence at the trial, and that the former decisions do not apply to the present rules and statute. Such has been the consistent practice ever since the amendment of section 953a in 1915. The point was expressly so decided by this court in denying a petition for rehearing after the decision of the District Court of Appeal in McKinnell v. Hansen, 34 Cal. App. 76, 81, 167 Pac. 887, where we held that, under rule VII, subdivision 2, an appeal on the judgment roll, prepared under section 953a, may be presented on a typewritten transcript. See, also, Beckett v. Stuart, 35 Cal. App. 797, 171 Pac. 107.

The filing of the typewritten record in the present case, prior to the giving of the notice to dismiss the appeal, removes the ground upon which the notice to dismiss is founded.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

PEOPLE v. SMITH. (Cr. 2404.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1922.)

1. Witnesses  405(2)—Denial by defendant he had been employed as card dealer held collateral in prosecution for causing delinquency.

In a prosecution for causing delinquency of a minor by dealing cards to him in a gambling game, the question, asked defendant on cross-examination, whether he had previously been employed as a card dealer by the same club, while it was at a different location, related to a matter which the prosecution could not prove as original evidence, so that it was error to permit the prosecution to contradict defendant's denial.

2. Criminal law  1186(4)—Immaterial evidence admitted to impeach defendant held not prejudicial; "miscarriage of justice."

Where defendant admitted he had followed gambling for livelihood, and had dealt black jack in another state, but denied dealing to a minor, error in permitting the state to contradict his denial that he had been employed as a black jack dealer by the same club at a different location was not so prejudicial that an affirmation of the conviction would result in a miscarriage of justice, within Pen. Code, §§ 960, 1258, 1404, and Const. art. 6, § 4½.

3. Criminal law  1172(6)—Witnesses  248(2)—Instruction on alibi held not required by evidence, so that error therein was harmless; answer held not responsive to question.

Where the only evidence to support an alibi was defendant's statement, in answer to a question whether he dealt black jack to the prosecuting witness on the date in question, that he never dealt black jack in the house, which was not responsive to the question, there was no evidence to show alibi, so that error in an instruction cautioning the jury against a fabricated defense of alibi was not prejudicial.

4. Criminal law  1186(4)—Mistake in commitment as to name of minor, whose delinquency was caused is merely clerical.

Where defendant was charged with contributing to the delinquency of James E. Edmonds, the fact that the order of commitment or preliminary examination gave the name of the minor as James E. Edwards, was purely a clerical error, insufficient to justify a reversal on the ground that the information did not charge the offense set out in the order of commitment, as required by Pen. Code, §§ 809, 872.

5. Criminal law  1170(2)—Exclusion of testimony witness had been mistaken in identification of another as associated with defendant held not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for contributing to juvenile delinquency, where the minor had identified defendant as one who dealt cards to him in gambling game, the exclusion of evidence, offered by defendant, that the minor had identified as a participant in the game another who was not in the city at the time was not prejudicial to accused, where the minor was asked at the trial of accused whether he had seen that other at the place in question, and had replied that he did not suppose so, because the other had been acquitted of ever having been there.

6. Criminal law  692—Erroneous admission of conclusion of witness held waived by failure to cross-examine thereon.

Error in permitting a witness for the prosecution to state his conclusion that detectives who shadowed him were employed by defendant, over defendant's objection, was waived, where the court, in admitting the evidence, suggested that defendant could cross-examine the witness as to the basis for the conclusion, and defendant failed to act on the court's suggestion.

7. Criminal law  1169(2)—Admission of evidence that place in which defendant was employed was gambling house held not prejudicial.

The admission of evidence that the club in which defendant was employed had the reputation of being a gambling house, if erroneous, was not prejudicial to accused, where the prosecuting witness testified he was directed to that club by a taxi driver, from whom he inquired where he could find a game, and was admitted without identification and without a membership card, and defendant admitted he had formerly been employed by and was a frequenter of the club, so that he must have had knowledge of its character.

8. Infants  20—Evidence in prosecution for contributing to delinquency held admissible to show knowledge of character of club wherein minor was allowed to gamble.

In a prosecution for contributing to juvenile delinquency by dealing cards to a minor in a gambling game, evidence that the club by which defendant was employed had been raided by the police as a gambling house, while it was maintained at another location, was competent to show defendant's knowledge of the character of the club, which was the same organization, notwithstanding the change of location.

9. Infants  20—Evidence held to sustain verdict finding defendant contributed to delinquency of minor.

In a prosecution for contribution to the delinquency of a minor, evidence that defendant dealt cards and sold chips to the minor in a gambling game, and talked with him during the game, though he did not ask the minor to play or gamble, is sufficient to sustain a conviction, notwithstanding an instruction to find defendant not guilty if the minor went on the premises without inducement or persuasion by defendant and engaged in gambling there.

10. Criminal law  361(3)—Evidence of defendant's preparations to entrap prosecuting witness in attempting to bribe held inadmissible.

Where prosecuting witness had visited the defendant on several occasions before the trial, and claimed defendant was attempting to bribe him to leave the jurisdiction, while defendant claimed the witness was attempting to extort blackmail, evidence that on one occasion, when the witness was expected at defendant's home, defendant had photographers present to take pictures showing the witness entering the house and leaving it, and also had a detective and stenographer to report the conversation, though it would have shown defendant's suspicion of the witness' purpose, had no bearing on the witness' frame of mind, and was properly excluded.

11. Infants — 12—Provision of Juvenile Court Law, making it a misdemeanor to contribute to delinquency, is constitutional.

The provision of Juvenile Court Law, § 21, making it a misdemeanor to commit any act which causes or tends to cause a minor to become such a person as is described in section 1, subd. 11, of the act, is constitutional.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Samuel Smith was convicted of causing a minor to perform an act or follow a course of conduct which would tend to cause him to become a delinquent, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank J. Murphy, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LAWLOR, J. The defendant, Samuel Smith, appeals from a judgment of conviction of a misdemeanor triable in the superior court, in having violated section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law (Stats. 1915, p. 1225), to the effect that any one who shall commit any act which causes or tends to cause any minor under the age of 21 years, among other things, to become such a person as is described in subdivision 11 of section 1 of said act, or any person who by any act, threat, command, or persuasion induces or endeavors to induce any such minor to perform any act, to follow any course of conduct, or to so live as would cause or tend to cause him to become or remain a person coming within the provisions, among others, of said subdivision 11, shall be guilty of such a misdemeanor.

Appellant was charged by information with the violation of this statute, in that he induced, persuaded, and encouraged James E. Edmonds, then of the age of 16 years, to frequent a public gambling house, to wit, the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club, at 32 Turk street, in the city and county of San Francisco, and there engage in the playing of cards and other games of chance for money. It was alleged these acts of appellant tended to and did encourage Edmonds to become such a person as is described in subdivision 11 of section 1 of the Juvenile Court Law, to wit, a person under the age of 21 years, who is leading, or is in danger of leading, an idle, dissolute, and immoral life.

It appears that Edmonds, whose home was in New Orleans, left that city and came to San Francisco, unaccompanied by and without the consent of his parents. His first visit to the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club was on the night of October 28, 1920; he having been directed there by a taxicab driver. He was admitted to the club after he told the doorkeeper he was 22 years old. Edmonds testified that on the occasion of his first visit appellant, who was a member of the club, was present, but that no conversation passed between them. The two succeeding nights Edmonds again visited the club, and, according to his testimony, appellant was dealing black jack there on both those nights, in which games Edmonds played, and during which he talked to appellant. Edmonds also returned to the club on the nights of October 30 and November 1, but did not remember seeing appellant on those visits. He testified that he played cards on each of the five nights, and that he lost in all something over $700. Appellant denied he was employed by the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club at the times Edmonds visited it, and that he ever dealt black jack at 32 Turk street.

1. We shall first consider appellant's contention that the court erred in allowing him, after he had testified in his own behalf, to be impeached by another witness concerning asserted collateral matter brought out on cross-examination. We quote from appellant's testimony on his direct examination:

"Q. Have you ever been employed in a place where they played cards for money? A. I have. Q. Where? A. In Nevada—different states. Q. Have you ever been employed in San Francisco? A. In clubrooms here; yes, sir. Q. Where? A. 225 Ellis street [the former location of the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club]."

On cross-examination he testified:

"Q. Isn't it a fact that you dealt black jack in the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club when it was located at 325 Ellis street? A. 225 Ellis? Q. When it was on Ellis street? A. No, sir. * * * Q. And you now say under oath, Mr. Smith, that while you were working for the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club, when it was located on Ellis street, that you did not deal black jack? A. No sir. * * * Q. How long previous to July of 1920 [when it moved to 32 Turk street] had it been that you were employed by this Thirty-Third Assembly District Club? A. Possibly two years."

None of this testimony was objected to. The following testimony was given in rebuttal by John C. Miles, a police officer:

"Where did you first see him [appellant]? A. 225 Ellis street. Q. When? A. Oh, various times, and often between 1917 and 1918. * * * Q. Do you know what his occupation was there? A. Why that of a card dealer.

* * * Q. What kind of a game was he dealing?

"Mr. Murphy: I will object to that upon the ground it is calling for impeaching testimony upon a collateral matter.

"The Court: I will allow the question. A. I have seen him dealing California stud poker and black jack; that is all."

The court had previously stated in regard to the admission of the impeaching testimony:

"I am willing to have this go in, provided, first, that it is on the matter of occupation, and that the witness knows that it is on the matter of occupation."

In People v. Chin Mook Sow, 51 Cal. 597, 600, it was said:

"It is a well-settled rule that a witness cannot be cross-examined as to any fact which is collateral and irrelevant to the issue, merely for the purpose of contradicting him by other evidence, if he should deny it, thereby to discredit his testimony. And if a question is put to a witness on cross-examination which is collateral or irrelevant to the issue, his answer cannot be contradicted by the party who asked him the question; but it is conclusive against him. But when the question asked on cross-examination calls for a response in respect to a matter which the party asking the question would have a right to prove as an independent fact, the rule does not apply."

See, also, People v. Dye, 75 Cal. 108, 16 Pac. 537.

[1] It was held in People v. Niles, 44 Mich. 606, 7 N. W. 192, that, unexplained, testimony concerning the occupations of a defendant in a criminal case was irrelevant. In State v. Blassengame, 132 La. 250, 61 South. 219, the court held that the circumstances of a case might make such evidence relevant. It is true that counsel for appellant, in the case at bar, brought up the subject of appellant's occupations, evidently to present him in the most favorable light before the jury. In his opening statement he had said he would show appellant had been engaged in many occupations—"all ordinarily referred to as legitimate hard work, and that he has also engaged in playing cards, following an injury, after which he has spent much of his time as a card player," and that "he was not employed at any time in the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club." Since appellant brought up the subject of his occupations, and testified on direct examination that he had been employed at 225 Ellis street, it was proper on cross-examination to question him as to the nature of such employment. In fact, this was not objected to. But it does not follow that such evidence was relevant, and not collateral. It has not been made to appear that the testimony as to his past occupations was relevant to the main issue, or was such a matter as the prosecution might have proved as an independent fact as a part of its case in chief. In our opinion, evidence that appellant, two years before the commission of the crime in question, was employed as a black jack dealer, even by the same employer, was but proof of a prior wrongful act, unconnected with the crime charged. Such evidence would ordinarily not be relevant (Jones on Evidence, vol. 1, § 143), nor a proper subject of impeachment (Steen v. Santa Clara Valley, etc., Co., 134 Cal. 355, 66 Pac. 321), and it has not been shown to be relevant to any issue in this case. The ruling was therefore erroneous.

[2] It remains for us to consider whether an affirmation of the judgment, in view of this error, would result in a miscarriage of justice. An examination of the record satisfies us that the verdict was not affected by this ruling. It is plain from the evidence that the jury believed Edmonds told the truth when he testified as to appellant's connection with two of the games in which he participated, and also that such conduct on the part of appellant constituted a violation of the statute. Appellant admitted that he had followed gambling for a livelihood, that he had dealt black jack, denying, however, that he had done so in this state. It must be assumed, from the evidence as a whole and the adverse verdict, that the jury did not accept this qualification, but believed from all the circumstances that he dealt black jack for the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club, and that he did so on the occasions testified to by Edmonds. Appellant's testimony was in direct conflict with that of Edmonds, and when it is considered that the latter's testimony was vigorously attacked from every angle, and that no effort was spared to impeach it, it cannot reasonably be concluded that the item of impeaching testimony prejudicially affected the jury on the point whether appellant dealt black jack at 32 Turk street when Edmonds was present. Pen. Code, §§ 960, 1258, 1404; Const. § 4½, art. 6.

[3] 2. Appellant's next claim is that the court erred in giving the following instruction on the subject of alibi:

"The defendant could not have been in two places at the same time, and in this contradiction of witnesses the jury have to determine for themselves where lies the truth. In so judging they will take into consideration the appearance and apparent candor and fairness of the respective witnesses, the probability of their statements, its coincidence with other facts or features of the case which they may deem established, and, generally, those rules of ordinary experience and general observation by which intelligent men decide as to controverted propositions of fact. The effect of an alibi, when established, is like that of any other conclusive fact presented in a case, showing, as it does, that the party asserting it could not have been present at the time of the commission of the crime alleged in the indictment, and therefore did not participate in it—is, when credited, a defense of the most conclusive and satisfactory character.

"The fact, however, which experience has shown, that an alibi as a defense is capable of being, and has been occasionally, successfully fabricated; that, even when wholly false, its detection may be a matter of very great difficulty; and that the temptation to resort to this as a spurious defense may be very great, especially in cases of importance—these are considerations attendant upon this defense which call for some special suggestions upon the part of the court.

"These are that, while you are not to hesitate at giving this as a defense full weight—that conclusive effect to which, when established, it is justly entitled, either as entirely satisfying you of the innocence of the defendant, or as creating a reasonable doubt, which entitles the defendant to an acquittal—still you are to scrutinize the testimony offered in the support of an alibi with care, that you may be satisfied that a fabricated defense is not being imposed upon you."

This instruction, although the same as that approved in People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 552, 11 Pac. 183, was disapproved in People v. Levine, 85 Cal. 39, 22 Pac. 969, 24 Pac. 631, and People v. Lattimore, 86 Cal. 403, 24 Pac. 1091, and in People v. Roberts, 122 Cal. 377, 55 Pac. 137, a similar instruction was held to be reversible error, upon the grounds that it constituted a charge upon the weight of the evidence, and that it cast the burden of proof upon the defendant. However, we are of the opinion that the state of the evidence in the case at bar renders the error harmless. Appellant correctly states that—

"It must be remembered that the appellant was the only witness who testified as to the alibi in this case."

An examination of the transcript shows that, although he did state he had never seen Edmonds prior to his arrest, his only testimony approaching the subject of alibi was as follows:

"Q. From the 20th day of October to the 2d day of November, were you employed at the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club? A. I was not. Q. Were you there, on any of those days above mentioned, inclusive, dealing black jack? A. I never dealt black jack in the house."

The answer given is not responsive to the question, and does not tend to show whether appellant was or was not present at the time and place of the alleged commission of the crime. The instruction was therefore not applicable, and hence appellant was not prejudiced thereby. People v. Walsh, 43 Cal. 447.

[4] 3. Appellant assigns error to the refusal of the trial court to set aside the information on the ground that it did not charge the offense set out in the order of commitment. Pen. Code, §§ 809, 872; People v. Lee Look, 137 Cal.

590, 70 Pac. 660; People v. Nogiri, 142 Cal. 596, 76 Pac. 490; People v. Parker, 91 Cal. 91, 27 Pac. 537. The complaint was filed and the preliminary examination conducted in the juvenile department of the superior court, and charged an offense of contributing to the delinquency of James E. Edmonds. The order of commitment gave the name of the minor as James E. Edwards, and the information as James E. Edmonds. At the arraignment, on December 12, 1920, appellant moved to set aside the information, and the hearing was continued until December 21; the court directing the district attorney to procure an amendment of the order of commitment. On December 20, the committing magistrate, by a minute order, amended the order of commitment to conform to the information as to the name of the minor, reciting that the discrepancy was due to a clerical error. The amended order was presented to and filed in the trial court, which, on December 21, 1920, denied appellant's motion to dismiss the information. It is not necessary to determine whether this mode of correcting a purely clerical error is regular or not. The mistake was one of those defects or errors in pleading which are declared to be insufficient to justify a reversal or a new trial by the sections of the Constitution and the Penal Code already referred to.

[5] 4. The next contention of appellant is that the court erred in refusing to permit the defense to introduce evidence tending to prove that Edmonds was mistaken in his identification of one James Young, who gave the name of James Thomas, at the preliminary examination of Young for the same offense as that charged against appellant. Young was one of the persons Edmonds stated to have been present at the time he visited the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club. Upon cross-examination Edmonds was asked the following question, to which an objection was sustained:

"Q. Is it not a fact that upon the preliminary examination in the case of People v. Thomas you identified Thomas as one of the participants in the game in which you claim Smith was dealing, * * * that you also identified him as the man that you pointed out to Mr. Floyd on the night of November 6, 1920, and is it a fact now that you were mistaken as to your identification of Mr. Thomas, both as to being a participant in the game and as having identified him to Mr. Floyd on the night of November 6, 1920?"

James Young, testifying in behalf of appellant, was asked on direct examination:

"Well, did James E. Edmonds identify you as a person who was present at the Thirty-Third District Club between October 28 and November 1, 1920?"

An objection to this question was also sustained. The district attorney objected, upon the grounds that it was incompetent, immaterial, irrelevant, and not proper cross-examination, and that the inquiry was going too far afield; that, if the testimony were allowed, the prosecution would be entitled to bring in a number of witnesses to testify that Edmonds had identified all the persons involved in the several charges. Counsel for appellant offered to prove that—

"This witness [Edmonds], in a hearing before Judge Murasky, in the case of People v. Thomas, charged with contributing to the delinquency of a minor, positively, and without equivocation, identified the defendant in that case, Thomas, as having participated in the very games in which this defendant is charged with having played, and we will then undertake to prove, and do now undertake to prove that this witness was absolutely wrong, and that Thomas, the man whom he then positively identified, was in San Diego at the time the alleged game took place."

Assuming that the inquiry should have been allowed, it cannot be held the rulings were prejudicial. The following testimony of Edmonds shows that he did not insist upon this trial that Young was one of the persons he saw at the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club:

"Q. Now, I will ask you if you know a man known as James Thomas? A. I do. Q. And where did you first meet him? A. I first saw him in the preliminary hearing at which he was tried. Q. Did you ever see him in the Thirty-Third District Club? A. I don't suppose so; he was acquitted of ever being there."

Moreover, Edmonds was subjected to a searching examination as to the correctness of his identification of appellant. The excluded testimony would therefore have been but additional to the same point.

[6] 5. It is insisted the court erred in permitting Edmonds to testify on redirect examination, over the objection that the evidence was incompetent, irrelevant, and not binding on appellant, that he knew that while he was in New Orleans, and while he was on his way to San Francisco to attend the trial, he was being shadowed by detectives in the employ of appellant, on the ground that—

"There was no evidence in the case to show that such alleged detectives were employed by the defendant, or that the defendant had any knowledge of such employment. Testimony of this character has always been held to be inadmissible"—citing People v. Dixon, 94 Cal. 256, 29 Pac. 504; People v. Choy Ah Sing, 84 Cal. 276, 24 Pac. 379.

It was developed on the cross-examination of Edmonds that, after returning from New Orleans, he went to see appellant's counsel, and also that he had telephoned to and called on appellant, and the latter claimed these communications were had for purposes of blackmail. The testimony in question was offered as tending to explain Edmonds' motive in having these communications; it being asserted by counsel for the people that—

"He was induced to go and see them by this very defendant himself, for the purpose of inducing or bribing him to leave the jurisdiction of this court after he arrived."

It may be conceded that, if the witness had any knowledge he was being shadowed by appellant's agents, he should have been asked to state the facts upon which he based his knowledge, rather than the conclusion itself. But the court, in admitting the testimony, said:

"It is open to re-cross-examination as to what the basis of his knowledge was, as to whether it was such knowledge as to justify his answer."

As the defense did not choose to act upon the suggestion of the court, we cannot hold, in the face of the judgment of conviction, that the witness did not have primary knowledge of the fact. Inasmuch as the defense did not inquire into the matter, the objection will be deemed to have been waived.

[7] 6. Appellant's next contention is that, on the ground it was hearsay, the court erred in admitting evidence to the effect that, at the times Edmonds visited the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club, the place had the reputation of being a gambling house. Even conceding this ruling to have been erroneous, appellant could not have been prejudiced by it. That the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club was a public gambling place might also have been inferred from Edmonds' testimony that he was first directed to the place by a taxicab driver, when he asked if the latter could "show me where there was a little game," and that he was admitted to the club without being known and without a membership card. In any event, no prejudice could have resulted from the admission of the testimony in question, for the purpose of showing appellant's knowledge of the character of the premises, for according to his own testimony he had formerly been employed by and was a frequenter of the club.

[8] 7. It is next claimed the court erred in receiving evidence that the police raided the premises at 225 Ellis street, the former location of the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club. This testimony is asserted to be erroneous on the grounds that it was incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, not proper cross-examination, called for the opinion and conclusion of the witness, impeached and disgraced appellant in the eyes of the jury, and that the jury might have concluded that, inasmuch as appellant had once been an employee in a gambling club, it was probable he was engaged in a like employment at the time of the alleged commission of the crime for which he is now being prosecuted. Before the questions objected to were propounded, appellant had testified, without objection, that the Thirty-Third Assembly District Club was the same one that had been located at 225 Ellis street, and that he had worked in the club at that location. It also appears from his testimony that the character of the club had not materially changed since the time it occupied 225 Ellis street. Then he testified:

"Q. Don't you know, as a matter of fact, in 1918, while you worked there, and while you were in the place, the police raided it as a gambling institution, and carted everybody off to the city prison? * * *

"Mr. U'Ren: I just want to go into this man's knowledge as to the reputation of the place; isn't that the fact? A. I was there twice, on two different occasions, when the place was raided."

An objection to further evidence along the same line was sustained; the court announcing that the point was sufficiently covered by the testimony under review.

There was no error in the admission of this evidence. Although housed in a different location, the club was the same one in which Edmonds testified he had played cards for money. Appellant's knowledge of the character of the club was relevant, and testimony that he knew of its character while at one location tended to prove that he knew of it while at another.

[9] 8. It is insisted that the verdict is against law. The jury were instructed in effect that if they found that Edmonds frequently and without any inducement, persuasion, or encouragement upon appellant's part, went to the premises described in the information, and engaged in gambling, they must find appellant not guilty, and also that, if they found "no acts proven on the part of defendant which would induce" Edmonds to become or remain addicted to the habit of gambling, they must find appellant not guilty. It is argued that, as Edmonds testified that appellant never asked him to play or gamble, it was the duty of the jury under the above instructions to return a verdict of not guilty. However, from the record as a whole, and particularly from Edmonds' testimony that when he played black jack he bought chips from appellant to bet on the cards, that he talked to appellant during the game, and that appellant dealt for him occasionally, we cannot say there was not evidence upon which the verdict might have been predicated under the instructions.

[10] 9. Error is also assigned to the refusal of the court to permit evidence for appellant that he invited Edmonds to his apartment for the purpose of entrapment. The evidence shows that Edmonds visited the apartment, but while he claimed it was to get his money back and for the purpose of following up a suggestion of a bribe which he asserted was to be offered to persuade him to leave the jurisdiction, appellant insisted it was for purposes of blackmail.

As tending to prove the latter contention, appellant offered to show that upon one occasion he had stationed a photographer outside the apartment house to get a picture of Edmonds entering and leaving it, and that a stenographer and a detective were stationed inside to report the conversation between Edmonds and appellant. However, upon that occasion Edmonds did not appear at all. It is contended by the Attorney General that such testimony would be irrelevant, immaterial, and self-serving. Conceding that the suggested preparations by appellant for Edmonds' visit might tend to prove his distrust of Edmonds, we do not see how they could tend to prove Edmonds' state of mind in going there. The ruling was proper.

[11] 10. The last contention is that—

"Section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law, as qualified and supplemented by subdivision 11 of section 1 of the same law, is unconstitutional and void."

In People v. De Leon, 35 Cal. App. 467, 170 Pac. 163, the constitutionality of the Juvenile Court Law was upheld, and a petition for a hearing of the cause in this court was denied. An examination of the petition for a hearing in this court shows that the question of the constitutionality of the act was raised therein and the subject fully presented. Appellant's contention is therefore without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

WEAKLEY v. MELTON. (S. F. 9693.)

1. Gifts — 49(1)—Evidence held sufficient to establish unconditional gift.

Testimony of a mother that the turning over to her by her son of a part of an inheritance from an uncle was without condition, and with the understanding that she would return what was left to him because she wanted him to inherit the balance, held to establish an unconditional gift.

2. Trusts — 49—Declaration of trust held to have been procured by "undue influence."

Where a son procured from his mother a declaration of trust for a sum which he had turned over to her, by representing that he desired the trust to prevent the sister from making trouble or from getting it after his mother was through with it, and the mother testified that she was greatly disturbed mentally at the time and did not hear distinctly when the declaration was read to her, and that she did not want to sign it, held, that the declaration of trust was procured by undue influence as defined by Civ. Code, § 1575.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Undue Influence.]

3. Trusts ⚡49—Procurement of deed of trust after unconditional gift not justified as exercise of legal right.

Where a son made an unconditional gift to his mother of a sum of money, the subsequent obtaining by him of a deed of trust thereto could not be justified as the exercise of a legal right.

4. Compromise and settlement ⚡5(1)—Unsigned agreement attempting settlement of trust no defense to suit to vacate trust alleged procured by undue influence.

In a suit to vacate a trust, alleged procured by undue influence, a proposed, unsigned agreement undertaking to make final settlement, was not binding on any of the parties, and was at most an accord without satisfaction, and did not constitute a defense to the action.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Benj. K. Knight, Judge.

Action by Jennie E. Weakley against George L. Melton. From a judgment of the superior court, in an action to set aside trust to quiet title and recover on a promissory note, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lucas F. Smith, Lucas F. Smith, Jr., and Stanford G. Smith, all of Santa Cruz, for appellant.

A. W. Hare and Netherton & Johnston, all of Santa Cruz, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Plaintiff, Jennie E. Weakley, brought this action to have declared null and void a declaration of trust of real property, located in the city of Santa Cruz in favor of defendant, George L. Melton, and to have the record thereof canceled; to have her title to said property quieted as against defendant, and to recover $2,900 alleged to be due to plaintiff on a promissory note, executed in her favor by defendant, together with costs. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, granting all the relief prayed, and from that judgment defendant takes this appeal.

Respondent, a woman of advanced years, and appellant are mother and son. Respondent's first husband, appellant's father, died when the latter was about 3 years old. Thereafter respondent remarried, and a daughter, now Mrs. A. L. Munger, was born of the second marriage. Respondent worked and supported appellant until he was about 15 years of age. At that time he inherited between $20,000 and $30,000 from the estate of a paternal uncle. Respondent was appointed guardian of appellant's person and estate, in which capacity she acted until he came of age in 1892. After appellant attained his majority, he transferred to respondent the sum of $9,000, she claiming that it was a gift and he asserting it was given in trust during her lifetime. This money she dealt with in her own name, but she always kept it separate from her second husband's property. On one occasion in 1896, appellant said to her:

"Dr. Workman told me I ought to have some writing to show I get this money after you are done with it. But I am not going to ask it of you."

In 1910 appellant wrote to respondent, explaining that he intended her to have the use of the money only during her life, and that upon her death, the money, or the property in which it had been invested, should revert to him. On September 5, 1911, appellant visited respondent at her home in Santa Cruz, which home consisted of a house and lot which respondent had purchased out of the $9,000 she received from appellant. At that time respondent executed the following declaration of trust in appellant's favor, of the property constituting her home:

"Whereas, my son, George L. Melton, on or about the 6th day of April, 1892, did convey to me the sum of nine thousand dollars ($9,000) to be held by me during the term of my natural life in trust for him, his heirs or assigns, this is to certify that said money is now invested as follows: [Her home described by street number, and a loan of $3,800 to A. L. Munger]. Witnesseth: That said real estate with all and singular the rents, tenements, and hereditaments thereunto appertaining and said loan, together with accretions and interest due thereon and property or properties derived from said real estate or loan shall at the expiration of said trust be immediately placed in possession of said George L. Melton."

This declaration of trust appellant caused to be recorded, and is the one respondent seeks to have declared null and void by this action, on the ground it was obtained by undue influence. Appellant told respondent he desired the declaration of trust because he feared respondent's daughter, Mrs. A. L. Munger, would eventually receive part of the property covered by it.

According to the evidence, respondent became so nervous and distressed over having given appellant the declaration of trust that she began to break down physically. As a result, her son-in-law, A. L. Munger, endeavored to secure the release of the declaration of trust. At that time Munger owed respondent $2,900 of the $3,800 he had borrowed from her. He and appellant, who was at that time short of money, agreed that the $2,900 should be paid to appellant through a bank in Fresno—he to assume the debt to respondent—and, according to Munger, that a cancellation of the declaration of trust should be delivered through the same bank upon the making of the payment. The money was accordingly paid and the following document deposited with the bank:

"At the request of Jennie E. Weakley and for the sole purpose of enabling her to better enjoy the life interest in the property transferred to her as a life estate, I hereby surrender and authorize the cancellation on record of the acknowledgment of trust executed by Jennie E. Weakley on September 6, 1911, and recorded on that day in vol. 6 of Miscellaneous, page 247, Santa Cruz (California) County Records."

Appellant, on November 14, 1913, gave respondent his note for the $2,900 loaned to him, upon which one cause of action in this suit is based. He regularly paid the interest on this note until November 14, 1916. Respondent was dissatisfied with the purported cancellation of the declaration of trust, so a proposed agreement, dated June 1, 1919, was drawn up between appellant, respondent, A. L. Munger and his wife, looking to the settlement of the entire matter. By its terms respondent was to convey to appellant the property covered by the declaration of trust, and surrender as paid the note of November 14, 1913. Appellant was to pay respondent the interest due on the note, and an allowance for her support of $25 a month. The Mungers were to make her a like allowance. This attempt to adjust the matter failed, and respondent refused to enter into the proposed agreement.

Respondent then began this action to secure the cancellation of the declaration of trust, alleging in effect that appellant acted fraudulently in giving to respondent the authorization to cancel of record instead of surrendering the declaration of trust. The note was set out in hæc verba. Appellant in his answer alleged that the $9,000 was given to respondent as a life estate only, the residue to revert to him on her death; denied that the declaration of trust was given under undue influence or that he acted fraudulently or deceived her in giving the authorization to cancel of record. Appellant further alleged that the $2,900 was a part of the $9,000 life estate; that he was only to pay interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum and not the principal, and that, on respondent's death, the note was to be surrendered to him. The court found:

That "after defendant arrived at the age of majority and after the accounts of the guardian had been settled, he made a gift to his mother of $9,000. This gift was made by defendant to plaintiff as an outright gift and without reservation, exception, or limitation, and was accepted by plaintiff as such"; that "defendant secured the execution of said document [the declaration of trust] by said plaintiff while said plaintiff was in an extremely agitated and nervous condition, and through the exercise by defendant of undue influence upon said plaintiff"; that "prior to the said delivery to the said Munger, as agent for plaintiff, of said purported cancellation of declaration of trust, it was understood and agreed between plaintiff and defendant that said instrument of trust should be thereby wholly canceled and that the cancellation received by her was intended to accomplish that end."

Appellant contends the evidence is insufficient to support these findings. It was also found that no part of the principal or interest of the note was paid; that the matters in dispute were never settled or compromised; and that the purported agreement of settlement was never signed by any one but appellant.

1. Appellant first asserts that—

"plaintiff's testimony, fairly and reasonably considered, goes only to the extent that the gift of this property and money to her by the defendant was for her support and maintenance, with the right to consume the principal if that should be necessary, and that, whatever remained over upon her death, should belong to defendant."

We are of the opinion this position cannot be maintained. Respondent, on direct examination testified as follows:

"Q. Then when, Mrs. Weakley, did you receive the money from the defendant which you have since claimed as your own? A. Well, I received it after he was of age, but we had talked it over, and he had promised to give it to me even before that, but I didn't ask it of him until he was of age. * * * But I told him if his father had lived until Uncle Amon had passed away I would have been entitled to half of it and he to half, and I said, 'If you will give me a third, because there is enough for both of us' * * * and he willingly said he was willing for me to have half, but I didn't ask it and didn't accept it. * * *

"Q. Now what was the substance of the conversation as near as you can recollect that occurred when this $9,000 was turned over to you, delivered to you? In other words, what were the conditions imposed, if there were any conditions? A. * * * We never to my knowledge had one minute of controversy over this property, and he was willing and saw the justice of my having a share of it. We didn't call it a gift, and I didn't demand it, but I did ask it of him as a moral right. * * *

"Q. As I understand it, there was a conversation between yourself and your son in reference to the amount of money he had received from the different sources, and, as I understand, you related to him at that time in reference to your care of him and what you thought you should have, and then the $9,000 was delivered to you. Now were there any specific conditions imposed upon the gift of the $9,000? A. No, not any, but after—I remember after I had it I told him I would be careful of it and I would return what was left, what I didn't use, and I always kept it separate from Mr. Weakley's property, because I wanted George to inherit what was left of the $9,000.

"Q. You say that was after you received it?
A. That was after I received it."

[1] This testimony is clearly sufficient to support the finding that at the time it was turned over to her, the $9,000 was given absolutely to respondent, free from any condition, limitation, or trust. Respondent stated there were no conditions attached to the gift, but that, after it was made, she said she would return what was left, because she always wanted appellant to "inherit" what was left. It is not claimed that this promise to give appellant what was left created any trust in his favor. While in certain letters he had written he maintained that the money was held by respondent in trust for him, and he testified it was "to be used by her, as we expressed it, during her lifetime, and to be returned to me undiminished at the time of her death," respondent stated "it is not true, not one word of it. It is awful to sit here and deny my son's word, but he has not stated the facts correctly." The evidence on this issue is involved in sharp conflict, and, since respondent's testimony alone is sufficient, we are bound by the findings that the money was given to her unconditionally.

2. It is next claimed the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding that the declaration of trust was executed while respondent was in an extremely agitated and nervous condition and through the exercise of undue influence by appellant. It is provided, in section 1575 of the Civil Code that—

"Undue influence consists: (1) In the use, by one in whom a confidence is reposed by another, or who holds a real or apparent authority over him, of such confidence or authority for the purpose of obtaining an unfair advantage over him; (2) in taking an unfair advantage of another's weakness of mind; or, (3) in taking a grossly oppressive and unfair advantage of another's necessities or distress."

[2] In Soberanes v. Soberanes, 97 Cal. 140, 31 Pac. 910, a mother made a gift of certain real property to her son. In discussing the claim that he obtained the property through undue influence, the court said:

"Some of the cases hold that undue influence is not to be inferred from the relation of parent and child * * * (Millican v. Millican, 24 Tex. 446); but where the parent is of great age, or is enfeebled by disease, and conveys his entire estate to one child, to the exclusion of other children dependent upon his bounty, the burden is unquestionably upon the donee to show that the gift was made freely and voluntarily, and with full knowledge of all the facts, and with perfect understanding of the effect of the transfer (Todd v. Grove, 33 Md. 194; Highberger v. Stiffler, 21 Md. 352, 83 Am. Dec. 593)."

Respondent testified that appellant came to her home on the evening of September 5, 1911, and that he brought up the subject of the declaration of trust at that time. On direct examination she stated that—

"he commenced and told me how much he had always done for me, and how he considered it was his, and I just sat there and didn't make any reply, but his plea was he wanted to keep my daughter from getting a share of it, and my argument was they didn't want it and didn't expect it."

She further testified:

That she was so wrought up and nervous over the incident that she did not sleep that night; that the next morning she asked appellant, "Who has put you up to this?" that he said, "Not anybody;" that she was worried and cried; that she understood they were to draw up an agreement; but that, while they were waiting for the car, appellant took an agreement, already drawn up, from his pocket. That agreement was the declaration of trust which respondent later signed. She stated that he read the agreement over to her, but that, as she was hard of hearing, she did not hear half that he said, and that, as she did not have her glasses, she could not read it; that "I kept asking him not to ask me to sign it, and I asked him that at home in the kitchen, I said, 'Don't ask me to sign this, George, it is going to ruin my life, I will never care for the home if there is a cloud on the title,' and he said I would have all the privileges I ever had, 'The money is yours while I live,' * * * and I went and signed it, but I didn't know what I was signing."

On cross-examination she said:

"I don't remember anything that happened going down town, but I remember I was awfully excited and nervous. * * * I remember of George—I drew back a little bit, and I don't know that I told him I didn't want to sign it, but I drew back, and he patted me on the shoulder and he says, 'It is all right, mother, it is just to keep Pearl from making any trouble or getting it after you are through with it.'"

[3] In view of the authorities cited and this evidence, we cannot hold that the finding of undue influence was not warranted. Appellant cites Van Valkenburgh v. Oldham, 12 Cal. App. 572, 577, 108 Pac. 42, 44, to the proposition that—

"Persuasion is not coercion; insistence upon one's legal rights is not undue influence and pertinacious zeal to secure the payment of a just debt is not fraudulent."

But we have shown appellant had no claim to the property—that it was given to respondent free from any condition—and his obtaining of the deed of trust cannot therefore be justified as the exercise of a legal right.

3. Appellant makes the further contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that he—

"fraudulently procured said sum of $2,900 from said plaintiff and gave said plaintiff his promissory note therefor * * * and induced plaintiff to believe she was to receive a complete cancellation in consideration thereof."

He insists he "consistently refused to renounce his claim to the remainder over of the fund after plaintiff's death, but he yielded to the importunities of plaintiff and agreed to clear the record title of the Santa Cruz residence and for this purpose executed the informal release" of October 7, 1913. It is unnecessary to consider this contention, for respondent's claim to a cancellation of the declaration of trust is based upon the claim of undue influence exerted to induce her to sign it. Inasmuch as the findings support the judgment, and respondent's right to cancellation dates back to the execution of the declaration of trust, the finding as to the fraudulent securing of the loan is immaterial, and the point is without merit. Aside from the claim that all of the property is held in trust for him, he does not dispute the finding that the $2,900 is owing to respondent.

[4] 4. Appellant contends the court erred in not admitting in evidence the proposed agreement of June 1, 1919, by which the controversy was to be settled, and which, it is asserted, would constitute a complete defense to this action. It is claimed this agreement went into effect, notwithstanding it was not signed by respondent, because it had been assented to by her attorney. But, as we have shown, the court found against the execution of the agreement, and this finding is not attacked. This being the case, it was not binding on any of the parties, and was at most an accord without satisfaction. As such, it would not constitute a defense to the action. Silvers v. Grossman, 183 Cal. 696, 192 Pac. 534. There was no error in excluding the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

O'CONNOR v. WEST SACRAMENTO CO.
et al. (Sac. 2966.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1922.
Rehearing Denied June 22, 1922.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨93—In provision for tenant's reimbursement on landlord's termination of lease the term "per acre per year" held to refer to unexpired term.

In a lease providing that the landlord might at any time or times after a fixed date terminate the lease in whole or in part, the terms "per acre per year" used in a provision for reimbursement of the lessee on termination of lease construed to refer to unexpired term, and not to the whole term.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Per Acre.]

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨93—Phrase "credit on rent" in a reimbursement clause in case of landlord's termination of lease held to mean a credit on the rent for the entire term.

Where a lease reserved a lump sum rental payable in installments and provided that, after a named date, landlord could terminate the lease, and provided for reimbursement in such case, at different prices per acre, such to be "a credit on the rent," held to mean a credit on the whole amount of rent due.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Credit.]

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨93—Lease construed as holding tenant for rental for entire term, although lease was sooner terminated by landlord in estimating the stipulated amount to be paid by the landlord.

Where a lease provided that lessor could terminate it after a fixed date by making certain payments "per acre per year," to be allowed as credits on the rent, held that the lump sum rental for the whole term, which was to be paid in installments, was considered an obligation of the tenant in estimating the amount to be paid by the lessor upon his termination of lease, whether such termination was in whole or in part.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇨93—Contract as to reimbursement of tenant on termination construed.

In a tenant's action against landlord for reimbursement under the terms of a lease providing that the landlord might terminate it upon making certain payments "per acre per year," which were to be credited against the rent, which was fixed at a lump sum payable in installments, held, that the court cannot read into the contract the words "due and unpaid," and thus hold the landlord for the full amount "per acre per year," without charging against it the amount of unpaid rent for the whole term.

5. Contracts ⇨176(2)—Construction is always for the court, no matter how ambiguous or uncertain its terms.

The construction of a contract is always a matter of law for the court, no matter how ambiguous or uncertain or difficult its terms, and the jury can only assist the court in determining disputed fact questions.

6. Trial ⇨199—Submitting to jury the question of parties' intention to be derived from contract's language and extrinsic evidence was error.

It was error to submit to the jury the question of the intention of the parties, to be derived in part from the language of the contract and in part from extrinsic evidence.

7. Trial ⇨191(3)—Instruction assuming that construction of contract must be reasonable and just held error.

In a case involving the construction of the terms of a lease, an instruction which assumes, as does the entire presentation of facts by the plaintiff, that the parties drew a contract whose construction must be reasonable and just under all circumstances, whereas the real question for determination is the meaning of the written contract, is erroneous.

8. Landlord and tenant ☞37—Court cannot, under guise of interpreting lease, make new contract.

The court cannot under the guise of interpreting a lease make a new contract for the parties.

9. Landlord and tenant ☞93—Right to claim breach of contract held waived by stipulation.

In a tenant's action against landlord to recover under reimbursement clause in a lease on its termination by the latter, plaintiff's failure to surrender the premises as constituting a breach of contract and defense to the action was waived by stipulation submitting the amount of compensation for determination.

10. Election of remedies ☞7(1)—Plaintiff held not estopped by selection of remedies inconsistent with right to compensation on termination of lease by landlord in view of stipulation.

It cannot be claimed that plaintiff tenant was estopped by selection of a remedy inconsistent with the right to compensation under lease provisions requiring reimbursement of rent on termination of lease by landlord in view of a stipulation by which they mutually converted the proceeding into one for compensation.

11. Landlord and tenant ☞18(3)—Verdict against fraud by tenant in procuring lease held supported by the evidence.

In tenant's action for money due under lease provisions upon landlord's terminating tenancy, where defendant claimed that the lease was procured by plaintiff's fraudulent representation that he was the lessee, when in fact he was acting for a corporation composed of himself and his brothers, where the lease was made to plaintiff individually, and the corporation was formed thereafter, there was no merit in the claim that there was no evidence to support the verdict against fraud.

Sloane, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by Thomas O'Connor, as executor of the estate of J. Harbinson, deceased, against the West Sacramento Company and others for an injunction to restrain the termination of a lease. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and the defendants appeal. Trial court directed to modify its judgment by reducing the amount of damages assessed.

Arthur C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, both of Woodland, and Charles W. Slack, Chauncey S. Goodrich, and John T. Pigott, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

John S. Partridge, of San Francisco, and Elmer W. Armfield and Arthur B. Eddy, both of Woodland, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. In its final form this action is one to recover from the defendant landlord an amount claimed to be due the plaintiff tenant under the terms of the lease upon the termination on November 2, 1917, of the lease wherein the landlord let to the tenant 403.4 acres of land for three years from November 1, 1916, to and including October 31, 1919, at a gross rental of $16,740.75, to be used for the planting and raising of alfalfa. The landlord admits an indebtedness of $2,955.52 and tendered that amount. The tenant claims $20,451.75 as the proper amount. The jury returned a verdict for $13,625, and the defendant appeals from the judgment rendered thereon. The provision of the lease involved is as follows:

"15. The lessee further covenants and agrees that the lessor shall have the right, at any time or times after the 1st day of June, 1917, to terminate this lease, and the estate hereby granted, as to the whole or any portion of the said premises, by notice in writing to the lessee, given either personally to the lessee, at least thirty (30) days prior to such termination, as follows:

"Mr. J. Harbinson, 915 Second Street, Sacramento, Cal.

"In the event of such termination of this lease, for a portion only of the said premises, this lease shall continue in full force and effect as to the remainder of the said premises, subject to the continuing right of the lessor to terminate this lease, in the manner hereinafter provided, as to the whole or any portion of the remainder of the said premises. The lessor further covenants and agrees to compensate the lessee for any portion of the said premises as to which this lease shall be so terminated as follows:

"If said lease shall be terminated as to any portion of the said premises designated by green lines on the map or plat attached hereto, the lessor will compensate the lessee for each and every acre of the said premises, as to which this lease shall be so terminated, at the rate of eight and no/100 ($8.00) dollars per acre per year if such termination shall occur on or before the 1st day of November, 1917; at the rate of ten and no/100 ($10.00) dollars per acre per year if such termination shall occur on or before the 1st day of November, 1918; and at the rate of twelve and no/100 ($12.00) dollars per acre per year if such termination shall occur on or before the 1st day of November, 1919.

"If said lease shall be terminated as to any portion of the said premises designated by red lines on the map or plat attached hereto, the lessor will compensate the lessee for such portion of the said premises as to which this lease shall be so terminated as follows: The lessor will compensate the lessee for each and every acre of the said premises as to which this lease shall be so terminated, at the rate of twenty and no/100 ($20.00) dollars per acre per year if such termination shall occur during the period from June 1, 1917, to July 15, 1917; at the rate of seventeen and 50/100 ($17.50) dollars per acre per year if such termination shall occur during the period from July 15, 1917, to August 15, 1917; at the rate of sixteen and no/100 ($16.00) dollars per acre per year if such termination shall occur during the period from August 15, 1917, to October 1, 1917; at the rate of fifteen and no/100 ($15.00) dollars per acre per year if such termination shall occur during the period from October 1, 1917, to October 31, 1917; at the rate of seventeen and 50/100 ($17.50) dollars per acre per year if such termination shall occur during the period from October 31, 1917, to October 31, 1919. Provided, however, such cash reimbursements shall be made by allowing the lessee a credit on the rent."

The lease contains almost the same provisions with regard to the "reimbursement of" and "compensation to" the tenant in case the landlord constructs "levees, canals, ditches, and other works, for the purpose of reclamation, drainage, or irrigation, or any thereof." The lease in that regard provides as follows:

"The lessor further covenants and agrees to reimburse the lessee for any portion of the said premises over which such levees, canals, ditches, or other works shall be so constructed, as follows: If such works shall be constructed on any portion of the said premises designated by green lines on the map or plat attached hereto, the lessor will compensate the lessee for each and every acre of the said premises, which shall be covered by such works, at the rate of eight and no/100 ($8.00) dollars per acre per year if such works shall be constructed on or before the first day of November, 1917," etc.

The balance of the clause is identical with the above-quoted clause applicable to the termination of all or any part of the lease as to times and amounts within the green and red line areas, except that the phrase "if such works shall be constructed" is used instead of the phrase "if such termination occur." This clause ends like the other with the proviso:

"Provided, however, such cash reimbursements shall be made by allowing the lessee a credit on the rent."

These two clauses, practically identical, with reference to the use of a part of the premises for irrigation works, etc., and the termination of the lease, are obviously used in the same sense, and, if we can ascertain the meaning of one, it will point to the correct interpretation of the other similar clause.

[1] The tenant's contention is that the clause contains two ambiguities, one the phrase "a credit on the rent," and the other "per acre per year." With reference to the first clause it is said that it is doubtful whether or not the credit "per acre per year" is for the whole term (three years) or for the unexpired term, which in the present instance, as the lease was terminated at the expiration of the first year (November 2, 1917), is two years. Or, to express the doubt in terms of money, the question is whether a credit of $35 or of $52.50 per acre should be allowed in the red boundary area and $20 or $30 in the green. These areas, it may be said, are 371.1 acres in the red and 32.2 acres in the green. There does not seem much room for doubt as to the meaning of the phrase "per acre per year" when it is remembered that the purpose of the "reimbursement" or the compensation is to make compensation to the tenant for his loss, which is represented by loss of the use of the land occupied by levees, etc., or as to which the lease is terminated for the balance of the term.

[2] The other phrase, "a credit on the rent," seems plain enough when it is remembered that the lease reserves a lump sum as rental ($16,740.75) and makes no provision for an annual or monthly rental, or for the payment of the rent in equal installments at yearly, semiannual, or monthly periods, from which it might be inferred that the rent was adjusted with reference to such periods. The only rent mentioned in the lease is in the following phrase:

"* * * Yielding and paying unto the lessor, as rental of the said premises, the sum of sixteen thousand seven hundred forty and 75/100 ($16,740.75) dollars, payable by the lessee to the lessor * * * in installments as follows."

These installments are: Two items, $1,323.14 (evidenced by a note executed contemporaneously with the lease) and $1,323.13, total $2,646.27, on June 25, 1917; $3,286.30 on November 1, 1917; $1,963.17 June 25, 1918; $4,257.11 November 1, 1918; $2,293.95 June 25, 1919; $2,293.95 before October 31, 1919. This would make $5,933.57 payable during the first year, $6,220.20 during the second, and $4,597.90 during the third year. The average yearly rental would thus be $5,580.25, or an average annual rental of $13.34 per acre. It seems clear enough that the phrase should be read "allowing the lessee a credit on the rent (reserved in the lease)." In the case of the larger tract (371.1 acres) the amount agreed to be allowed as a "credit on the rent" is in each instance greater ($20, $17.50, $16, $15, $17.50) than the average rental ($13.34) per acre, and, if we assume that the rental value of the two pieces is in proportion to the allowances made in the respective areas, it is evident that the allowance is in each instance greater than the average rental per acre so apportioned. This is the interpretation of the lease adopted by the lessor when he tendered the sum of $2,955.52 at the termination of the lease.

[3] We will now consider the claims made by the respondent tenant. First, it is claimed that the proviso should be construed as though it read "a credit upon the rent due and unpaid at the time of the termination of the lease." And in this connection it is also urged that the termination of the lease ipso facto terminated the obligation to pay rent. It could not be applied to rent due and paid, because money so paid becomes the property of the landlord. It is no longer "rent," nor could the stipulated set-off well be applied to moneys already paid, nor could it well be applied to future rents; for according to the contention of the tenant there would be no future rents. Hence the construction contended for that the proviso applies to rents due and unpaid. But it is presumed that the tenant will pay his rent when due, and, if he does, there will be no period of time except the day when the rent is due when there will be any rent upon which the amounts specified may be "credited."

As it appears that this theory is the one adopted by the jury, we will give it further consideration. The jury were instructed as follows:

"(2) If you find that the intention of the parties was that Mr. Harbinson should receive compensation for the balance of the term at the rate of $10 per acre for the 32 acres, and $17.50 per acre for the 371 acres, then your verdict must be for the plaintiff for the sum of $13,625.10."

The jury returned a general verdict for that amount, thus adopting this view. The tenant paid the rental due November 1, 1917 ($3,286.30), and hence the tenant was allowed the reimbursement without "crediting on the rent," for on this theory there was no rent on which to credit it. The fundamental assumption on which this verdict is based is that all rental ceased upon the termination of the lease. This would ordinarily be true and is true here in a sense, for, if the allowance to the tenant on termination of the lease in every case is equal to or greater than the rent reserved for the balance of the term, as is the case here, then there will be no further rent paid. Indeed, it is conceded that the landlord must make a payment to the tenant at the termination of the lease, and that the tenant makes no further payment to the landlord. The lease as a contract is not terminated. It is still in effect between the parties, and the plaintiff is seeking to recover under its terms. What the parties dealt with in the clauses under consideration was the termination of the tenant's estate in the land, or, in the case of irrigation works, etc., of the beneficial use of the land by the tenant. In the absence of any contract with relation to the matter, no doubt the tenant's obligation to pay all future installments of rent would cease. In this case the lease does not fix the rental value of the land for any period less than three years, and it was as appropriate to make provision for the rights of the parties upon its termination during that period as it would have been if all the rent was to be paid in one installment at the termination of the lease.

The particular form of the agreement evidently resulted from the fact that the clauses in question contemplated the termination or use by the irrigation works of a part only of the premises rather than a termination of the entire leasehold, although provision was also specifically made for the latter event. In the case of irrigation works, etc., the tenant's right to the possession of the acreage devoted to this use continued. The lease still remained in full force and effect as to the entire 403.4 acres. The allowance made as a credit on the rent is because the tenant has lost the beneficial use of that portion as an alfalfa farm. Hence he is credited with the value of the use thereof on the rental. He is thus "reimbursed" or "compensated," to use the language of the lease.

The significance of this clause concerning the construction of irrigation works, etc., lies in the fact that there is no occasion or opportunity to consider the legal effect of a surrender or termination of the lease, and no chance to argue that the right to rental ceased, in whole or in part, with the whole or partial termination of the lease, for the lease is still in full force and effect; the tenant's beneficial use thereof has merely been impaired by the works in question. It would follow that a similar construction should be placed upon the termination clause, couched, as it is, in the same language. The only occasion for considering the clause with reference to the construction of irrigation works, etc., is the fact that this clause demonstrates that the continuance of a legal estate in the part as to which the lease is terminated or used is a false quantity in the case; the amount to be credited under the lease is the same in each event. Another consideration leads to the same conclusion. The termination clause deals with whole or partial termination. If partial, it is clear that the obligation still remains to pay the entire rent reserved in the lease, less the credit for which provision is therein made. If this is a correct conclusion, there is no adequate reason for adopting a totally different construction where the whole estate is terminated. It is not reasonable to assume that the parties intended that the retention of a single acre, or part of an acre, for instance, should result in the tenant being required to pay all future installments of rent, amounting in this case to $10,818.18, and should pay no part of it if the last acre was also included in the notice of termination. The parties have a perfect right to fix any terms they can agree upon as the basis of adjustment upon the termination of the tenancy, and there is no reason to believe that they contemplated a wholly different adjustment of their rights in case of a partial and of a total termination. They might have done so, but there is nothing in the language of the lease under consideration which points to such a conclusion. It is apparent that the form of agreement resulted from the fact that the lease reserved a lump sum rental. For that reason it would have been difficult to frame a provision for reimbursement for partial loss which was not in the form of a credit upon the whole rental reserved where there was no apportionment of the rental to either time or acreage.

It is clear then, we think, that the allowance to the tenant is the same per year per acre, whether the allowance is for 100 acres or for 403 acres or for the whole 403.4 acres, and that the lump sum rental was considered an obligation of the tenant in estimating the amount to be paid by the landlord upon the termination of the lease, whether whole or partial.

[4] The appellant's claim is untenable that the above-quoted proviso should have read into it the words "due and unpaid" as to the rent upon which the allowance was to be credited. To add these words to the lease is beyond the power of the court or jury. Such a construction would defeat the claim of the plaintiff, for he here seeks to recover $20,000, not as a credit upon rent "due and unpaid," for there was no such rent, but by a judgment requiring the defendant to pay to him that amount. The amounts to be allowed to the tenant upon termination bear no relation to the time or amount of the payment of the installment of rents. Apparently the amount to be paid the tenant the first year was fixed wholly with reference to the maturity of the crop on the land, and without reference to the payment or nonpayment of rent or of other considerations which will be presently mentioned. The tenant claims that, if the notice terminating the lease had been effective October 31, 1917, instead of November 2, 1917, he would have wholly escaped the payment due November 1, 1917, of $3,286.30, because such rental would not have been due on October 31, 1917, and for that reason he complains somewhat that the landlord selected November 2d as the date of termination.

The payment or nonpayment of the rent must be an immaterial factor in the problem. It is not reasonable to believe that the parties intended that the selection of a date of termination with relation to a date of payment of an installment of rent should have any such result, thus making a difference of over $10 per acre per year ($4,257.11) between a termination of the lease October 31, 1918, and November 2, 1918. Such a construction is wholly inconsistent with the care with which the exact allowance per acre per year is regulated during the summer and autumn of 1917. If the lease is terminated in June or the first two weeks in July the rate is $20 per acre; from July 15th to August 15, 1917, it is $17.50 per acre, although a payment of $6.56 per acre ($2,646.27) is made July 25, 1917. The rate from October 1st to October 31st is $15 per acre, and changes on that date to $17.50, and remains the same for the balance of the term, although a payment of $8.15 per acre ($3,286.30) is due the next day (November, 1917) and remains the same, although three payments, amounting to about $5 per acre, and one of over $10 per acre, are made during this period. It is clear from the foregoing that the allowances to the tenant were made without reference to the dates or amounts of rent installments, which leads to the conclusion that the allowances were to be made against the whole rental reserved, which amount, except in the case of a termination of the whole lease, or nearly the whole lease, would be larger than the allowance.

[5, 6] While we have no doubt that this is the correct construction of the lease, and this conclusion determines the case, we will nevertheless deal with some of the points of the parties, particularly as the appellant claims that the reimbursement clause is too uncertain to be enforced, and the respondent claims that it is so ambiguous as to permit and require extraneous evidence for its interpretation. The appellant contends, and the respondent admits, that the construction of the lease is a question of law.

"Of course," says respondent, "it is elementary that the construction of a contract is always a legal question or a question of law for the court. However, where parol evidence is required to clear up the meaning of ambiguous language, such evidence should be submitted to a jury, which must determine the meaning of such ambiguous language. With the meaning of such language made clear by the jury, the court determines the legal effect of the writing. * * * All that was submitted to the jury's consideration was the meaning of the language 'per acre per year' and 'credit on the rent.'"

In this connection it should be observed that no such question was submitted to the jury. They were nowhere asked to construe the meaning of either of these terms or phrases. The instruction on which they returned a verdict is quoted above. The jury were thereby instructed to bring in a verdict for the plaintiff for $13,625.10, "if you find that the intention of the parties was that Mr. Harbinson should receive compensation for the balance of the term at the rate of," etc. The object of all construction is to arrive at the intention of the parties, so that the instruction submitted to the jury a question of law just as truly as if the court had used the equivalent phrase, "if you construe the contract to provide that Mr. Harbinson should receive," etc. This instruction and similar instructions were erroneous.

The respondent cites as justifying the instruction section 66, Blashfield on Instructions; Coquillard v. Hovey, 23 Neb. 622, 627, 37 N. W. 479, 8 Am. St. Rep. 114; *Taylor v. We will not undertake to analyze these cases for the reason that the fundamental principle involved is elementary, and is recognized in these decisions, namely, that the construction of a contract is always a matter of law for the court, no matter how ambiguous or uncertain or difficult its terms, and that the jury can only assist the court by determining disputed questions of fact. If the facts and circumstances to be considered in the interpretation of the contract are undisputed, there is nothing to submit to the jury, and the court must direct a verdict in accordance with the construction placed on the contract by the court in the light of the admitted circumstances. On the other hand, if such circumstances are in dispute, and the meaning of the contract is to be determined one way according to one view of the facts and another way in accordance with the other view of the facts, then the determination of the disputed fact must be left to the jury, but in no case can the proper construction of the contract be left to a jury. California W. D. Co. v. Cal. M. O. Co., 178 Cal. 337, 341, 177 Pac. 849. Any instruction that leaves more than this to a jury is erroneous. The dispute may be concerning the accepted meaning of trade or technical or colloquial terms in such cases, and in such cases only does the jury determine the meaning of the terms or language used in a contract. No such condition exists here. The terms of the contract are couched in ordinary language to be determined according to accepted usage, unless the circumstances of the parties and the entire contract show that the language used in the contract must receive a different or unusual construction.

In note to 12 L. R. A. 376, it is said:

"The meaning of terms of art or business is for the jury.

"This is the rule where testimony is necessary to determine the meaning of the term; but when the meaning is determined, the construction of the contract with the meaning so determined is for the court"—citing Barnard v. Kellogg, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 383, 19 L. Ed. 987, and other cases.

"The construction of a written contract is for the court alone, as soon as the true meaning of the words used and the surrounding circumstances, if any, have been ascertained as facts, and it is the duty of the jury to take the construction from the court"—citing Levy v. Gadsby, 7 U. S. (3 Cranch) 180, 2 L. Ed. 404, and other cases.

"So where the meaning of words is affected by a custom or usage of trade, it is for the jury to say in what sense they were used by the parties." 1 Blashfield's Instructions to Juries, § 66, p. 133.

And this would be true where the contracts between the parties and the ordinary course of business contemplated by them in connection with the contract gave to the terms therein used a peculiar meaning, such, for instance, as in the case of First National Bank v. Bowers, 141 Cal. 253, 74 Pac. 856, where the words "with B-L attached" were to be construed. It was admitted by the parties that the letters "B-L" meant a bill of lading, but the question in issue was what sort of a bill of lading was contemplated by the parties. It was contended, on the one hand, that the bill of lading intended was one which vested title to the oranges therein described in the bank, and, on the other hand, that according to the course of business of the parties it meant any bill of lading accompanying a draft for oranges even where the consignee was an agent of the consignor and regardless of whether or not the bank secured a lien upon the oranges by the bill of lading. The trial court having instructed the jury to bring in a verdict for the defendant, it was held that the instruction was erroneous for the reason that the court thereby determined that the defendant was only liable as guarantor for such drafts as had attached thereto bills of lading which conveyed title, whereas it was shown that according to the ordinary course of business as conducted for the two years covered by the guaranty it had been the custom of the Haight Fruit Company, whose drafts were guaranteed by the defendant, to use the form of draft by which the shipper retained control over the consigned fruit until delivered. Under these circumstances it was held that the jury should determine the sense in which the parties used the term "bill of lading attached." The main question considered by this court was whether or not the construction of the contract of guaranty by the trial court was correct, and the court does not indicating the form of instructions by which the questions should be submitted to the jury. Upon the second appeal in that case, 153 Cal. 95, 94 Pac. 422, it is said:

"Upon appeal [the previous appeal] this court held that the wording of the guaranty was not so plain, unambiguous, and certain as to have justified the court in refusing evidence explanatory of it."

The decision of the court in First National Bank v. Bowers, supra, goes no further than to hold that, where a technical phrase like "bill of lading" is used, it can be properly left to a jury to determine the form and terms of the bill of lading intended by the parties as ascertained by their conduct and dealings with reference to bills of lading. This case is not authority for submitting to the jury the general question as to the intention of the parties to be ascertained by construing a contract, and expressions in the opinion which would so indicate cannot be considered as authority because juries are triers of the facts and not of the law, and because of subsequent decisions in which the functions of the jury in matters of interpretation are determined. Estate of Donnellan, 164 Cal. 14, 19, 127 Pac. 166, 168; Estate of Thomson, 165 Cal. 290, 131 Pac. 1045; Cal. W. D. Co. v. Cal. M. O. Co., supra. In Estate of Donnellan, supra, wherein the construction of a will was involved, it was said:

"It is a fundamental and indisputable proposition that, wherever doubt arises as to the meaning of a will, such doubt is resolved by construction, and that construction is one of law; it is an application of legal rules governing construction either to the will alone or to properly admitted facts to explain what the testator meant by the doubtful language. In those cases where extrinsic evidence is permissible there may be a conflict in the extrinsic evidence itself, in which case the determination of that conflict results in a finding of pure fact. But, when the facts are thus found, those facts do not solve the difficulty. They still are to be applied to the written directions of the will for the latter's construction, and that construction still remains a construction at law. In such cases, where the evidence of the facts is in conflict, it is permissible for the court or for the jury to find the facts and those findings, under firmly established principles, will not here be disturbed. But the application to the will itself of the facts found, admitted, or established presents a question of legal construction, which is as purely a question of law as is a construction of the will without resort to extrinsic evidence. Therefore, if the facts have been found by the court upon conflicting evidence, this court, accepting the findings, will still review the construction of the court in probate and determine whether or no a wrong construction at law has been reached. If the facts are admitted, or established without conflict, the justness of the application which the court made of those facts in its construction will equally, as a legal proposition, be the subject of review. Again, it is fundamental that in all cases where extrinsic evidence is admissible to aid in expounding the will the evidence is limited to this single purpose. It is considered for the purpose of explaining and interpreting the language of the will, and is never permitted to show a different intent or a different object from that disclosed (though perhaps obscurely) by the language of the will itself."

The same rules apply to interpretation of contracts. In Estate of Thomson, supra, at page 296 of 165 Cal., at page 1048 of 131 Pac., it is said:

"Appellant contends that this [the question of construction] is really a conclusion of law, and that the determination of the scope and meaning of a contract is always a question of law. Estate of Donnellan, 164 Cal. 14, 127 Pac. 166. It is perfectly true that the construction of a contract, whether that construction is to be arrived at from a mere reading of the contract itself, or from such reading aided by extrinsic evidence of circumstances and the like, is always a construction of law. But, upon the other hand, it is equally true that whether or not there is a sufficient consideration to support a contract is always a question of fact."

In Cal. W. D. Co. v. Cal. M. O. Co., supra, it is said:

"The construction of the contract in the light of the real facts is a matter of law."

In that case it was held improper to submit to the jury the question as to the intention of the parties in using the phrase "into the oil sand" contained in an oil drilling contract unless that phrase had some "special local meaning, or customary construction, with reference to which the parties contracted."

It was error in this case to submit to the jury the question of the intention of the parties to be derived in part from the language of the contract and in part from extrinsic evidence.

[7, 8] Let us next consider the character of the extrinsic evidence relied upon to ascertain the proper construction of the contract. The situation, as stated by the respondent, is as follows:

"To aid the court and jury in construing this language, the witness Harbinson was permitted to testify to many extrinsic circumstances and matters which establish, and from which, as we have pointed out, the jury concluded, the intent of the parties was that the company was to compensate Harbinson for the unexpired term of the lease, deducting therefrom, however, such rent as might be due. * * * From the testimony of the witnesses Harbinson, Glide, and Klingsmith a conflict arose. There was testimony from which the court or jury could infer or conclude that Harbinson was to be compensated so much per acre per year for the unexpired term, and while the appellant has made no assertions as to what the testimony of Glide and Klingsmith established, if we are correct in our presumption there was also testimony from which the court or jury might infer or conclude that Harbinson was to be compensated only so much per acre, regardless of the length of the unexpired term." (Italics ours.)

The evidence upon which this statement is based may be summarized as follows: Harbinson testified that he had seeded the land to alfalfa, and that in January, 1917, frost destroyed the young alfalfa, and that therefore he was compelled to reseed the land; that the reasonable expense of mowing, raking, plowing, discing, harrowing, clod-mashing, and seeding would be $4,826 and of reseeded $1,976, total $6,802, and that therefore his total expenditures for the first year were $12,734; that the anticipated return for alfalfa for the first year would be one ton, or $10 net per acre, while the second and third years the return would be six tons per acre, making a net return to the tenant of $48,360 for the last two years and a loss of $8,704 for the first year.

The appellant presented a witness who testified to a conversation between the plaintiff and the defendant's agent at the time the lease was being drawn to the effect that the amounts of $20, $17.50, $16, $15, and $17.50 were fixed with reference to the time of cutting the alfalfa and a crop of volunteer barley on the place during the year 1917. Nothing was said in that conversation about the installments of rent falling due under the contract, or about the payments "per acre per year."

The reason advanced by respondent for the reception of the evidence offered on his behalf is thus stated by respondent's counsel:

"But, further than that, one of the circumstances that the court or the jury are entitled to in getting at the meaning of this lease is what would be a fair compensation to Joe Harbinson when it was terminated."

Assuming that such evidence was admissible, where was the conflicting testimony to be submitted to the jury? There was no dispute about the cost of improving the land or about the conversation. If either of these factors were applicable to the interpretation of the contract, it was the duty of the court to make the application. Instead, the jury were instructed as follows:

"Gentlemen of the jury, you are instructed that you are entitled to take into consideration all the circumstances and facts as shown by the evidence and bearing upon the subject-matter of this lease. The subject-matter of the lease is the land, and in determining what compensation the plaintiff is entitled to, if any, for the termination of the lease, you are entitled to take into consideration the condition of the land at the time the lease was made, what would be necessary to do to the land to get it into a condition to get a stand of alfalfa, and also what would be necessary to produce on it a good stand of alfalfa. You are also instructed that you are entitled to take into consideration the amount of expense which the parties had in mind in so cultivating the land and getting a good stand of alfalfa. You are likewise entitled to take into consideration the amount of rent paid and to be paid, and also what would have been the value of the leasehold interest in the land to Mr. Harbinson with a good stand of alfalfa on it; and in determining what should be the amount of your verdict, if any, for the plaintiff, you are entitled to determine whether or not the parties entering into the lease took into consideration the expense of getting a stand of alfalfa, the amount of rent to be paid, and the value of the land in alfalfa for the portion of the time left after the lease should be terminated; and if, in the light of these circumstances you believe that the intention of the parties was that if the lease should be terminated Mr. Harbinson should receive $17.50 per acre per year for the three years, then you must find your verdict accordingly, and estimate and determine the amount. If, however, you determine that the intention of the parties was, in light of all the circumstances, that the amount of compensation should be $17.50 per acre for the remainder of the time from November 1, 1917, to November, 1919, then you must render your verdict accordingly. In other words, you are instructed [here follow hypothetical instructions, including that upon which the verdict was based]."

By this instruction the jury were directed in effect to place themselves in the position of the parties and to construe the contract, while this was exclusively the duty of the court. If the expense of planting the land to alfalfa was a legitimate matter to be considered, the evidence was before the court for that purpose. The fact is that the instructions virtually left the jury to determine whether $20,451.75 or $2,955.52 or $9,643.57, or nothing was a fair compensation to the plaintiff under the circumstances, for the court expressed no opinion whatever on the subject of the proper interpretation of the contract. The fact is that the only difficulty in the case arises out of the extrinsic evidence, and the apparent hardship thus shown to result to the tenant from the termination of the lease on November 2, 1917. The instruction to the jury assumes, as does the entire presentation of the facts by the respondent, that the parties drew a contract, whose construction must be reasonable and just under all the circumstances, whereas the real question for determination is the meaning of the written agreement. The parties may not have anticipated and evidently did not anticipate every possible condition arising from a termination of the lease at different periods during the term of the lease. It is, of course, true that the lease should be given an interpretation which would work no obvious injustice to either party if the language used is susceptible of such an interpretation, but, if not, it must be construed according to its plain import. As we have said, the terms of the lease are plain and unambiguous. The effort of the jury to give to the lease an interpretation that would be just, based upon a speculation as to what the parties intended, in effect requires the landlord not only to remit the rental for the last two years of the term, but in addition to pay the tenant a larger amount for the land for that part of the term ($13,625) than the tenant had agreed to pay for that period. In other words, the landlord is required to pay the tenant $6,812.50 per year for two years for its land instead of receiving from the tenant $5,580.25 per year (if we assume that $5,932.57 it received is a fair rental for the first year), while, if respondent's claim had been adopted, the amount paid by the landlord for the last two years ($20,451.75) would exceed the entire rental reserved for the whole term. On the other hand, the interpretation we have placed on the lease means a loss to the tenant of $5,748.48. If we subtract from that loss the amount due to the unforeseen frost, it follows that the lease was so drawn that a loss of $3,772 was likely to result to the tenant by the termination of the lease on November 2, 1917. It is therefore not a reasonable agreement as applied to the particular date of termination, but it can be made reasonable only by making a new contract for the parties, which cannot properly be done, and should not be attempted under the guise of interpreting the lease. The extrinsic evidence introduced in this case did not aid in its interpretation or justify the conclusion of the court and jury.

[9] This action was begun by the plaintiff on November 1, 1917, to restrain the defendant from taking possession of the land in pursuance of its notice of September 12, 1917, terminating the lease on November 2d. The basis of the action was the alleged insolvency of the defendant and the fact that the amounts due to the plaintiff under the lease were unpaid. The defendant answered and tendered $2,955.52, the amount it admitted to be due to the plaintiff. Thereafter on November 6, 1917, it was stipulated that the plaintiff should immediately surrender possession of the premises to the defendant, that defendant would pay $10,000 to the clerk of the court to secure to plaintiff any amount found due to him by the defendant, and that it be determined in the action what amount of money was due the plaintiff by reason of the termination of the lease. Thereafter the plaintiff filed an amended and supplemental complaint, January 8, 1919, and an amendment thereto January 14, 1919, the answer to which was filed during the trial. The defendant now claims that the failure of the plaintiff to surrender possession on November 2, 1917, was a breach of the contract, which prevents any recovery by the plaintiff. In view of the stipulation surrendering possession on November 6, 1917, and in the express agreement to submit the amount of compensation to determination in this case, it is clear that the breach, if any, was waived by the stipulation.

[10] It is claimed that the plaintiff was estopped by the selection of a remedy inconsistent with a right to compensation. but, in view of the stipulation, that question cannot arise, for this action was by mutual agreement converted into one for compensation.

The same thing is true in regard to the alleged failure of the plaintiff to prove performance of the terms of the lease which was alleged in the general terms permitted by the Code. The claim is that plaintiff's refusal to surrender the possession of the premises on November 2, 1917, was a breach, but, as we have said, this was waived by the stipulation.

[11] Defendant claims that the lease was procured by fraud, and that the verdict in that regard was against the uncontradicted evidence. The fraud is alleged to consist in representation by the plaintiff to the defendant that he was the lessee, when, in truth and in fact, he was acting for a corporation composed of himself and his brothers. The lease was made to him individually and the corporation was not formed until after the lease was executed, so there is no merit in the claim that there was no evidence to support the verdict against fraud.

What has been said disposes of other points raised by the appellant. The respondent is entitled to the sum tendered by the appellant, and should have interest thereon and costs because the appellant virtually withdrew its tender when it advanced the claim that the plaintiff should recover nothing.

The trial court is directed to modify its judgment by reducing the same to the amount of $2,955.52, with interest from November 2, 1917, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, plus the plaintiff's costs of the first trial; appellant to have his costs on appeal deducted from the judgment.

SLOANE, J. I dissent. In my judgment the proviso for paying lessee compensation for terminating his lease two years before the expiration of the term "by credit on the rent" is ambiguous as to what rents were referred to in the use of that expression. It was an ambiguity which could only be resolved by a consideration of all the conditions and circumstances surrounding the transaction in order to determine in what sense the word "rent" was used, whether as referring to rents "due and unpaid" for the expired part of the term as found by the verdict of the jury or rent "reserved in the lease" as determined by the majority opinion on this appeal.

The facts developed in evidence tending to throw light upon the interpretation which should be given to the use of the word "rent" in this connection, while established by unconflicting testimony, give rise to conflicting inferences; that is, some of the conditions and transactions suggest that the words "credit on the rent" were used in one sense, and some that they were used in the other. Under these circumstances the question was clearly one of fact for the jury.

The authorities cited in the opinion of Mr. Justice WILBUR to the point that the construction of a contract is always a question of law for the court, no matter how ambiguous its language, if the extraneous evidence explaining the ambiguity is not conflicting, are unquestioned. It is equally as well settled, however, by these authorities and others, that where the evidence is conflicting, it becomes a question of fact for the jury, not to construe the contract, but to determine what meaning the parties themselves attached to the ambiguous terms, and it is also recognized that such conflict may arise from different inferences which may be drawn from undisputed facts, as well as from a dispute as to the facts themselves. T. E. Foley Co. v. McKinley, 114 Minn. 271, 131 N. W. 316; Rapp v. Linebarger & Son, 149 Iowa, 429, 128 N. W. 555; Durand v. Heney, 33 Wash. 38, 73 Pac. 775.

First National Bank v. Bowers, 141 Cal. 253, 74 Pac. 856, is a case in point, and closely parallel to the one before us. There the ambiguity arose in the use of the term "bill of lading attached." As the main opinion states, in reviewing the decision:

"The question in issue was what sort of a bill of lading was contemplated by the parties."

It was contended, on the one hand, that the bill of lading intended was one which vested title in certain oranges, and, on the other hand, that it meant any bill of lading accompanying a draft for oranges regardless of whether the consignee secured a lien by the bill. The matter was to be determined by evidence as to the custom existing in similar transactions. The court says, quoting Thompson v. McKay, 41 Cal. 228:

"The rule is well established that, in construing doubtful instruments, they must be interpreted in the light of the surrounding circumstances. After ascertaining the relation of the contracting parties to each other, and the subject-matter of the contract, the court will, if possible, so construe the instrument, however inartificially drawn, as to give effect to the intention of the parties, provided it can be done without disregarding the language of the instrument, when all its parts are considered."

* * * The purpose to be subserved by this rule is to place the court or jury in the position of the parties at the time the contract was made, and enable it to intelligently interpret the language used by them. * * * Under these principles the plaintiff had a right to have submitted to the jury the question of what was intended, understood, and meant by the parties in the use of the term 'bill of lading attached.'"

In the instant case the opposing parties contend, on the one hand, that in using the term "credit on the rent" the parties had in mind such rents as might be due and unpaid when the lease was terminated; on the other, that the rent referred to was the term "rent" stipulated in the lease, which remained unpaid covering the remaining two years of the term for which the lease had been canceled.

It may be conceded that it is possible from certain expressions of the lease contract to give the interpretation to the disputed clause contended for by appellant, without recourse to extraneous evidence. But, on the other hand, there are other declarations that are inconsistent with such interpretation.

The lessor contracts to compensate the lessee for the loss of the remainder of the term, in case of an exercise of the option to terminate the lease, and the stipulated damages for the two years of the unexpired term in this instance was $13,625.

When the lessor exercised his option to terminate the lease as to the entire premises, the obligation of the lessee to pay future rentals was also terminated. It is conceded that all accrued rents had been paid. If the contract for damages had stopped at the unqualified agreement to compensate the lessee in the sum of $13,625, for the loss of the unexpired term, there would have been no question of the latter's right to recover that amount, without deducting therefrom over $10,000 of rent that he did not owe. Is it a reasonable interpretation of the provision that this payment should be made by a "credit on the rent" that the parties thereby intended to bind the lessee to account for rents which, under the terms of the contract, were not due or owing?

Under this construction of the contract it will be seen by a little computation that, had the lease been terminated six months earlier or six months later, the stipulated compensation would have been entirely canceled by the unexpired term rental, and all the lessee would have received from the agreement to compensate him would have been a release from obligation to pay rent on the terminated leasehold, which release he already had by virtue of the voluntary cancellation of the lease by his landlord.

The conditions of the termination of the lease as it occurred here left a balance due the lessee over the unpaid term lease of $2,955.52, which, under the ruling of the majority opinion, is all the compensation he will receive for the unexpired two years of his valuable leasehold.

When we consider, under the extraneous evidence, together with other significant facts, that the parties to the lease in framing this contract had under consideration the amount of remuneration which would compensate the lessee for the loss of the last two years of a three-year lease upon 400 acres of land which was to be planted to alfalfa the first year, at a probable net loss for that season, and contemplated matured crops for the last two years which were expected to net to the lessee many thousands of dollars the second and third years, it is a violent interpretation which accepts the one of two meanings of the term used, which would leave the tenant with only a nominal compensation for his loss.

It is argued that, if the unpaid term rent was not the thing referred to in this proviso, the reference to rent could have no application, as all accrued rents were presumed to be and had actually been paid before the termination of the lease. The option, however, reserved by the lessor to so cancel the lease extended to all or any part of the acreage, and it may well have been within the contemplation of the parties that such option would only be exercised as to part of the land, leaving accruing rents on the remainder to be applied on the stipulated damages.

I think the interpretation adopted by the jury was consistent with the conditions shown in evidence and supports the verdict for $13,625.

When the lessor agreed to "compensate" the lessee at a fixed rate per acre per year for the loss of the canceled two years of his leasehold, it agreed to give him something of value for surrendering the remainder of his term. There is no compensation in merely granting to the lessee the privilege of paying himself by applying to his claim rentals which he no longer owes, on lands which he no longer possesses.

The verdict of the jury is based upon a rational, common sense interpretation of the intent of the parties, and supports the only construction of the contract consistent with justice and fair dealing.

In the language of Justice Shaw in Stein v. Archibald, 151 Cal. 223, 90 Pac. 537:

"It is a well-settled principle applicable to the construction of contracts that, where one construction would make the contract unreasonable, unfair, or unusual and extraordinary, and another construction, equally consistent with the language, would make it reasonable, fair, and just, that the latter construction is the one which must be adopted."

It is true that the question of fact as to the interpretation of the ambiguous language of this lease was not submitted to the jury under an appropriate instruction, and instructions were given which, it is claimed, left with the jury the construction of the contract. But, even so, this error would only call for a reversal and new trial, and should not be followed by a judgment of this court taking the interpretation of the controverted language from the consideration of a jury.

1. Constitutional law 240(1)—Evidence 18—Weights and measures 2—Prohibiting sale of strawberries in half-pint containers a reasonable classification.

The provision of Fruit and Vegetable Standardization Act, § 7, that the standard basket for strawberries shall be the dry pint, though the same section permits half-pint baskets for other berries, is not unreasonable or discriminatory, since it is a matter of common knowledge that strawberries are larger and of more irregular shape than other berries, so that the sale in small containers would be detrimental to the purchaser, and since the pint and half-pint containers had the same surface area, the difference being in their depth, which is not observable when the baskets are packed, as they usually are, in six-basket trays.

2. Weights and measures 2—Acts to limit deception in marketing should be liberally construed.

Acts providing standard containers for fruits and vegetables, having for their purpose the protection of the purchasing public by the elimination of deceptive methods in the marketing of products, are beneficial in a high degree, and are to be liberally construed.

Application of Frank Fujii for a writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco, to secure the release of petitioner from custody on a charge of violating the California Fruit and Vegetable Standardization Act. Writ denied.

Eugene F. Conlin, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and R. W. Harrison, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Application for a writ of habeas corpus. The applicant was arrested upon the charge of a violation of the provisions of an act of the Legislature known as "The California Fruit and Vegetable Standardization Act" (Stats. 1921, c. 719), committed by the applicant on or about the 29th day of October, 1921, in the city and county of San Francisco, as follows:

That the said Frank Fujii "then and there unlawfully, feloniously, maliciously and willfully did sell, offer for sale and expose for sale certain strawberries in containers holding less than one dry pint, to wit, one-half dry pint, contrary to the force and effect of the statute," etc.

The applicant now seeks this writ, basing his application upon the ground that the particular provision of said act with the violation of which he is charged is unconstitutional, for the reason that the same is not uniform in its operation, but is discriminatory, in that it imposes an arbitrary and unreasonable limitation and restriction upon the property rights of the applicant in the ownership and sale of his strawberries. The particular provision of said act which the application thus assails reads, in part, as follows:

"Sec. 7. Standard packages are hereby established as follows: * * *

"(2) Standard berry baskets, dry pint containing an interior capacity of approximately thirty-three and six-tenths cubic inches and dry one-half pint containing interior capacity of approximately sixteen and eight-tenths cubic inches; provided, that the standard basket for strawberries shall be the dry pint."

[1] Section 14 of the act makes it unlawful for any person, firm, company, organization or corporation "to pack or cause to be packed for sale, or shipment, import, sale, offer for sale or deliver for shipment, any of the fresh fruits, nuts or vegetables specified in this act that do not conform to the standards herein provided. It shall also be unlawful to prepare, sell or offer for sale, a deceptive pack of fresh fruits, fresh vegetables," etc., "or to mislabel any package of such fruits, nuts or vegetables." The particular discrimination upon which the applicant herein relies is that created by the foregoing provisions in section 7 of said act as between the growers and sellers of strawberries and the growers and sellers of other berries, such as blackberries, loganberries, raspberries, huckleberries, currants, and the like, which latter berries may be packed, shipped, and sold in dry one-half pint containers, while strawberries may only be packed, shipped, and sold in dry pint containers. This, the applicant contends, creates a discrimination for which no proper basis in the way of legitimate classification exists. The applicant offers no evidence in support of this contention, but relies upon the face of the statute itself, and, in a measure, upon common knowledge as to the comparative sizes and properties of these respective species of berry product as furnishing the necessary support of his claim. The respondent to the petition herein, on the other hand, presents, as a part of his showing in support of the lawfulness of the petitioner's detention, the actual containers used in the packing, shipment, and sale of these respective berry products in conformity with the standards fixed by the statute, both in the form of the individual basket in both the pint and half-pint sizes and of the larger container known as the berry box or tray, which holds six baskets of either the pint or half-pint size. In this meager state of the record we are asked by the applicant to hold this act, as to the particular provision above quoted, unconstitutional, as showing upon its face an unjustified discrimination against the growers, shippers, and sellers of strawberries.

We are unable to so hold even with the aid of that common knowledge of the similarities and differences in the several species of berries which the applicant seeks to invoke in aid of his contention. It is a matter of common observation and knowledge that strawberries are, as a rule, much larger than the other varieties of berries referred to, and that, as a rule, they are less uniform as to size and also as to form, especially in the larger varieties. It is also a matter of common observation and knowledge that strawberries cannot be placed as compactly in containers as other varieties of berries can without rendering them liable to crushing, with the consequence of their speedy degeneration and decay. These facts of themselves would seem to furnish some basis for a classification having to do with size of containers, but when there is added to these matters of common observation and knowledge the showing made by the respondents as to the particular forms and sizes of berry containers in common use, both as to the individual basket and as to the larger box or tray, holding in each case six baskets, the reason for the classification made by the act in question becomes obvious. The half-pint basket in common use for berries is shown to have the same area as to its upper surface as the pint basket, the difference in content being due to the fact that it is much shallower in depth and of much less area as to its bottom. It is reasonably plain that this reduction in area would work to the disadvantage of the larger, more rigid and less uniform strawberry, or, in other words, that the ratio in quantity and weight would not remain constant with the reduction in size of the container. But the chief difficulty does not lie here, but rather in the divergences in ratio and opportunities for deception furnished by the customary use of the larger box or tray in the packing, shipment, and sale of the berries. These larger boxes or trays are of uniform size, whether containing the pint or half-pint basket. In each case six baskets fill the tray. When these baskets are filled with berries and placed in these trays the upper and visible area is the same in the tray containing half-pint baskets as it is in the tray containing pint baskets. The interior or lower area of each size of basket, is concealed, and thus the purchaser has no ready means of detecting the difference in content of the two trays, although the one has but half the content of the other. This opportunity for deception would not be so serious if the two sets of trays and baskets were exhibited side by side for comparison or other test as to their content, but this condition would rarely be presented if the purpose of the seller was that of deception. The act in question evidently had this precise matter in view in its provision, above quoted, making it unlawful "to prepare, sell or offer for sale a deceptive pack," etc. It may be argued that this opportunity for deception is as great in the other species of berries as in the case of strawberries, but the answer is that the same inconsistent proportion in content which was seen to exist in case of the individual baskets would also appertain in a larger degree to a cluster of baskets in the trays of uniform area. We think, therefore, that there is a sufficient basis for the classification made use of in this act to justify the discrimination as to the size of containers for strawberries.

[2] With the policy of the law we have not to deal, but it may be said that acts of this character, having for their purpose the protection of the purchasing public by the elimination of deceptive methods in the marketing of products, are beneficial in a high degree, and that such acts are to be liberally construed so as to give effect to their salutary regulations.

The writ is denied, and the petitioner remanded.

GEARY ST., P. & O. R. CO. v. ROLPH et al.
(S. F. 9350.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 2, 1922.
Rehearing Denied June 29, 1922.)

1. Corporations ⚡243(3)—Principal is liable for calls on stock held in agent's name as trustee.

Where stock of corporation stood on the company's books in the name of a trustee, who was agent for the real stockholder and holding the stock for his principal within the scope of the authority of the agent, the principal is liable to the corporation for calls for a portion of the unpaid balance of the subscription price of the stock.

2. Principal and agent ⚡132(1)—Principal is liable for agent's contracts within scope of authority, though made in agent's name.

A principal is responsible to third persons for the ordinary contracts of his agent made with third persons in the course of the business of the agency and within the scope of the agent's powers, though such contracts were made in the name of the agent, and did not purport to be other than the agent's personal obligations.

3. Principal and agent ⚡145(4)—Third person cannot hold undisclosed principal after electing to hold agent.

The rule that a third person can hold an undisclosed principal on contracts made by his agent in the agent's name is subject to exception when the third person knows he is dealing with an agent and knows who is the principal, and thereafter elects to hold the agent, and not the principal.

4. Corporations ⚡228—Liability of stockholder for unpaid portion of subscription is not in writing.

The liability of a stockholder to an insolvent corporation for the unpaid portion of the par value of the stock is not evidenced by a written agreement, but arises from his relation to the company as a stockholder.

5. Principal and agent ⚡132(1)—Fact that principal was known to third person does not relieve his liability on contracts in agent's name.

The mere fact that the principal is known to a third person at the time the latter makes a contract with the principal's agent in the name of the agent instead of the principal does not alone prevent the third person from holding the principal liable on the contract, in view of Civ. Code, § 2330, stating that an agent represents his principal for all purposes, and that liabilities which would accrue to the agent if they had been entered on his account accrue to the principal.

6. Corporations ⚡89(1)—Insolvency of corporation is not necessary to entitle it to enforce stockholder's liability for unpaid par value.

It is not necessary that a corporation be insolvent to entitle it to enforce the liability of its stockholders for the unpaid balance of the par value of stock subscribed for by them.

7. Corporations ⚡228—Insolvent corporation owes duty to call for unpaid subscriptions for stock.

It is the duty of an insolvent corporation to resort to the liability of its stockholders for unpaid portions of the par value of its stock to enable the corporation to discharge its debts, and, if it fails to perform its duty in that respect, the creditors can enforce such liability.

8. Corporations ⚡243(3)—Statute requiring transfer on corporate books does not prevent holding undisclosed principal liable for stock in agent's name.

Civ. Code, § 324, providing that a transfer of corporate stock is not valid except as to the parties thereto until it is entered on the books of the corporation, does not prevent a corporation from enforcing a call for the unpaid balance on its stock against a stockholder whose stock stood on the books of the corporation in the name of an agent as trustee.

9. Corporations ⚡89(1)—Calls by corporation on unpaid subscriptions must be equal on stockholders.

The call by a corporation upon its stockholders for portions of the unpaid price of the stock, to be enforceable in statutory proceedings, must be equal on all stockholders, so that, when all have paid the call, each will have paid the same amount on each share of stock subject to the call.

10. Corporations ⚡228—Creditors can hold any stockholder for entire amount due on subscription.

Creditors of a corporation can require any stockholder to pay the entire amount due on his stock subscription for the satisfaction of their claims, leaving it to the stockholder to bring suit against the other holders to equalize the burden.

11. Railroads ☞15—Evidence held not to sustain finding that greater amount had been paid on some stock subscriptions.

In an action to enforce a uniform call on the holders of all the stock of a railroad corporation, evidence that, when a corporate franchise was procured, 1 per cent. of the stock was subscribed and 10 per cent. of the par value of that stock paid, as required by Civ. Code, §§ 293, 294, but that thereafter calls were made and apparently paid in equal amounts by the stockholders, does not sustain a finding that a portion of the stock, erroneously stated by the trial court to be 10 per cent., had been subject to payments larger than the rest of the stock, so as to render an equal call against all shares of stock invalid, but rather supports the inference that the amount paid in to secure the franchise had been returned to those who advanced it or had been credited on subsequent calls.

12. Corporations ☞90(6)—Evidence held not to sustain finding stock was full paid as between corporation and stockholders.

Evidence that one by-law of a corporation declared that certificates should be issued only for full paid stock, which was contradicted by another by-law providing for the issuance of stock when 20 per cent. had been paid thereon, with evidence that the stock in controversy did not recite that it was full paid when issued, which was not required by Civ. Code, § 323, prior to its amendment by St. 1905, p. 397, held not to show that the stock issued to defendant had been issued as full paid as between the corporation and the stockholders, so that the corporation could not levy a call thereon exceeding 10 per cent. under Civ. Code, § 332.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the Geary Street, Park & Ocean Railroad Company against James Rolph, trustee, and Robert F. Morrow, in which William Grant Morrow and another, as executors, were substituted as defendants after the death of Robert F. Morrow. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro and Alfred Sutro, all of San Francisco (Eugene M. Prince, of Berkeley, of counsel), for appellant.

William M. Abbott, Wm. M. Cannon, K. W. Cannon, and E. J. Foulds, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, C. J. This is an action by the plaintiff to recover of defendants the amount due from them upon an assessment or call for a portion of the unpaid subscription price of its corporate stock, amounting to $54,876 upon 1,614 shares of the stock. The action was begun in 1916, in the lifetime of Robert F. Morrow, against James Rolph, as trustee, and said Robert F. Morrow. On June 3, 1918, Morrow died. Thereupon his executors were substituted as defendants in his stead, and a claim for that amount was duly presented to them for allowance and was by them rejected. Whereupon the action proceeded to trial and judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges the number and value of the shares of the plaintiff's capital stock; that its par value is $100 per share; that only $37.50 had been paid thereon; that a call had been regularly made on the stockholders for the payment of an additional sum of $34 per share thereon for the purpose of raising money wherewith to pay its debts; that it has no assets with which to do so other than the liability of the stockholders for the unpaid balance of the stock value; and that it had duly elected to collect the amount called for by action instead of by sales of the stock. It then alleged that Robert F. Morrow was, at the date of the call, and had been ever since July 17, 1902, the owner of 1,614 shares of said stock, which shares at all times mentioned had stood and still stood in the name of James Rolph, trustee, on the books of said corporation, and for which, prior to July 17, 1902, certificates had been issued in the name of James Rolph, trustee, by plaintiff at the request of said Morrow, which certificates were by plaintiff delivered to Morrow and which he accepted and which he at all times thereafter owned; that said Rolph never had any interest in or title to the stock; and that Morrow, as such owner, had demanded and received from the plaintiff all the dividends declared by the plaintiff on said stock. The answer admitted that the said shares stood in the name of Rolph, as trustee, and that certificates had been issued to him in his name by the plaintiff, but denied the ownership thereof by Morrow, the receipt of any dividends thereon by him, the delivery of the certificates to Morrow, and the acceptance thereof by him.

The court made findings showing that the plaintiff had issued the amount of stock aforesaid; that only $37.50 had been paid on the par value of 90 per cent. thereof; that $47.50 had been paid on the remaining 10 per cent.; and that the call had been regularly made, as alleged, for $34 on each share of the entire stock. The findings also state that the 1,614 shares of stock in controversy were issued to James Rolph, trustee, and at all times stood on plaintiff's books in that name. No findings in response to the allegations of ownership by Morrow were made. The findings merely state that the shares were not issued in the name of James Rolph, trustee, at the request of Morrow, and that they were not delivered by plaintiff to Morrow or accepted by him. The failure of the court below to find upon the allegation of ownership was evidently based on the theory that Morrow could not be the owner of stock, so as to become liable to the corporation or its creditors for calls thereon for unpaid subscriptions, unless it stood on the corporate books in his name, or unless the corporation had in some manner and with his consent recognized him as the holder thereof, and that the facts that he was the beneficial owner, and the record holder his agent or trustee to hold the stock in that manner for his use and benefit, were immaterial.

It was further found that it is not true "that said Robert F. Morrow, otherwise than as the agent or representative of said James Rolph, trustee, demanded or received from plaintiff any dividend or dividends on said stock or any thereof." Technically the finding that the dividends were not received "from plaintiff," except as to one or two of them, is correct. But, if it was intended as a finding that Morrow had never received for his own use and benefit any of the dividends declared and paid by plaintiff on the stock, it is directly contrary to the undisputed evidence. The evidence shows that 116 dividends were declared and paid after May 26, 1885, the date when the first 400 of the 1,614 shares were issued to Rolph, trustee. The dividends were uniformly paid by means of checks payable to James Rolph, trustee. Rolph testified that he had regularly received these checks; that the same were usually delivered to him by Morrow, or by some one for him; that he always indorsed these checks to the order of Morrow at once and redelivered the same to him; and that he had never received or kept any of said checks for his own personal use. This evidence was not contradicted or in any manner impeached.

The plaintiff assigns as error the failure to find the facts in regard to the allegations of ownership. An examination of the record shows that there was abundant evidence to justify a finding that Morrow was at all times after its issuance the real and actual owner of this stock, and that in taking and holding it in his own name Rolph was acting solely as agent for Morrow and for the exclusive use and benefit of Morrow. In addition to the testimony of Rolph, as aforesaid, the testimony of Morrow himself, although evasive in the extreme, was sufficient to warrant the conclusion, beyond doubt, that he was the real owner. It follows that, if such ownership and agency are material to the right of the plaintiff to recover, or if the facts show such relations between Morrow and the corporation as to make him liable for calls for unpaid subscriptions, the failure to find such facts was error which requires a reversal of the judgment. Two questions are thus presented: (1) Whether or not a call for unpaid subscriptions of stock, made for the purpose of obtaining money necessary to pay the debts of an insolvent corporation, can be recovered by the corporation from one who is the real owner of stock which stands on the books of the corporation in the name of another as trustee or agent, the trust or agency being for the sole purpose of holding the stock for the use and benefit of the real owner; (2) whether or not the conduct of Morrow with respect to this stock and the corporation put him in such relation or privacy with the corporation as to make him directly liable to it for such calls.

It will not be necessary to consider the second question. We are of the opinion that under the facts of this case Morrow became liable to the corporation for the call in question.

[1] Rolph held the legal title to this stock. It was registered on the corporate books in his name as trustee. Morrow's ownership was not disclosed by the registry. But Rolph held it solely for the use of Morrow and as Morrow's agent for that purpose. As such holder Rolph assumed the obligation to the corporation to pay the balance remaining unpaid upon the subscription price, which, in the absence of any contrary showing, is presumed to have been the par value. He assumed this obligation in carrying out his agency, and it came within the scope of his powers as such agent.

[2] It is a settled rule of the law of agency that a principal is responsible to third persons for the ordinary contracts and obligations of his agent with third persons made in the course of the business of the agency and within the scope of the agent's powers as such, although made in the name of the agent and not purporting to be other than his own personal obligation or contract.

"It is thoroughly well settled in the law of agency that, when a simple contract, oral or in writing, other than a negotiable instrument, is in fact entered into by one of the parties as the authorized agent of another, but in his own name, and without disclosing to the other party the name of the principal, or even the fact that he is contracting as agent at all, the other party to the contract, while he has a right to sue the agent on the contract, may, at his option, maintain an action against the undisclosed principal, when discovered." 1 Clark & Skyles on Agency, § 457, p. 1006.

See, also Story on Agency, § 446; 2 Mecham on Agency, § 1710. The following cases in this state enforce or announce this rule: Ellis v. Crawford, 39 Cal. 526; Thomas v. Moody, 57 Cal. 219; Goss v. Helbing, 77 Cal. 190, 19 Pac. 277; Puget S. L. Co. v. Krug, 89 Cal. 244, 26 Pac. 902; Ferguson v. McBean, 91 Cal. 72, 27 Pac. 518, 14 L. R. A. 65; Bergtholdt v. Porter B. Co., 114 Cal. 689, 46 Pac. 738; Schader v. White, 173 Cal. 445, 160 Pac. 557; McKee v. Cunningham, 2 Cal. App. 688, 84 Pac. 260; Walton v. Davis, 22 Cal. App.

It has been said in some cases that this rule does not prevail when, at the time the contract is entered into, the principal is known. In Ferguson v. McBean, supra, the court, in the course of its discussion, said:

"It is undoubtedly true that when the principal is undisclosed he may sue or be sued, but not when he is known, and especially not when he is present at the making of the contract."

But the court was there considering the question whether or not one Bills was interested in or bound by a written contract executed by McBean alone, upon negotiations conducted by plaintiff with both McBean and Bills in which the interest of Bills, if any, was fully disclosed. The decision was based on the conclusion that the plaintiff deliberately chose to take the contract of McBean alone instead of a contract by both, and that under the peculiar circumstances of the case parol evidence could not be received to show an intent to deal with both so as to make Bills liable as an interested party, because it would violate the rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to vary the terms of a writing. The above-quoted statement was not necessary to the decision, nor was the decision based on it.

[3] The rule is subject to the well-recognized exception that the principal cannot be held liable when the third person knows that he is dealing with an agent and knows who is the principal, and elects to hold the agent rather than the principal. 1 Clark & Skyles, Agency, §§ 459, 461, 462. It was to this proposition that the above statement was leading.

[5] We are also of the opinion that the better reason, as well as the weight of authority, is against the proposition that the mere fact that the principal is known to the third person at the time he contracts with the agent prevents such third person from holding the principal liable on the contract made in the name of the agent. We treat this point because upon a new trial it may appear that the agency was fully known to plaintiff.

That the principal is not liable in such a case if the circumstances, or the terms of the contract, or the two combined, show an intent by the other party to take the agent as his debtor or obligor, in preference to the principal, is, as we have said, well established, and it is manifestly in accordance with reason and justice. In such a case the election takes place at the time of the making of the contract. But, where no such election or intent appears and there is nothing more than a contract made in the name of the agent, knowing him to be such and with knowledge of the identity of his principal, the case is, and should be, governed by the well-known principle that he who acts by another acts by himself; that the contract of the agent, within the scope of his authority, is in legal effect the contract of the principal. The Civil Code states that—

"An agent represents his principal for all purposes within the scope of his actual or ostensible authority, and all the rights and liabilities which would accrue to the agent * * * within such limit, if they had been entered on his own account, accrue to the principal." (Section 2330.)

Here Rolph was engaged by Morrow to register Morrow's stock in his, Rolph's, own name, and hold it for the use of Morrow. It was a necessary incident of such agency that Rolph should assume in his own name the obligation to pay up, on call, the balance of the stock subscription. He was therefore authorized by Morrow to assume such obligation. If Rolph had entered into this relation on his own account the liability for the calls would, of course, have "accrued" to Rolph. Consequently, under the rule of section 2330, the liability to respond to such calls "accrued to the principal," Morrow.

The authorities fully support this conclusion. Mr. Story says:

"The liability of the principal to third persons upon contracts made by his agent, within the scope of his authority, is not varied by the mere fact, that the agent contracts in his own name, whether he discloses his agency or not, provided the circumstances of the case do not show that an exclusive credit is given to the agent."

And he extends this doctrine to written contracts. Sections 446, 446a. And as to the exceptions he says:

"The exceptions to this liability of the principal may easily be gathered from what has been already stated. If the principal and agent are both known, and exclusive credit is given to the latter, the principal will not be liable, although the agent should subsequently fail; for it is competent to the parties to agree to charge one, exonerating the other; and an election, when once made, is conclusive and irrevocable." Section 447.

"Sometimes a subscription for stock is made by one person in his own name, but really he is acting as the agent of another, and the stock is entered on the corporate books in the name of the agent. In such a case it is the rule that corporate creditors may hold either the principal or the agent responsible on the stock."

1 Cook on Cor. § 249.

"In America the relation of the real owner to the 'dummy' is held to be that of principal and agent, and the principal is held liable, on the ground that an undisclosed principal is liable on the contracts of his agent." 1 Cook on Cor. § 253.

In Clark & Skyles on Agency it is said that the doctrine stated might seem to be—

"opposed to the general principle of the law of contracts that a contract cannot impose a liability upon a person who is not a party to it, but this principle is held inapplicable because of the doctrine of the identity of principal and agent. The principal, although not named in the contract or disclosed at all, is regarded as having become a party thereto through the agent. The minds of the parties meet because, as was said in substance in a New York case, the agent's mind is his undisclosed principal's mind."

The reference is to Kayton v. Barnett, 116 N. Y. 627, 23 N. E. 24.

An examination of the decisions of the subject show that the idea that the principal cannot be held liable in cases where the third person, at the time of contracting, knew the principal and his relation to the transaction, arises from the unfounded assumption that, since the decisions holding the principal liable when the contract does not disclose his name or interest, refer to him as the "undisclosed principal," the doctrine does not prevail when he is known. But this language is used because the principal was insisting, not that he is not liable when he is known, but that he is not liable when the contract does not on its face purport to bind him, or to be for his behoof or benefit. It is this circumstance that is referred to by the word "undisclosed." The principal would have no standing in court to say he is not liable when his authorized agent makes a contract purporting to be for him and the party taking it had full knowledge of the fact that it was for him. The liability when he is undisclosed does not arise from his not being known, although sometimes fraud from that fact is also involved, but from the fact that the contract of his authorized agent, though not in his name, is really for his benefit and in his business. Thus Mr. Mechem says:

"The principal is also liable on all informal contracts entered into on his account and by his authority and not expressly made on the agent's responsibility rather than the principal's. * * * Where a person is known to be acting as the agent of a disclosed principal, the presumption is that the principal, and not the agent, is to be bound." 2 Mechem on Agency, § 1710; see, also section 1717.

[6, 7] It is not necessary to the enforcement of this liability that the insolvency of the plaintiff corporation or its inability to pay its debts should appear, for the liability exists under the general principles of law. In this case, however, the insolvency does appear, and these liabilities for calls are not only part of the corporate assets, but they constitute the whole thereof. It is the duty of the corporation to resort to them for the payment of its debts, and, if it fails in that respect, its creditors may do so. Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 60, 23 L. Ed. 220; Baines v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 581, 27 Pac. 674, 30 Pac. 776, 29 Am. St. Rep. 158; Rhode v. Dock Hop Co., 184 Cal. 378, 379, 194 Pac. 11, 12 A. L. R. 437. There are many cases holding that, where the corporation is insolvent, the creditors have the benefit of the liability of the real owner of stock held on the books of the corporation in the name of an agent, disclosed or undisclosed, but really for the benefit of the real owner. Among them are the following: Brown v. Artman (C. C.) 166 Fed. 485; Brown v. Huey (C. C.) 166 Fed. 483; Kurtz v. Brown, 152 Fed. 374, 81 C. C. A. 498, 11 Ann. Cas. 576; American, etc., Co. v. Kurtz (C. C.) 134 Fed. 665; White v. Marquardt, 105 Iowa, 147, 74 N. W. 930; Fell v. Securities Co., 11 Del. Ch. 234, 100 Atl. 788; Gordon v. Cummings, 78 Wash. 519, 139 Pac. 493; State ex rel. v. Superior Court, 44 Wash. 108, 87 Pac. 40; Cole v. Satsop, 9 Wash. 487, 37 Pac. 700, 43 Am. St. Rep. 858; Ohio V. N. Bank v. Hulitt, 204 U. S. 162, 27 Sup. Ct. 179, 51 L. Ed. 423.

[8] In opposition to this conclusion, the defendants rely on section 324 of the Civil Code and on the decision of this court in People's Home Savings Bank v. Stadtmuller, 150 Cal. 106, 88 Pac. 280, Geary Street, etc., Co. v. Bradbury, 179 Cal. 46, 175 Pac. 457, and Visalia, etc., Co. v. Hyde, 110 Cal. 632, 43 Pac. 10, 52 Am. St. Rep. 136, which, they claim, prevent the application of such rule in this state.

The provisions of section 324 relating to the question are as follows:

"Whenever the capital stock of any corporation is divided into shares, and certificates therefor are issued, such shares of stock * * * are personal property, and may be transferred by indorsement, by signature of the proprietor * * * and the delivery of the certificate; but such transfer is not valid, except as to the parties thereto, until the same is so entered upon the books of the corporation as to show the names of the parties by whom and to whom transferred, the number of the certificate, the number or designation of the shares, and the date of the transfer."

It is claimed by the defendants that this provision forbids and prevents the existence of any liability for calls upon unpaid stock in favor of the corporation against any one except the registered owner. It will be seen from the language of the section that it does not purport to declare anything concerning the liability of a stockholder for the unpaid part of the subscription price. It relates exclusively to transfers of shares of stock and to the things necessary to make such transfers valid as to other persons than the transferor and the transferee. We are not here concerned with the validity of the transfer of the stock to James Rolph, trustee, as between him and the person who transferred it to him. The record does not show how or from whom Rolph received the stock. The theory upon which the plaintiff here is allowed to choose to resort to the liability of the principal for the obligations of his agent is not based upon the proposition that the transfer of this stock to Rolph as trustee for Morrow was invalid. On the contrary, it assumes the validity thereof, and places the liability of Morrow upon the doctrine already stated that the principal is liable to such third person on any valid obligation incurred by the agent to such person in carrying out the business of the agency. There is nothing in the provisions of section 324, or in any other provision of the Code, that in any manner relates to or affects the right which the corporation would have, under the general principles of law, to enforce against the principal the obligation incurred by the agent. Such right depends on the relation of principal and agent existing between Morrow and Rolph with respect to the stock. That relation is perfectly lawful, and its lawfulness is not affected by the fact that Morrow could not maintain any right as a stockholder to participate in the management of the corporate affairs at stockholders' meetings, or to inspect its books, except through the medium of Rolph as his agent and trustee. The right of the corporation to pursue Morrow for Rolph's liability is not at all inconsistent with the absence of any right in Morrow to personally act in or control the corporate business. The provisions of section 324, therefore, do not constitute a defense to this action.

We find nothing in the decisions cited by the defendants which gives to section 324 the effect claimed for it, or which impairs or destroys the plaintiff's right to pursue Morrow for the amount of the call formally and technically made upon Rolph as holder of this stock.

People's Home Savings Bank v. Stadtmuller, supra, is the leading case in this state on the subject. In that case the plaintiff attempted to enforce an unpaid call by action against Anna Stadtmuller. The stock had been subscribed for and had been issued to F. D. Stadtmuller, her husband, in his lifetime, and he died the owner thereof. Upon the settlement of his estate the certificates and title thereto were distributed to said widow. She accepted the certificates and retained the same, but never caused the transfer thereof to her to be entered on the books of the corporation, nor otherwise assumed the relation of a stockholder with the plaintiff. The corporation about that time became insolvent, and shortly afterward duly made a call for the unpaid portion of the subscription price of the stock. The court said that, where stock had been transferred from the record holder to another who does not cause the transfer to be registered, "or in some way equivalent in the eye of the law establishes the relationship of stockholder between himself and the company, and is thus accepted by the company as a substituted stockholder for the original holder," the corporation "has no right of action against the transferee, because, as between him and the corporation, the contractual relation of stockholder has not been created." It will be seen that there had been no agency of the husband to hold the stock for his wife; the corporation did not attempt to enforce the original subscription of the husband as her agent or in his own behalf, but was proceeding solely to enforce the obligation which it claimed had been created by implication of law against the wife upon the acceptance by her of the stock distributed to her. There was no suggestion or claim that she was liable as principal for the obligation of her agent incurred for her in the course of his business as such agent. That question did not arise, and the decision does not affect it in any manner.

In Visalia R. R. Co. v. Hyde, supra, the stock was entered on the corporate books in the name of Hyde, but before the making of the call thereon he had sold it to another person and had indorsed and delivered the certificate to that person. That transfer, however, had not been entered on the corporate books. It was held that the defendant was liable for the call, notwithstanding the previous sale and the fact that he was not the owner thereof when the call was made. The mere statement of the facts shows that the right of the corporation to sue the principal for an obligation assumed in his behalf by his authorized agent was not involved in the case. In Geary Street, etc., Co. v. Bradbury, supra, it is said incidentally in the course of the argument that a purchaser of stock not fully paid up does not become liable to the corporation for calls thereon until in some manner he comes into privity with it as a stockholder. But the defendant in that case was the registered owner of the stock at the time the call was made, which, it may be remarked, was the same call as is here involved, and no question of the character here involved and urged was presented or could be presented. These cases, therefore, do not conflict with our conclusion that Morrow became liable as principal.

Upon the foregoing principles we are of the opinion that Morrow became liable to the plaintiff for calls regularly made on the subscription price of this stock, that his ownership of the stock and Rolph's agency were facts material to the plaintiff's case as alleged, and that the court below erred in failing to find such facts.

The respondent contends that the assessment is invalid because it is unequal in operation. The point is based on the findings that in 1915, when the assessment was made, there were outstanding 10,000 shares of stock of the par value of $100 each, upon 90 per cent. of which $37.50 a share was paid up, and upon the other 10 per cent. $47.50 a share was paid up. This would mean that 9,000 shares were paid up to $37.50 a share and 1,000 shares up to $47.50 a share.

[9] The prevailing rule with regard to calls made by the corporation itself on unpaid subscriptions for additions to its working capital is that they must be equal, so that, when all have paid the call, all the stockholders included in the call will have paid the same amount on each share of their stock subjected to the call. 4 Thompson, Corp. § 3713; 1 Cook on Corp. § 114; 1 Clark & M. on Corp. § 499f; O'Dea v. Hollywood, 154 Cal. 70, 97 Pac. 1.

[10] Where creditors proceed by bill in equity to apply the unpaid stock subscription to the payment of corporate debts, this rule does not prevail; each is liable for the full amount unpaid on his subscription, and any inequality resulting from the proceeding is adjustable only by suits for contribution between the respective stockholders. Kaye v. Metz (Cal. Sup.) 198 Pac. 1049; 1 Cook on Corp. § 211; Pentz v. Hawley, 1 Barb. Ch. 123. While this call and the action to enforce it is really for the benefit of creditors, it is nevertheless a statutory proceeding, and, so far as we are advised, it is uniformly held that such a call by the corporation pursuant to statutory authority is void unless it is made in such manner as to produce no inequality between stockholders. To apply this rule to the present case, for illustration, a call for $34 a share could not be lawfully made on all the shares, if some of them are only $37.50 paid up and others are $47.50 paid up. Hence, under this rule, if the facts are as stated, the call would be invalid.

[11] The only basis for the finding that 1,000 shares were paid up to the amount of $47.50 a share is the statement in the plaintiff's articles of incorporation, dated November 5, 1878, that the amount of the capital stock is $1,000,000, divided into 10,000 shares of $100 each; that the amount thereof actually subscribed was 100 shares; that this was more than $1,000 per mile of the length of the road; and that 10 per cent. thereof had been paid in to the treasurer. One hundred shares, it is to be noted, was only 1 per cent. of the total capital stock, not 10 per cent., and the remainder thereof was 99 per cent., not 90 per cent. The sum paid in was not $10,000; it was only $1,000. Therefore the finding that $47.50 was paid up on 1,000 of the shares is not sustained by the evidence.

The effect on the validity of the assessment might perhaps be the same, the inequality would still be manifest, if $38.50 instead of $47.50 per share had been paid on part of the stock assessed, and only $37.50 on the remainder. There is evidence, however, showing that the inequality did not exist. The books and records of the corporation were partly destroyed by the great fire of April, 1906. There was uncontradicted evidence, partly secondary and partly derived from books not destroyed, to the effect that the books showed that on May 30, 1879, an assessment was made for $5 a share on the whole 10,000 shares of capital stock, and that it was on that day paid to the treasurer and credited thereon to the respective stockholders, amounting to $50,000, and that the next credit entry on the book was "June 4, 1879, Franchise (S. C. Bigelow) $1,000." Bigelow was the treasurer. It was also shown by like evidence that thereafter on the same books follow credits to the respective holders of all the stock for payments of seven other assessments, made at monthly intervals thereafter, six for $5 a share and one for $2.50 a share, the whole amounting to $375,000, or $37.50 on each of the 10,000 shares; that neither the $1,000 nor any part thereof was credited to the original subscribers, or to any stockholder as a payment on his stock, nor credited as a payment on account of capital stock at all, but only as "Franchise." This evidently refers to the franchise obtained by filing the articles of incorporation, for the recital in the articles was obviously made to show compliance with the provisions of the Civil Code requiring that before such articles are filed by any railroad corporation stock must be subscribed to the amount of $1,000 for each mile of road (section 293), and that "there must be paid for the benefit of the corporation, to a treasurer elected by the subscribers, ten per cent. of the amount subscribed" (section 294). The articles do not expressly say that the 10 per cent. paid in to the treasurer was paid by the 10 persons named therein as subscribers, or either of them, or in their behalf. The inference from all this is very strong either that the $1,000 was paid by some person on behalf of all the persons who then and afterwards took up all the stock, and was afterward refunded to him, or that before any assessment was made it was in some way equalized so that all were liable to calls in equal amounts per share. The fact that each of them, or their successors in interest, within 15 months after the filing of the articles, voluntarily paid eight separate calls of the same amount upon each share, amounting in all to $375,000 without raising any objection on account of inequality, coupled with the fact that said evidence also shows that for 35 years following, up to the year 1915, when the present call was made, the books of the corporation continuously carried charges amounting to precisely $625,000 against said stockholders, as balances unpaid on the subscription price of their capital stock, and credits amounting to exactly $375,000 to said stockholders for payments made by them thereon, instead of $376,000, as it would have been if the $1,000 had not been in some way refunded, is very persuasive, if not conclusive, proof that this "Franchise" payment was either repaid out of the general funds of the corporation to the person or persons who paid it, credited in the collection of the subsequent calls, or otherwise adjusted, so as to equalize the matter between all the stockholders. The record shows that the court below, in its consideration of the evidence, assumed that $10,000 was paid in on the 1,000 shares subscribed before the filing of the articles. This, in effect, was considering a fact which was not true and which was not in evidence. It constitutes error in character the same as the receiving of incompetent evidence, or as an erroneous interpretation of the effect of a writing on a material matter. With this erroneous idea as to the amount paid in, the court would not give the same weight to the above-mentioned strong circumstantial evidence of a subsequent return or distribution of the comparatively small sum of $1,000 actually paid and of the consequent equalization of the amount paid per share by the several stockholders. The entry of "Franchise $1,000" would be wholly without significance, and there would be nothing to explain the absence of any account of the $10,000. In so far as the possible inequality of $1 per share on 1,000 shares might be sufficient to support the judgment, if that fact had been found, or in so far as the finding of a larger inequality could be regarded as immaterial in view of the actual existence of the smaller one, it would be a judgment based on a fact which the court did not find, and which it is extremely doubtful that it would have found but for the erroneous interpretation of the effect of the evidence as aforesaid. Consequently the judgment should be reversed in order that the trial court may give the due effect to all the circumstances bearing on the point. It may be remarked in this connection that the opinion of the learned judge of the court below is printed in respondent's brief, and that it does not discuss or mention this point, but places the decision for the defendant altogether on the two propositions that Morrow could not be held liable unless he was the registered holder of the stock, and that there was no estoppel to prevent him from denying such ownership.

[12] There is also a finding that ever since its issuance the whole of the capital stock of the corporation plaintiff has been and "is now fully paid up as between plaintiff corporation and its stockholders." Upon this finding the defendant contends that, under section 332 of the Civil Code, no assessment thereon could exceed 10 per cent., and therefore that the assessment of 34 per cent., or $34 a share, is invalid. The finding by its terms implies that the stock is not paid up as between the corporation and its creditors, for whose benefit this assessment was levied, and hence it may be doubtful if it affects that assessment. But we do not think it is sustained by the evidence. The only support for it is an inference drawn from the by-laws adopted in 1878. These by-laws are contradictory on the subject so far as they relate to it all. Section 29 declares that "certificates of stock shall be issued only for fully paid stock." This, it is said, implies that no certificates were afterward issued except for stock that was fully paid up. Section 31 declares that stock shall be transferrable on the company books, on proper assignment and delivery to the assignee of "the receipts for the installments paid on such stock, or the certificates of stock when fully paid," but not "until all previous calls or installments thereon shall have been fully paid in," nor "unless at least twenty per cent. has been paid thereon and receipts issued thereon." This clearly indicates that the stock was not paid up at that time. The subsequent proceedings and transactions and the books of the company repel and destroy all inferences that the stock was issued as paid-up stock, or was, in fact, fully paid. On April 25, 1899, the order for the first assessment of $5 a share was made. It was all paid in full on May 30, 1879. The entry made at the time on the books shows that the entire capital stock had been subscribed for, the names of the subscribers, the number of shares held by each, and the payment by each of them of the $5 assessment on each share held by him. If the stock had been fully paid for previously, as now contended, there would have been a credit in the cash account for $1,000,000 in money paid for the capital stock. But no such credit appears, or ever did appear, and no one has ever claimed that any such payment was ever made. There is no record of the expenditure of such money by the corporation, or of its possession thereof. If that amount of money had been paid to the corporation at that time, there would have been no reason or necessity for any assessment on the stock, or for any issue of bonds. Yet the record shows, as above stated, that calls or assessments on the stock were made and paid monthly from April, 1879, to January, 1880, amounting to $375,000. It also shows that in 1890 the corporation issued bonds to the amount of $484,000, secured by a mortgage

PAYNE, Director General of Railroads v.
RICHARDSON, State Treasurer.
(S. F. 9763.)

covering all of its properties, and that the present assessment was made to raise the money necessary to pay a deficiency judgment entered against the corporation on a foreclosure sale under said mortgage; also, as already stated, that the stock account carried a charge of $1,000,000 against the stockholders for the aggregate amount owing upon the several stock subscriptions; that this was reduced by the credits for payments on the eight calls made and paid thereon, amounting to $375,000; and that the balance owing from stockholders was thereafter carried on the books at $625,000. It also appears that each of the eight orders or resolutions for the aforesaid calls began with the words, "It is hereby ordered that an assessment upon the subscribed capital stock" be levied. If there had been assessments upon paid-up stock, the word "subscribed" would not have been appropriate, and its use shows that the assessment was understood to be upon subscriptions owing, and not as or for a demand for an additional contribution to the corporate assets. The record indicates that the entire investment of the company did not reach the sum of $1,000,000, which, it is now claimed, was paid in by the stockholders at the beginning of its operations. There is no evidence whatever that the stock was ever sold or offered for sale by the corporation at a price less than its par value, or that the certificates originally issued therefor declared that the stock represented thereby was fully paid for. All the certificates to Rolph were issued prior to July 17, 1902. Up to that time, and afterwards until 1905, when section 323 of the Civil Code was amended (Stats. 1905, p. 397), stock certificates were not required to show the amount paid thereon, or that anything had been paid thereon. The findings recite that thereafter, in 1907, in transferring certificates for 356 shares to new holders, the corporation made and issued certificates to the new owner showing on their face that the stock was fully paid. This was not the stock held by Morrow. We are not referred to any part of the record which supports this finding or relates to it. But the evidence we have already mentioned shows that, if such statements were made in those certificates, they were not true. This finding was of an evidentiary fact only, and it is not a finding that such stock was fully paid up at that time, nor that any of the certificates held by Morrow in Rolph's name were fully paid up.

For the foregoing reasons we conclude that the judgment of the court below was not in accordance with the law and the facts, and that it cannot stand.

The judgment is reversed.

3. Taxation ⚡393—Receipts of railroad under federal control include amount due from government for transportation.

Under the Federal Control Act, § 15 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, § 3115¼o), providing that nothing in the act shall affect existing laws or powers of the states in relation to taxation, where a state tax on railroad property was based on a percentage of gross receipts, as a basis of valuation of the property, the amount of transportation furnished the government for which a railroad company had not been paid should be included in the gross receipts for the purpose of taxation.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by John Barton Payne, as Director General of Railroads, United States Railroad Administration, against Friend W. Richardson, as State Treasurer of the state of California. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henley C. Booth, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Guarena, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This action was brought to secure an adjudication that the plaintiff has overpaid the state of California the sum of $186,711.22, for taxes upon properties of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company in the state of California, this amount having been paid under protest, the plaintiff suing under and by virtue of the provisions of section 3669a of the Political Code, as added by St.

1917, p. 357, to establish the illegality of the tax and to secure judgment upon which basis an appropriation for reimbursement may be sought from the Legislature. The court sustained a general demurrer to the complaint and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant. Several questions are raised by the parties with relation to the authority of the plaintiff to bring the suit in question and as to the authority of the defendant to represent the state of California in defending against the claims of the plaintiff. We will, however, consider the main question upon its merits. The plaintiff claims that the state board of equalization improperly included in the gross receipts, upon which the tax of $5\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. was computed, the sum of \$3,556,404.28, which amount constitutes the amount charged against the United States of America for transportation of passengers and freight for war purposes. The appellant thus states his position:

"The ground of our claim that the sum sued for was erroneously and excessively levied, and collected from the Director General is that it represents $5\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. of the value of—not the amount collected for—transportation furnished by the United States to itself on, and while in exclusive possession and operation of, Southern Pacific Company operative properties in California during the calendar year 1918, and that, as the constitutional provision and statutes authorizing the gross receipts method of taxation use the words 'gross receipts from operation,' such amounts so included over the protest of the plaintiff were not gross receipts or any receipts at all."

[1, 2] The rule is well settled that the carrier's own transportation should not be considered in estimating the gross receipts of the railroad. In support of this rule appellant cites McHenry v. Alford, 168 U. S. 651, 18 Sup. Ct. 242, 42 L. Ed. 614; United Pacific Railroad Co. v. United States, 99 U. S. 402, 25 L. Ed. 274; State v. Minnesota & International Ry. Co., 106 Minn. 176, 118 N. W. 679, 1007, 16 Ann. Cas. 426; State v. Northwestern Telephone Exchange Co., 107 Minn. 390, 120 N. W. 534. It may be conceded that the transportation of the railroad company's freight would not augment the gross receipts of the company. The question presented here is quite different. Under section 15 of the Federal Control Act, 40 U. S. Stats. at Large, pp. 451, 458 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1919, § 3115 $\frac{1}{2}$), it is provided:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect the existing laws or powers of the states in relation to taxation or the lawful police regulations of the several states, except wherein such laws, powers, or regulations may affect the transportation of troops, war materials, government supplies, or the issue of stocks and bonds."

We think it clear from this provision of the federal statute that it was intended that the taxes to be paid by the Director General to various states or municipal bodies were to be ascertained in the same manner that it would have been levied and assessed had the railroad corporation remained in control. This view has also been entertained by the courts. Wabash R. Co. v. Board of Review, 288 Ill. 159, 123 N. E. 259; Penn. Coal Co. v. Saddle River Township (N. J. Sup.) 114 Atl. 157; St. Louis-San Francisco Ry. Co. v. Middlekamp, 256 U. S. 226, 41 Sup. Ct. 489, 65 L. Ed. 905. For that reason it was proper to include in the taxes the revenue derived from government transportation.

[3] Appellant's contention, however, is that the amount of $3,556,404.28 merely represents an estimate at regular tariff schedules of the amount which would be chargeable at those rates to the government, and that it is, therefore, not a receipt at all. It is so alleged in the complaint and admitted by demurrer. The point is thus stated in the appellant's brief:

"The amounts representing what would have been charged the United States Government for transportation of men and property of United States, if the Southern Pacific Company had remained in control, should have been excluded from the gross receipts, and the tax based thereon was erroneous and excessive."

The respondent claims that this question cannot be raised upon the record, for the reason that the statement furnished by the plaintiff to the state board of equalization upon which the tax was levied and collected showed that said amount had been paid and was included in the gross receipts. However, we will assume, as alleged by the plaintiff and admitted by the demurrer, that the amount has not been paid by the United States to the plaintiff, its agent, or to the railroad company, and that the statement made to the state board of equalization is also susceptible of that construction. Nevertheless, if the taxes were to be levied and assessed exactly as if in private ownership, as seems to be contemplated by the Federal Control Act (section 15, supra), there was no error in the assessment. It is true that the United States, through the plaintiff, was operating the road as a private owner would, and was not therefore required to charge to itself any freight pertaining to the operation of the railroad, or pay or charge to itself freight or passenger fares for war transportation, but for purposes of state taxation it is clear that the United States intended, as manifested in its Federal Control Act (section 15, supra), that such taxes should be ascertained on the same basis as if the railroad had remained in private ownership. Otherwise, the power of the state would be "affected" by the change of management. The system of taxation by requiring a percentage of the gross receipts to be paid to the state is merely a basis for the taxation of the property of railroads (Pullman Co. v. Richardson [Cal. Sup.] 197 Pac. 346), and the value of the railroad is obviously the same, whether operated by the company itself, or by the Director General. To depreciate the value of the property by a failure to include in the gross receipts the amount of transportation furnished the government, which would be a charge in private ownership, would be to fix a different property tax in one case from that in the other, and thus affect the state tax in violation of section 15 of the Federal Control Act, supra. That being true, it follows that the tax in question was properly collected.

SHAW, C. J. I concur.

The agreement under which the United States took possession of the railroad system of the Southern Pacific Company provided that the Director General should pay all taxes lawfully assessed by the state on the property taken, or on the right to operate as a carrier, or save said company harmless therefrom. Under the scheme of taxation provided in the Constitution of California (article 13, § 14), the state imposes upon the railroad company annually a percentage tax upon the "gross receipts from operation" of its lines situated within this state. If the company had continued to operate the lines and the United States had transported thereon the same freight and passengers that were transported for the road for government purposes under the management of the Director General during the year in controversy, the earnings from such transportation would have included the amount produced at the regular rates for such carriage. It is evident that the taxes should be computed on the same basis as if such operation had continued, and that it was not contemplated that the earnings from the transportation on government account should go free from the burden of taxation, as the plaintiff, in effect, demands.

O'BRIEN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 10246.)

1. Executors and administrators ⇨296—Receipt for inheritance taxes is prerequisite to distribution, only if report shows taxes due.

Inheritance Tax Law 1921, § 10, forbidding the distribution of the property of any estate, unless a receipt for the inheritance tax due thereon, signed by the state controller, shall first be filed in the court, must be construed with section 16, permitting a report by the appraiser to the court that no inheritance tax was due, and, when so construed, does not prohibit distribution without production of a receipt for the tax, if the report filed shows no tax was due.

2. Mandamus ⇨169—Proceedings dismissed after compliance with alternative writ.

Where respondent has complied with the alternative writ of mandate, it is unnecessary to proceed further, and the cause will be dismissed.

In Bank.

Application by Constancia O'Brien for writ of mandate, prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, and Hon. Frank H. Dunne, as Judge thereof, requiring said judge to sign and file a decree of distribution. Proceeding dismissed, because of compliance with alternative writ.

J. F. Bluxome, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. [1] In this case the superior court refused to sign and file a decree of distribution, after the same had been prepared, basing its refusal on the ground that section 10 of the Inheritance Tax Law of 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 1510) forbids the distribution of any property of an estate, unless a receipt for the inheritance tax due thereon, signed by the state controller, shall first be filed in said court. In this case it appears that, after the proceeding in administration was begun, the inheritance tax appraiser, regularly appointed to that office, reported to the court an appraisal of the estate in question, showing that the shares of the several parties interested therein were all exempt from inheritance tax, and that no inheritance tax was leviable upon any part of the estate. Thereafter this report was submitted to the court, and the court made an order approving the same and declaring that no tax was due upon the property of said estate. All this was done in pursuance of the provisions of section 16 of said act. These two sections are to be considered together and in such a manner as to be harmonious. There is no difficulty in doing this. Section 10 applies only to cases where the report of the inheritance tax appraiser shows taxes due upon the property of the estate or some part thereof, or where, after that report is made, other property has been discovered upon which no report has been made. It has no application to cases where the record in the estate itself shows that no tax is due. Therefore the court should have signed the decree of distribution.

[2] An alternative writ of mandate was issued herein, in accordance with the petition, to compel the court to sign said decree. Upon the service of that writ, the court complied with it and makes return accordingly.

This makes it unnecessary to proceed further in the case, and the proceeding is dismissed.

MARTIN v. BARTMUS. (L. A. 7128.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 6, 1922.)

1. Quieting title ☞10(2)—One in course of acquiring title to government land may maintain action to quiet title.

A person, in the course of acquiring title to government land, may maintain an action to quiet title against parties to whose claims of title her equities are superior. Code Civ. Proc. § 738.

2. Judgment ☞747(6)—Judgment for unlawful detainer not admissible, under plea in bar in action involving title to premises in dispute.

A judgment for unlawful detainer, is not admissible, under a plea in bar in an action involving the title to the premises in dispute.

3. Public lands ☞106(1)—Holding of Department of Interior determining rights of conflicting claimants to public lands final.

Where the record in an action disclosed that the question of the conflicting rights of the parties to the action to obtain title from the United States Government, under the Desert Land Act March 3, 1877, as amended by Act March 3, 1891 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4674-4678), was fully presented to the Department of the Interior, in the method provided by said act for determining the rights of the conflicting claimants, and was therein finally determined, such holding is final and conclusive as to the issues involved in such hearing.

4. Quieting title ☞51—Trespassers not entitled to reimbursement for voluntary improvements.

Where, in an action to quiet title, defendants by counterclaim alleged that, while in possession of the land, they had made certain improvements thereon, but in respect to these the trial court found that such improvements were voluntary and made while the defendants were mere trespassers, defendants were not entitled to reimbursement for such improvements.

5. Quieting title ☞50—Granting writ of possession in action to quiet title held proper.

In an action to quiet title, the trial court, after finding defendants were mere trespassers on the land in question, and finding otherwise in plaintiff's favor, did not err in granting to the successful plaintiff the incidental remedy of a writ of possession, permitted by the express terms of Code Civ. Proc. § 380.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Lillie E. Martin against Peter Bartmus and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Sebold L. Cheroske, of Los Angeles, and E. R. Simon, of El Centro (W. J. Tremear, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Frank C. Prescott and Frank G. Falloon, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, in an action to quiet title to a tract of 320 acres of land in the Imperial Valley. The land was and still is government land, subject to entry and acquisition under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1877, and amended March 3, 1891, commonly known as the Desert Land Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4674-4678). By the terms of the act, the entryman was not required to live upon the land but was required to make first, second, third, and fourth and final proof of certain expenditures toward the irrigation, reclamation, and cultivation of such lands. The plaintiff, in her complaint herein, alleges that, on the 4th day of March, 1913, she had filed a desert land entry upon said land and that, on the 4th day of March, 1914, she had submitted in due and legal form her first annual proof as required by said act, and thereafter had also in due time and form submitted her second and third annual proofs, and had thereby gained the right to take possession of said land and to make her fourth and final proofs necessary to secure a patent to said land, but that the defendant has wrongfully and illegally entered upon said land and forcibly and wrongfully holds and occupies the same to the exclusion of the plaintiff, and, by so doing, prevents her from the acquisition of such possession of the same as is necessary to enable her to make her final proofs thereon and obtain her patent therefor. Wherefore the plaintiff prays that the defendant be required to set forth the nature of his adverse claims, in order that the same may be determined and her right and title to said land be quieted as against such claim, and that she may be adjudged entitled to the possession of said land and have a writ of possession for the same.

The defendant in his answer denies most of the material averments of the plaintiff's complaint. He also, by way of a further and separate answer, alleges the existence of a certain judgment in his favor in an action of unlawful detainer brought by the plaintiff against him, and which he alleges constitutes a bar to the present action. He also pleads certain affirmative matter by way of counterclaim and also of cross-complaint. There were certain other parties named in the complaint besides the appellant, Bartmus, but as to these they either defaulted or filed disclaimers, and no relief was sought or awarded.

ed as to them. The facts, as developed at the trial and as found by the trial court, were briefly these: The plaintiff had, as she averred, and as the defendants admitted, filed her desert land entry on March 4, 1913, and a year later had submitted in due form her first annual proof as required by the Desert Land Act. On October 26, 1914, the defendants Peter and Dora Bartmus filed a contest in the United States land office at Los Angeles against the plaintiff's said entry, to which contest the plaintiff herein filed an answer. Upon the hearing thereon, the local land officers decided the same in the contestants' favor, but, upon appeal by plaintiff herein to the Commissioner of the General Land Office and thence to the Secretary of the Interior, said contest was finally decided in the said plaintiff's favor, the Secretary of the Interior by his decision dismissing said contest and deciding that the said plaintiff had made a legal desert land entry and had duly made her first annual proofs thereon and had duly submitted her second and third annual proofs thereon and was entitled to have the same approved. Said decision of the Secretary of the Interior was rendered on March 12, 1917, but, prior thereto and on the 25th day of June, 1915, the defendants Bartmus had entered upon said land and continued thereafter to hold the same to the exclusion of the plaintiff therefrom. During the time of their said possession of said land, the said defendants had made certain improvements thereon, which, however, the court found to have been made by them voluntarily and while said defendants were trespassers upon said land. In August, 1917, the plaintiff commenced an action in unlawful detainer against said defendants, in which action the defendants prevailed, the court finding and adjudging that the plaintiff was not at said time entitled to recover possession of the premises from the defendants. The trial court in the present action, however, found that the issues tendered in that action were not the same as those presented in the instant case and hence that the judgment therein did not constitute a bar to the present action. The conclusion of the trial court in the instant case was that the plaintiff was entitled to have her title quieted as against said defendants, and to have a writ of possession for the lands in question as against the defendants, whose adverse claims were adjudged to be invalid. From this judgment, the defendant Peter Bartmus prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The appellant's first contention is that, since it appears that the title to the premises in question is still in the United States government, she is not in a position to maintain her action to quiet her title to said premises as against the appellant. There is no merit in this contention. It has been repeatedly held by this court that a person who is in the course of acquiring title to government land may maintain an action to quiet title or in ejectment, the same as against other parties to whose claims of title her equities are superior. Wilson v. Madison et al., 55 Cal. 5; Orr v. Stewart, 67 Cal. 275, 7 Pac. 693; Kitts v. Austin, 83 Cal. 169, 23 Pac. 290; Wormouth v. Gardner, 105 Cal. 149, 38 Pac. 646. The same doctrine has been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in Gauthier v. Morrison, 232 U. S. 452, 34 Sup. Ct. 384, 58 L. Ed. 680. The cases cited by the appellant in support of his contention in this regard do not run counter to the rule above stated. They are to the effect that a party holding merely the certificate of the receiver of the United States land office cannot maintain an action in ejectment against one in possession of property, the title to which is in the United States. The present action is not, however, an action in ejectment but an action to determine adverse claims under section 380 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by the terms of which section of the Code a writ of possession may follow a judgment in the plaintiff's favor.

[2] The appellant's next contention is that the judgment pleaded in his answer, as having been rendered in his favor in an action for unlawful detainer, and which was not appealed from, constituted a sufficient plea in bar to the present action. It has been consistently held by this court that, in such an action, the sole question in issue is the right of present possession and that the question of title cannot be litigated therein (Felton v. Millard, 81 Cal. 540, 21 Pac. 533, 22 Pac. 750; Knowles v. Murphy, 107 Cal. 107, 40 Pac. 111), and hence that the judgment roll in an action of unlawful detainer is not admissible under a plea in bar, in an action involving the title to the premises in dispute (Fish v. Benson, 71 Cal. 428, 12 Pac. 454).

[3] Furthermore, the record in this case discloses that the question of the conflicting rights of the parties to this action to obtain title to the same from the United States government under the Desert Land Act was fully presented to the Department of the Interior, in the method provided by said act for determining the rights of conflicting claimants under said act, and was therein finally determined in the plaintiff's favor. Such holding is final and conclusive as to the issues involved in such hearing. Green v. Hayes, 70 Cal. 281, 11 Pac. 716; Shanklin v. McNamara, 87 Cal. 378, 26 Pac. 345; Grant v. Oliver, 91 Cal. 158, 27 Pac. 596, 861; Wormouth v. Gardner, 125 Cal. 316, 58 Pac. 20; Gage v. Gunther, 136 Cal. 338, 68 Pac. 710, 89 Am. St. Rep. 141. The defendants herein by their answer attempt to put in issue the same matters which were decided adversely to them by the Department of the Interior.

[4, 5] This, under the foregoing authorities, they cannot be permitted to do. In their counterclaim the defendants alleged that, while in possession of said land, they had made certain improvements thereon in the way of preparing the land for irrigation and of erecting certain buildings thereon, but, in respect to these, the trial court found that such improvements and expenditures were voluntary in character, and were made while the defendants were mere trespassers upon the premises, and hence that they were not entitled to reimbursement from the plaintiff for the same. We perceive no error in this ruling; nor do we think that the trial court, after finding that the defendants were mere trespassers upon the land in question and finding otherwise in the plaintiff's favor, was in error in granting to the successful plaintiff the incidental remedy of a writ of possession, permitted by the express terms of section 380 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Judgment affirmed.

CONSOLIDATED ADJUSTMENT CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SONOMA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 10162.)

1. Courts — 120—Demand in action must be $300 to give superior court jurisdiction.

In order that the superior court may have jurisdiction under the Constitution, the demand in the action must amount to $300.

2. Courts — 122—Amount of demand in action, and not in prayer of petition, determines superior court's jurisdiction.

The determining factor in ascertaining the amount involved in a suit to determine jurisdiction are the allegations of fact, and not the amount in the prayer of complaint.

3. Courts — 121(2)—Amount demanded in action on contract determined to fix jurisdiction.

A contract for commissions for collections due plaintiffs, where initial payment of $148.23 was made, with agreement by defendant to prosecute and adjust claims for plaintiff for three years, and, unless an agreed sum was collected, to return the initial payment, and to receive a commission on all amounts collected over the sum fixed, held not an agreement within Civ. Code, §§ 1448, 1449, governing agreements requiring performance of one of two acts, but that the amount demanded in an action on the contract was the amount of initial payment, and that the circuit court did not have jurisdiction thereof.

4. Prohibition — 3(2) — Question of plain, speedy, adequate remedy by appeal one of fact.

The question of whether there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal is a question of fact, depending upon the circumstances of the particular case.

5. Prohibition — 3(2) — Appeal to district court of appeal involving inconvenience and expense held not plain, adequate, speedy remedy.

Where an appeal to the district court of appeal would involve considerable expense in transporting witnesses a distance of 50 miles and preparing transcript, held not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy as contemplated in Code Civ. Proc. § 1103.

Proceedings in prohibition to prevent the Superior Court of the County of Sonoma from assuming jurisdiction and proceeding with the trial of an action therein, entitled William Evart and others against the Consolidated Adjustment Company of California. Writ of prohibition issued.

P. R. Lund and Russell W. Cantrell, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Emmett I. Donohue, of Sebastopol, for respondents.

SHAW, C. J. This is a proceeding in prohibition to prevent the superior court of the county of Sonoma from assuming jurisdiction and proceeding with the trial of an action therein, entitled William Evart et al., plaintiffs, versus Consolidated Adjustment Company of California, defendant.

The petition is based upon the proposition that the complaint in the action shows that the cause of action set forth therein is for the recovery of money to the amount of $148.23 and no more, and that the superior court has no jurisdiction of a cause of action to recover less than $300. The question for determination is whether or not said complaint sets forth a cause of action for the recovery of $300 or more.

The complaint alleges that, in April, 1918, plaintiffs and defendant entered into a contract, whereby, in consideration of the payment by plaintiffs to defendant of $148.23, and the agreement to pay commissions on collections thereafter made by defendant, of claims due to the plaintiffs, the defendant agreed to act in behalf of plaintiffs for the period of three years in the prosecution and adjustment of claims aggregating $3,650.37. The agreement then proceeded as follows:

"The Consolidated Adjustment Company of California guarantees that it will recover in cash, or secured net settlement, from the claims of said client at least $518.80, or to refund the full initial fee paid at the termination of this contract."

It also contained a reservation by the defendant of the right to rescind the contract within twelve months, which is immaterial here. The complaint then proceeds to allege that thereupon the plaintiffs delivered to defendant for prosecution and adjustment the claims referred to in said contract and paid the defendant said initial fee of $148.23; that said agreement had terminated on April 29, 1921; that defendant has not recovered $518.80 on said claims, or any other sum whatever, and has not refunded to plaintiffs, or either of them, the initial fee aforesaid at the termination of the contract or at all. Thereupon the complaint prayed for $518.80.

[1, 2] The fact that the prayer of a complaint is for the recovery of more than $300 does not conclusively determine the proposition that the action is for the recovery of that amount and that the superior court has jurisdiction thereof. In order that the superior court may have jurisdiction, under the Constitution, the demand in the action must amount to $300. In Lehnhardt v. Jennings, 119 Cal. 198, 48 Pac. 56, 51 Pac. 195, the court had under consideration the question whether the prayer of the complaint, or the facts stated therein, constituted the determining factor in ascertaining whether the demand in suit amounted to $300, and it determined that the amount demanded was not conclusive, but that the allegations of fact were determinative of the question, and that, where the complaint showed that less than $300 was really in controversy, there was no jurisdiction in the superior court. In California, etc., Association v. Ainsworth, 134 Cal. 462, 66 Pac. 586, the complaint prayed judgment for $700. Upon considering the facts alleged, the court determined that the utmost the plaintiff was entitled to under the facts alleged was $14. Thereupon it held that the action was not within the jurisdiction of the superior court. The point for consideration, therefore, is whether or not, under the facts stated in the complaint, a recovery by the plaintiff of $300 or more can be had.

[3] The plaintiffs claim that the case comes within the terms of sections 1448 and 1449 of the Civil Code. They read as follows:

"1448. If an obligation requires the performance of one of two acts, in the alternative, the party required to perform has the right of selection, unless it is otherwise provided by the terms of the obligation.

"1449. If the party having the right of selection between alternative acts does not give notice of his selection to the other party within the time, if any, fixed by the obligation for that purpose, or, if none is so fixed, before the time at which the obligation ought to be performed, the right of selection passes to the other party."

We do not think the agreement in question comes within the provisions of either of these sections. In order to do so there must be a time when, under the terms of the obligation, the party having the option will be able to do either one or the other of the acts, as he may desire, and so may choose between the alternatives. Such is not the case here. The contract extended for three years. During that period it was the duty of the defendant to perform its obligation to prosecute and adjust the claims due to the plaintiffs. Up to that time there was neither obligation nor opportunity to refund the initial fee. After that time there was neither obligation nor opportunity to continue the prosecution and adjustment of the claims. At the termination of the contract the defendant, even if it had desired to do so, could not have proceeded to prosecute and adjust the claims. Its duties in that regard were ended. It had not collected anything upon the claims. It therefore at that time had no alternative. The contract did not allow it then to do "one of two acts," or the other, at its pleasure. It was required to do but one; that is, to refund the initial fee of $148.23. It could not have refunded that fee before and terminated the contract, except by exercising its right of rescission, which it was under no obligation to do. The consequence is that the only duty which the defendant owed to the plaintiffs at the termination of the contract, upon the facts alleged in the complaint, was to refund the initial fee of $148.23. The cause of action stated was for the recovery of that sum and no more. Consequently it was not within the jurisdiction of the superior court.

[4, 5] Respondents also contend that the proceeding should be dismissed because an appeal to the District Court of Appeal would be a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. Prohibition lies against any inferior tribunal only where there is not a plain, speedy and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Code Civ. Proc. § 1103. It has been held in several cases that, where an inferior court, such as a police or justice's court, is proceeding in a cause of which it has no jurisdiction, the right to appeal to the superior court of such county is plain, speedy, and adequate, and that prohibition will not lie. Hamberger v. Police Court, 12 Cal. App. 153, 106 Pac. 894, 107 Pac. 614; Simpson v. Police Court, 160 Cal. 530, 117 Pac. 553; Germain Seed & Plant Co. v. Justice's Court, 41 Cal. App. 397, 182 Pac. 784. The question whether or not there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in such cases is a question of fact depending upon the circumstances of the particular case. In the cases cited regarding the police and justice's courts, it is obvious that an appeal to the superior court of the county in which the justice is acting is plain and ordinarily will be speedy, and that it is presumed to be adequate, since the appeal will be heard in the same county and may be heard quickly, and it is to be presumed that the superior court will decide the cause in accordance with law. In the present case, however, it appears that the office and principal place of business of the defendant is in the city and county of San Francisco, which is alleged to be more than 50 miles distant from the city of Santa Rosa, where the trial is to be had by the superior court of that county, and it is alleged that the defendant will be put to the cost of transporting its witnesses to that county. Also it is obvious that an appeal to the District Court of Appeal in such a case will involve considerable expense, since the transcript must be prepared and filed and all the expense thereof must be paid. This will also entail considerable delay and the expense of attending the district court at its courtrooms in the county of Sacramento. We think the case comes within the rule laid down in Ophir, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 467, 82 Pac. 70, 3 Ann. Cas. 340, and that the appeal is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy under the circumstances.

It is ordered that the writ of prohibition issue as prayed for.

GARROWAY v. JENNINGS et al.
(L. A. 7324.)

1. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 18(2)—Promise to debtor to pay attorney fees due from latter held an original obligation which need not be written.

A promise to a debtor for a consideration to pay attorney's fee due from the latter is an original obligation within Civ. Code, $\S$ 2794, and need not be in writing.

2. Judgment $\S$ 143(3)—Refusal of motion to set aside judgment by default on account of neglect of party held proper.

In an action by an attorney for fees, motion of defendant to set the judgment by default aside under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 473, permitting a court to relieve a party from a judgment against him through his inadvertence or excusable neglect, was properly overruled, where defendant, an attorney, alleged that he believed that an order overruling a demurrer was appealable and would stay all proceedings until the appeal was determined, and did not know that default and judgment would be entered against him for failure to answer the complaint while the appeal was pending.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 654—Appellant held entitled to amend record by filing therein an authenticated notice of appeal.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953, as amended by St. 1921, p. 194, $\S$ 3, where a record on appeal does not contain a notice of appeal, the appellant is entitled to amend the record by filing a copy of the notice of appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Samuel M. Garroway against Netta O. Jennings and J. O. Davis. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant Davis appeals. Affirmed.

J. O. Davis, of Los Angeles, in pro. per.

Winslow P. Hyatt, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, C. J. The complaint states a cause of action to recover judgment against the two defendants. It alleges that the defendant Jennings became indebted to Lantz, Hyatt, and Garroway in the sum of $972.66 for services as her attorneys in two certain actions, in one of which a judgment was recovered in her favor for over $7,000, that thereafter she assigned the judgment to the defendant Davis, who, in consideration of said assignment, promised his codefendant that he would pay the said attorneys' fees due to the said Lantz, Hyatt, and Garroway, and that said parties before the action was begun assigned the claim against said defendants to the plaintiff.

[1] To this complaint the defendant Davis separately demurred. The sole ground of demurrer is that the complaint seeks to charge Davis with the debt of Jennings upon an undertaking not in writing. The basis of this objection is that the contract alleged against Davis was a contract of suretyship or guaranty, which is invalid unless made in writing and signed by the party to be charged. This principle does not apply to contracts of the character alleged in the complaint. It was not a contract to guarantee or become surety for the obligation of Jennings, but was an original obligation on his part to pay the debt of Mrs. Jennings directly to her creditors, and it was based upon a sufficient consideration; that is, the transfer to him by her of the judgment above mentioned. It comes within the description of such original obligations set forth in section 2794 of the Civil Code, and it need not be in writing. The demurrer thereto was properly overruled. The defendant failed to answer the complaint and thereupon judgment was entered against him by default, from which he appealed. The only objection that can be made to the judgment is that it is not supported by the complaint. It is, as we have seen, not well taken. The judgment therefore must be affirmed.

[2] After the taking of the default and judgment against him, Davis moved to set it aside under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, on the ground that it was taken against him by his inadvertence and excusable neglect. In support of the motion it was shown that after the order was made overruling his demurrer to the complaint he attempted to take an appeal from said order by filing a notice of appeal therefrom.

His excuse for failure to answer is that, although he was an attorney at law, admitted to practice as such in the courts of this state, he was not familiar with the rules and procedure of the courts, that he believed that the order overruling the demurrer was appealable, and that an appeal therefrom would stay all further proceedings in the action until said appeal was determined, and, further, that he did not know that default and judgment would be entered against him for failure to answer said complaint while such appeal was pending. All of these things he could have readily and easily ascertained by taking the trouble to read the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating thereto, and the numerous decisions of this court directly holding that no appeal lies from an order overruling a demurrer. Instead of showing an excuse for his failure to file the answer, his affidavit shows that it was due to his own gross neglect to take any pains whatever to inform himself as to the law affecting his case. The only reason he gives for his ignorance is that he had never been in active practice. That being the case, reasonable care would have induced him to make some inquiry and research to ascertain the law with which he professed to be familiar and which he could easily have ascertained. In denying a motion to set aside a default the court below was exercising its discretion. We cannot overturn its decision thereon unless the discretion was abused. We see no ground upon which to say that it was abused in this case. We are of the opinion that the motion was properly denied. The defendant appealed from the order denying that motion. We are forced to the conclusion that this appeal is also without support in the record.

[3] As the jurisdiction on appeal depends on the fact of the filing of a notice of appeal and not upon the fact of its being contained in the record, we have deemed it advisable to treat the case on its merits. It will therefore be unnecessary to act upon the application made by the appellant, since the filing of a transcript, to amend the same by inserting therein an authenticated copy of the notice of appeal. The appellant would be entitled to amend the record by filing such copy, as, of course, under section 953, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1921. We have assumed that the appeal was properly taken, and that the record discloses it, although the notice of appeal was set forth in the bill of exceptions and was not directly certified by the clerk as a correct copy.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

STOKES v. WATKINSON. (S. F. 9593.)(Supreme Court of California. June 6, 1922.)1. Municipal corporations ⌘572—"Refusal" to pay assessment necessary before liability for attorney's fee arises in suit on assessments for public improvements.

Under the Street Improvement Act of 1911, § 27, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1469, § 11, providing that, where personal demand has been made on the owner of property or his agent for an assessment for a public improvement, the plaintiff shall recover such sum as the court may fix as attorney's fees, and, when suit has been brought, after a personal demand has been made and a refusal to pay such assessment so demanded, an attorney's fee of $15 may be recovered, notwithstanding the suit may be settled or tender made before recovery, and providing that a single action may be brought irrespective of the number of lots assessed where the parties defendant are identical, and giving the court power to consolidate separate actions brought in such cases, where suit is brought on separate assessments after a demand and a refusal of payment, an attorney's fee of $15 accrues on filing of the complaint, and the subsequent consolidation of actions would not deprive an attorney of the specified fee, but such a "refusal" must be more than neglect to pay, and must be equivalent to denial of a demand.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Refuse—Refusal.]

2. Municipal corporations ⌘527—Statute permitting collection of attorney's fee for non-payment of assessment must be strictly construed.

The Street Improvement Act of 1911, § 27, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1469, § 11, providing for the collection of an attorney's fee as a penalty for nonpayment of a tax for public improvement, must be strictly construed.

3. Municipal corporations —572—Delay in paying assessments held insufficient to show refusal to pay authorizing collection of attorney's fee.

In separate actions to foreclose street assessment liens against 331 lots owned by defendant's testator, under the Street Improvement Act of 1911, § 27, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1469, § 11, providing for collection of $15 attorney's fee in each suit after a demand and refusal of payment of the assessment, where the owner of the lots did not refuse to pay, and stated that he was short of money, and that he would be paid some before long, a mere delay in payment was insufficient to justify a finding of fact by the trial court that there had been a refusal to pay the assessments.

4. Municipal corporations —572—Amount of attorney's fee to be allowed plaintiff in suit on street assessments, in absence of a refusal to pay, is in discretion of trial court.

In an action by the owner of liens for street assessments against a property owner, to foreclose the liens under Street Improvement Act 1911, § 27, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1469, § 11, the amount of the attorney's fees to be allowed plaintiff in absence of a demand and refusal of payment by the property owner is in the discretion of the trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by G. H. Stokes against Henrietta P. Watkinson. From a judgment allowing plaintiff less attorney's fees than he asked, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 201 Pac. 134.

Faulkner & Faulkner, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Wm. T. Kearney, of Richmond, and Edward C. Harrison, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. [1] The plaintiff brought 331 separate suits for the foreclosure of assessments levied against 331 separate lots owned by the defendant's testator upon an assessment made by the street superintendent of the city of Richmond for the construction of sewers in said city, by which a separate amount was assessed against each lot as provided in the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730). This appeal by the plaintiff involves his right to a separate attorney's fee of $15 in 43 of these separate cases which were consolidated by the trial court. Before the trial the defendant offered to allow judgment for the full amount of the assessment but without costs or attorney's fees. Upon the refusal of this offer the defendant filed an answer attacking the validity of the assessment. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the foreclosure of the street assessment liens amounting to $15.08 on each lot and costs, but only allowed $25 as an attorney's fee, fixing the amount of 60 cents as the attorney's fee upon each separate action. Appellant contends that he should have been allowed $15 as attorney's fee in each of the actions so consolidated, making an aggregate attorney's fee therein of $645. The plaintiff bases his claim to an allowance upon section 27 of the Street Improvement Act of 1911, as amended in 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1469, § 11). This section authorizes the recovery of the unpaid assessment with interest at 10 per cent. per annum in a suit brought not less than 35 days after the date of the warrant. The provision with reference to attorney's fees is as follows:

"And in all cases of recovery under the provisions of this act, where personal demand has been made upon the owner or his agent, but not otherwise, the plaintiff shall recover such sum as the court may fix, in addition to the taxable cost as attorney's fees, but not any percentage upon said recovery. And when suit has been brought, after a personal demand has been made and a refusal to pay such assessment so demanded, the plaintiff shall be entitled to have and recover the sum of fifteen dollars as attorney's fees, in addition to all taxable costs, notwithstanding that the suit may be settled or a tender may be made before a recovery in said action, and he may have judgment therefor."

This section also makes provision for the bringing of a single suit against the owner of a number of lots and for the consolidation of separate suits as follows:

"It shall be competent to bring a single action under any such assessment irrespective of the number of lots assessed where the parties defendant are identical, and where separate actions are brought, the same may be consolidated by order of the court."

Upon a similar but not identical provision of the Vrooman Act (Stats. 1885, p. 147, § 12, amended, Stats. 1889, p. 168, § 12) it was held in Hughes v. Alsip, 112 Cal. 587, 44 Pac. 1027, and McCaleb v. Dreyfus, 156 Cal. 204, 103 Pac. 924, that the plaintiff was entitled to only one attorney's fee where he included in one complaint several causes of action arising out of street assessment liens. In Realty, etc., Mtg. Co. v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 543, 132 Pac. 1048, it was held that the plaintiff could bring separate actions for each assessment, and that he was entitled to $15 attorney's fee in each action under section 12 of the Vrooman Act, and that a subsequent consolidation by the court of such actions would not deprive him of an attorney's fee in each separate action. In that regard the court stated as follows:

"While the effect of a consolidation of actions is that for the purposes of all further proceedings, such as trial, etc., the cases are to be treated as if all the causes of action had been united originally, we are entirely satisfied that the consolidation should not be held to have the effect of depriving a party of his right to recover legal costs already paid, or as to which the right of the plaintiff had accrued. Such we believe to be the situation as to the attorney fee provided for in such cases as these. The fee is one fixed by statute, and the trial court is entirely without discretionary power in regard thereto. The plaintiff is entitled to it as matter of right under the terms of the statute, in any action properly instituted by him, in the event that he ultimately recovers therein. In the cases involved here, the plaintiff had the absolute legal right to commence a separate action on each cause of action, with the result that, under the express terms of the statute, he became entitled to a fifteen dollar attorney fee in each, in the event of recovery. We are satisfied that the trial court could not impair this right by any order of consolidation, any more than it could impair it without a consolidation."

Section 12 of the Vrooman Act as originally enacted (Stats. 1885, pp. 147-157) contained the following provision concerning attorney's fee:

"* * * And in all cases of recovery, under the provisions of this act, the plaintiff shall recover the sum of fifteen dollars. * * *"

That statute also authorized the street superintendent to receive the amount due on any assessment at any time and to give a good and sufficient discharge therefor, and enter a satisfaction of the lien upon the record of the assessment, providing, however, that, after suit was brought to enforce the lien, the lien should not be discharged without the payment of plaintiff's costs. Stats. 1885, pp. 147, 156, § 10. Thus the defendant by payment before judgment could defeat the plaintiff's claim to attorney's fees.

As amended in 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 168) section 12 provided as follows:

"And in all cases of recovery under the provisions of this act, the plaintiff shall recover the sum of fifteen dollars, in addition to the taxable cost, as attorney's fees, but not any percentage upon said recovery. And when suit has been brought, after a personal demand has been made and a refusal to pay such assessment so demanded, the plaintiff shall also be entitled to have and recover said sum of fifteen dollars as attorney's fees, in addition to all taxable costs, notwithstanding that the suit may be settled or a tender may be made before a recovery in said action, and he may have judgment therefor."

It is to be observed that the $15 is to be recovered in every case where foreclosure is decreed. Such recovery is in the nature of a statutory penalty. Engelbrechtsen v. Gay, 158 Cal. 30, 109 Pac. 879. If, however, there had been a personal demand and a refusal to pay the assessment, then the sum of $15 was payable notwithstanding a settlement or a tender of payment.

The Street Improvement Act of 1911, as originally enacted (Stats. 1911, § 27, pp. 730, 746), and as amended in 1915 (Stats. 1915, § 27, p. 1469), is essentially different, in that the latter act provides that the recovery of attorney's fees can only be had where there is a personal demand, and shall be such sum as the court may fix. This statute, like the Vrooman Act, also provides that, where there has been a personal demand and a refusal to pay the assessment so demanded, the plaintiff shall be entitled to have and recover the sum of $15 as attorney's fees, in addition to all taxable costs, etc. The attorney's fee is no longer fixed arbitrarily by the statute at $15 in every case, but is within the discretion of the trial court, and allowable only after personal demand. The court also has the discretion to consolidate separate actions for the collection of separate assessments as was done in this case. Thus by the terms of the Vrooman Act (section 12) the right to a separate attorney's fee upon each separate assessment to the same owner depended upon the election of the lien claimant either to set forth the several assessments in separate counts in a single complaint, in which case he could recover but $15 attorney's fee, or to bring a separate action upon each count, in which case he could recover $15 in each action. But, under section 27 of the Street Improvement Act of 1911, supra, the court had power in the exercise of a sound discretion not only to consolidate all the separate cases, but to fix a single attorney's fee in the consolidated action when and only when a personal demand had been made upon the owner. If the demand upon the owner for payment was met by a refusal, the statute expressly provides that the attorney's fee accrued notwithstanding the suit may be settled or tender made before recovery.

Thus the statute makes a distinction between a personal demand and a failure to pay and a demand followed by a refusal to pay. As was said by the Supreme Court of Maine in the case of Inhabitants of Cape Elizabeth v. Boyd, 86 Me. 317, 29 Atl. 1062:

"A refusal to pay a tax is one thing. A failure to pay is another. The former may be the result of willfulness or a denial of the legality of the tax. The latter may be the result of sickness and poverty and an utter inability to pay. In the former case, an action may be expedient. In the latter, inexpedient."

For some purposes a failure to pay after demand is deemed equivalent to a refusal (Kimball v. Rowland, 6 Gray [72 Mass.] 224, 225); but ordinarily a refusal means more than neglect, and is equivalent to a denial of a demand (Parish v. Wheeler, 22 N. Y. 494, 514; Bowen v. Young, 75 N. Y. Supp.

1027, 1029; Burns et al. v. Fox, 113 Ind. 205, 14 N. E. 541; Duffy v. State, 37 Misc. Rep. 547, 60 Neb. 812, 84 N. W. 264; Brooklyn Heights R. Co. v. Brooklyn City R. Co., 105 App. Div. 88, 93 N. Y. Supp. 849; People v. Perkins, 85 Cal. 509, 26 Pac. 245).

[2] Under this statute the "refusal" which upon the bringing of the action vests in the plaintiff a right to an attorney's fee must be something more than a mere failure to pay resulting from an inability or unwillingness to make the payment. It must, in short, be a refusal to pay as distinguished from mere neglect. The lien is valid for two years, and the lien claimant is not compelled to bring his action for two years. If the property holder intends to contest the validity of the assessment, and for that reason refuses to pay the amount thereof, such refusal would necessitate the bringing of a suit for foreclosure, but, if the property holder merely asks for time in which to secure the money with which to pay the assessment, or promises in good faith to pay at some future time, or merely fails to pay, there has been no "refusal" within the meaning of the statute which penalizes such refusal by making the attorney's fee accrue at once upon the filing of the complaint. The statute permitting the collection of the attorney's fee as a penalty for nonpayment of tax, like all statutes imposing a tax, must be strictly construed.

In this case, if there was a personal demand without a refusal to pay, the statute provides that the court shall fix the attorney's fee, and under this statute, construed in the light of Realty, etc., Mtg. Co. v. Superior Court, supra, where separate actions are brought upon several assessments after personal demand and a refusal to pay, the right to at least $15 attorney's fee would accrue in each action upon the filing of the complaint. The subsequent consolidation of the actions would not deprive the plaintiff of this attorney fee which had accrued upon the beginning of the several actions. It is claimed in this case that there was such a refusal to pay after personal demand. The court so finds the fact.

[3] The respondent claims that there is no evidence to support the conclusion of the court that the defendant refused to pay the street assessments. The evidence relied upon by the appellant to establish such refusal consists of a conversation between defendant's testator and Fred G. Meyers, the contractor in whose favor the assessment was levied, and who subsequently assigned his assessments to plaintiff for collection. He testified that he made a demand upon Mr. Watkinson, defendant's testator, some time in March, 1916, a month or two before he died; that Mr. Watkinson replied that he was short of money, and that he would see about it pretty soon. The witness testified:

"I said it should be paid, and, if it wasn't paid, I was going to sell the assessments,

* * * Q. Did he say he would pay you, if at all? A. Well, he naturally said they were a little short of money. Q. That is all he said when you made the demand upon him for the money due? A. Of course, he even said that the People's Water Company had not paid him—that he was going to get some money from them pretty quick."

On cross-examination the witness stated that Mr. Watkinson told him that he was expecting to get some money from the People's Water Company, but that he was temporarily pressed for a little money. This evidence falls far short of proof of a refusal to pay. On the contrary, it indicates a willingness to pay only defeated by a lack of funds. The failure to pay rendered the owner liable for interest and costs, and a reasonable attorney's fee, but the discretion of the court was not limited to a minimum fee of $15 in each action, in the absence of a refusal.

It is conceded that a failure to pay after a personal demand and the lapse of an unreasonable time for payment might justify the court in concluding that there had been a refusal; but here the owner died within two or three months after the demand, and no claim or demand was made upon the executrix of his will. As the penalty for refusal to pay the assessment was greater than the assessment (if we include the costs and attorney's fee in each separate action), it would seem but reasonable that the defendant should have some notice or warning that the plaintiff intended to treat the defendant's delay in payment as a refusal to pay the assessment. However that may be, in the absence of any actual refusal, and in the presence of an implied promise to pay and the subsequent death of the owner, the mere delay in this case was insufficient to justify the finding of fact by the trial court that there had been a refusal to pay the assessments.

In this connection it may be noted that the Legislature in session at the time the decision in Realty, etc., Mtg. Co. v. Superior Court, supra, was under consideration by this court amended section 12 of the Vrooman Act, so as to require a written demand personally served upon the owner, and a failure to pay for 10 days after such demand as a condition precedent to the maintenance of the foreclosure action, and as a basis of a claim for $15 attorney's fee in the action unless one year has elapsed after the date of the assessment. The amended section required the court to consolidate separate actions, and to allow only $15 attorney's fee in the consolidated action "unless otherwise ordered by the court," and permitted such allowance of attorney's fees upon settlement or tender (Stats. 1913, pp. 402, 408, § 12, approved June 6, 1913). The amendment of 1915 to the Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1915, pp. 1464, 1469, § 27), retained the provisions of the law of 1911 (section 27) now under discussion, but the amendment of 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 218, § 1) provides for the recovery of a reasonable fee after a personal demand in the foreclosure or upon settlement or tender where demand and refusal to pay has been shown, and also provides:

"That if the court finds an unnecessary number of actions have been brought, where the parties are identical, it may allow the costs of one action only."

These amendments show the continued effort of the Legislature to distinguish between a mere failure to pay after a constructive demand, a failure to pay after a personal demand, and a refusal so to do after a personal demand. Our reference to amendments to the Vrooman Act in 1913 and to the Improvement Act of 1911 in 1921 are only relevant in this action to emphasize the distinction already pointed out between the language of section 27 of the act of 1911 and the provisions of section 12 of the Vrooman Act of 1885, as amended in 1889, construed in the cases relied upon by the parties and hereinbefore cited.

[4] The matter of the amount of the attorney's fees to be allowed plaintiff, in the absence of a refusal to pay on the part of the owner after a personal demand so to do, is in the discretion of the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

Action by Margarita Guzman de Ledesma, as administratrix of Odilon Ledesma, deceased, against Clarence E. Stanley. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Scott McReynolds, of Ventura, for appellant.

Drapeau, Orr & Gardner, of Ventura, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of a team of horses, a wagon, and a set of harness, which it was alleged were of the value of $500. Judgment was for the defendant. The plaintiff has appealed.

Plaintiff was the widow of her intestate. The husband died November 19, 1919, leaving surviving him, besides plaintiff, several minor children, the eldest of whom was a son about the age of 18 years. The only property owned by the husband at the time of his death was that mentioned in plaintiff's complaint. The team and wagon had been used by the husband and father to aid in providing support for the family, in which endeavor he was assisted by the son mentioned. After his death the boy assumed the responsibility of earning a livelihood for the family, and continued to use the team and wagon for such purpose. About the 1st of February, 1920, he arranged with two men, close relatives of his, to enter into a business partnership to do hauling. It was agreed that they should purchase a motortruck. It was further arranged that the team and wagon hereinbefore referred to, together with a similar outfit owned by his associates, should be lumped together and delivered to the defendant, who was a dealer in motortrucks, as an initial payment on the purchase of a truck. The purchase price of the truck was in excess of $3,000, and the horses, wagons and harness were taken in at a credit value of about $950. The boy and his associates took the truck, used it in conducting the business of hauling merchandise and products, and divided the income received therefrom. That portion of the income received by the boy he delivered to his mother for use in support of the family. More than four months elapsed, and, the vendees having failed to make payments required of them, the vendor, exercising the right expressed in the contract, recovered the truck. On August 25, 1921, plaintiff received letters of administration in the matter of the estate of her husband, and on September 19, 1921, commenced this action. As it was asserted by her in her testimony that the deceased possessed no other property at the time of his death than the property described in her complaint, it is evident that the sole purpose of instituting the probate proceedings was to obtain the necessary authority to commence this suit in the representative capacity indicated. The position taken by the administratrix is that there was no authority in the son to transfer title to the property in the absence of some order in probate authorizing him so to do. Respondent's answer to this contention is that, as the value of the property was less than $1,500, appellant, as the widow of the deceased, had the right under the provisions of section 1469, Code of Civil Procedure, to have the property assigned absolutely to her, and that any act committed by her showing an acquiescence in or an adoption of the transaction as made by the son would effectually estop her from denying effect to the contract. That contention seems to be fully sustained by the pleadings, evidence, and the findings made by the court. The widow was entitled to have the property set apart to her as a matter of right and wholly free from the claims of creditors. Estate of Palomares, 63 Cal. 402; Estate of Atwood, 127 Cal. 427, 59 Pac. 770. While she testified that she did not consent to the plan of her son to exchange the team and wagon as part payment for the truck, she admittedly was fully informed of the transaction, knew that the son was using the truck in earning money for the support of the family, and received and used those earnings. She at no time prior to the bringing of this suit (which was commenced nearly 2 years after the truck was purchased) notified the defendant that she disclaimed any agency in her son to act in the transaction.

The judgment is affirmed.

WIXOM v. DAVIS. (Civ. 3802.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California, May 5, 1922.
Rehearing Denied June 1, 1922.)

Chattel mortgages ⇨ 162—Mortgagee held entitled to possession on default of mortgagor.

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 2927, 2967, 3005, and Code Civ. Proc. § 694, a chattel mortgagee is entitled to possession of the mortgaged goods on default by mortgagor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by Bertha E. Wixom against George Herrick Davis. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. E. Gleason, for appellant.

J. F. Seymour, of El Centro, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action brought by the owner of a chattel mortgage to recover damages for conversion of the mortgaged property. Judgment having been entered in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals therefrom.

The mortgage, which was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Imperial county on the 13th day of February, 1920, covered an undivided one-third interest in 16 bales of cotton of the value of $1,442. The mortgage notes matured May 1, 1920. The balance unpaid thereon at the time of the alleged conversion exceeded one-third of the value of the cotton. The court found that during the months of October and November, 1920, the defendant took and carried away said cotton, and sold and disposed of the same to his own use, pursuant to the terms of a certain agreement dated October 25, 1920, entered into between the defendant and certain other parties, one of which was one of the makers of the notes held by the plaintiff. It is found that, under this agreement, the makers of the notes held by plaintiff were to work on the defendant's ranch and raise cotton. The defendant was to furnish all moneys for the planting, cultivation, and raising of the cotton, and the title of all cotton raised on the land was to remain in the name of the defendant. After payment of all expenses, the makers of the notes were to receive three-fourths of the profits, if any there were, and the defendant one-fourth. There were no profits. The court further found "that the defendant expended in the matter of expense connected with said crop herein referred to the sum of $2,511.74; that there was received from the sale of the cotton from the first picking $1,405.15; that there was no deficiency, but there was a loss and no profit." From these facts the court concluded "that the defendant did not convert the said cotton to the plaintiff's damage" in any sum whatever, and that the defendant was entitled to judgment for costs.

On the facts found, it is manifest that the 16 bales of cotton could not have been any part of the cotton referred to in the agreement of October 25th. The cotton taken and sold by the defendant in October and November could not have been planted and raised in five weeks. The facts found concerning the agreement of October 25th, even if the plaintiff had not been a stranger thereto, were immaterial to the plaintiff's cause of action.

The plaintiff alleged, and the answer denied, that at the time of the alleged conversion the plaintiff was entitled to possession of the mortgaged property. Upon this issue the findings are silent. Section 2927, Civil Code, reads as follows:

"A mortgage does not entitle the mortgagee to the possession of the property, unless authorized by the express terms of the mortgage; but after the execution of the mortgage the mortgagor may agree to such change of possession without a new consideration."

Having in view that section of the Civil Code, the decisions usually have defined the mortgagee's right of possession as one depending solely upon said express agreement. 5 Cal. Jur. p. 115. We think that there is a necessary exception in the case of a chattel mortgage after the debt secured thereby has become due. This was tacitly recognized by the Supreme Court in Summerville v. Stockton Milling Co., 142 Cal. 529, 542, 76 Pac. 243, 247, when the court said:

"A chattel mortgage does not pass title to the mortgagee or give him a right to possession of the mortgaged property before the debt becomes due, unless the mortgage so provides. Bank of Ukiah v. Moore, 106 Cal. 680."

The reason for the exception arises out of the statutory provisions defining the remedy of the mortgagee on nonpayment of the debt.

"A mortgagee of personal property, when the debt to secure which the mortgage was executed becomes due, may foreclose the mortgagor's right of redemption by a sale of the property, made in the manner and upon the notice prescribed by the title on 'pledge,' or by proceedings under the Code of Civil Procedure." Civ. Code, § 2967.

A pledgee's sale must be made by public auction, in the manner of a sale of personal property under execution. That mode of sale, where the personal property is capable of manual delivery, requires that the property be within view of those who attend the sale. Civ. Code, § 3005; Code Civ. Proc. § 694. It follows that, to make a valid sale of personal property, it must be present at the sale, whether it be sold as a pledge or under order of sale upon a decree of foreclosure. Therefore it is necessary that the mortgagee, or some one acting on his behalf, shall obtain such possession in order that the property may be applied to the payment of the debt secured thereby. Ely v. Williams, 6 Cal. App. 455, 457, 92 Pac. 393. We conclude that, from the facts found in this case, it necessarily followed that the plaintiff was entitled to possession of the mortgaged property at the time of defendant's conversion thereof.

PEOPLE v. BARNES. (Cr. 877.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 29, 1922.)

1. Larceny — 22 — Bringing automobile stolen without jurisdiction within jurisdiction is a felony.

Under Pen. Code, § 27, providing that all who commit any offense without the state which, if committed within the state, would be larceny, robbery, or embezzlement, and bring the property stolen or embezzled or are found with it or any part of it within the state, are liable to punishment, and section 497, providing that a person who in another state or country steals or embezzles property, or receives it knowing it to have been stolen or embezzled, and brings it into the state, is liable to punishment as if the larceny, embezzlement, or receiving had been committed within the state, where the accused stole an automobile in a foreign country and brought it within the state, the offense committed was a felony.

2. Larceny — 55 — Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of bringing stolen property into the state.

In a prosecution for bringing an automobile stolen by the accused in a foreign country into the state, evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction.

3. Criminal law — 564(1) — Evidence held sufficient to prove jurisdiction of offense was in the court in which the case was tried.

Under Pen. Code, § 789, providing that the jurisdiction of a criminal action for stealing or embezzling in any other state the property of another or receiving it knowing it to have been stolen or embezzled, and bringing it into this state, is in any county into or through which such stolen or embezzled property had been brought, evidence held sufficient to prove jurisdiction of the court of the county in which the case was tried.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

William A. Barnes was convicted of bringing a stolen automobile into San Diego county, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Edward J. Kelly, of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. [1] The information charged that the defendant, having first stolen a Ford touring car at Tia Juana, Lower California, Mexico, the same being the personal property of one M. L. McKelvey, brought the same into the county of San Diego, state of California. The described offense is a felony. Pen. Code, §§ 27 and 497. Having been convicted of this offense, defendant was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison, and now appeals from the judgment.

The evidence establishes the following facts: Mrs. McKelvey, owner of the car, permitted her son to drive the car, and he went with it to Tia Juana. He saw the defendant standing near the place where he parked the car. When McKelvey returned for the car it had disappeared. This was on the 27th day of July, 1921. The car was a touring car, model 1920, and carried the license number 369341. On the next following day appellant arrived at the home of one F. J. Knight, in the county of San Diego, driving a late model Ford touring car, and remained there about four days. There is no further direct identification of the car that was in his possession at that time. On the 19th day of August appellant came to the place of business of one Green, near Bakersfield, in Kern county. He came there in a car which was identified as the car of Mrs. McKelvey. He had taken out the certificate of registration, which later was found in the bedding of the room assigned to him on Green's premises. The license plates bearing the number 369341 were on that car when he arrived there. He told Mr. Green that his name was J. McKelvey and that he had bought the car at El Paso, Texas.

Appellant was arrested at Green's place in Kern county, and was brought back to San Diego county by J. H. Kilby, a deputy sheriff of that county. Appellant told Kilby that he bought this car at Ensenada, in Lower California, on the 28th day of July; that on that night he camped at the junction of the highway and Rose Canyon road. Kilby testified that the Rose Canyon road joins the state highway on the north side of La Jolla, in San Diego county.

[2] In support of his appeal, appellant claims that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the conviction, in that there is no evidence, beyond the mere possession of the stolen car by him in Bakersfield, which in any way connects him with the theft of the automobile. But there is something more proved than such mere possession. The facts that appellant concealed the certificate of registration; that he claimed to have bought a car which was in fact stolen, and that he assumed the family name of the true owner, and made other false statements which we need not specify, constitute circumstances which, together with the possession of the car, were sufficient to connect the defendant with the larceny committed at Tia Juana and to warrant the conclusion that he was the guilty party. People v. Lang, 142 Cal. 482, 76 Pac. 232; People v. Majors (Cal. App.) 190 Pac. 636.

[3] Next it is contended that the evidence is not sufficient to prove jurisdiction of the superior court of San Diego county over the offense charged. "The jurisdiction of a criminal action for stealing or embezzling, in any other state, the property of another, or receiving it knowing it to have been stolen or embezzled, and bringing the same into this state, is in any county into or through which such stolen or embezzled property has been brought." Pen. Code, § 789. The evidence which we have stated is clearly sufficient to have warranted the jury in finding it to be the fact that after stealing Mrs. McKelvey's car at Tia Juana, which is near the San Diego county line, the defendant did bring the car into San Diego county.

The only other point suggested is that the court erred in giving a certain instruction, in that by such instruction the court improperly assumed that the automobile had been shown to have been stolen, whereas such a conclusion was a question at issue for determination by the jury. A single sentence of this instruction is quoted in the brief of appellant. Reading the entire instruction in connection with that sentence, it is manifest that the court made no such assumption, but left the fact entirely to the determination of the jury.

The judgment is affirmed.

KRUG v. SINCLAIRE. (Civ. 3891.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 3, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 29, 1922.)

1. Quieting title $\S$ 44(4)—Proof of foreclosure deed to plaintiff and plaintiff's possession held sufficient to establish title in him.

In action to quiet title, proof of recorded mortgage foreclosure sale deed to plaintiff, and plaintiff's possession of the property subsequent to execution of such deed, held sufficient proof of plaintiff's title without proof of the chain of title precedent to the foreclosure decree under Code Civ. Proc. § 1928.

2. Judgment $\S$ 682(1)—Determination as to invalidity of deed on street assessment foreclosure in purchaser's action against owner conclusive in owner's subsequent action against purchaser's grantee.

Determination as to invalidity of deed given on foreclosure of a street assessment in purchaser's action against owner was conclusive as to invalidity of deed in owner's action to quiet title against purchaser's grantee.

3. Pleading $\S$ 291(4) — Plaintiff's failure to deny under oath "genuineness and due execution" of instrument set up in answer held not an admission of the validity thereof.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 448, providing that, where a defense is founded upon a written instrument which is copied into the answer, "the genuineness and due execution of such instrument are deemed admitted" unless there is an answer under oath denying the same, a plaintiff, by failure to deny the genuineness and due execution of deeds set out in answer, did not admit validity thereof, but merely that the party who appears to have made deeds attached his signature thereto, and caused it to be delivered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Frank J. Krug against M. N. Sinclair. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. Irving McKenna and Catherine A. McKenna, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. From a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff, intervener, Sinclair, has appealed.

[1] This action was to quiet title to certain real property. Plaintiff exhibited in evidence a deed from the sheriff of Los Angeles county made pursuant to a decree foreclosing a mortgage lien against the property in question. This deed was dated the 21st of July, 1916, recorded in the office of the county recorder on July 26th of the same year. It appeared that during all the time subsequent to the making of said deed plaintiff had been in possession of the property described therein, and claimed to have title thereto. This proof was sufficient prima facie to prove ownership. It furnishes sufficient proof of title upon which to base a decree favorable to the plaintiff, without making it necessary that the chain of title precedent to the decree of foreclosure be established. Section 1928, Code Civ. Proc.; Zilmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 73, at page 77, 43 Pac. 408. The only interest claimed to be possessed by the intervener was such as he might have obtained by reason of a deed issued to his grantor, one Warden, who had made a purchase under a sale had for a delinquent assessment against the property on account of street improvement work. Sinclair in this action set forth in full in his answer: (1) The deed of the tax and license collector of the city of Los Angeles, dated the 2d day of September, 1915, purporting to convey the interest of Robert H. Punter (the alleged owner) to Julia P. Warden; and (2) a quitclaim deed dated the 13th day of January, 1920, from said Warden to said intervener. In a former action (Warden v. Bittleston Law & Collection Agency et al., 41 Cal. App. 1, 181 Pac. 834), in which the plaintiff here was a defendant, it was held that the first-mentioned deed was void and of no effect because of the failure of the vendee to give sufficient notices to the owners of the property of the fact that application had been made for a conveyance. The judgment in the action last entitled was reversed because an affirmative judgment in favor of the defendant was not sustained by the findings. After a reversal was ordered in the case cited, plaintiff, Warden, dismissed the action, and made her quitclaim deed to the intervener, Sinclair.

[2] The determination of the court as to the invalidity of the deed in question must be taken as establishing the law affecting that instrument, and it must, of course, affect also any conveyance attempted to be made by the said Warden. As against the plaintiff's proof of title, we then find that the intervener rested upon nothing better than the conveyance from the person whose title was supported only by the void deed.

[3] The intervener insists that, because of the fact that he set forth the deeds in full, and no affidavit was filed by the plaintiff denying the genuineness and due execution thereof, the deeds must be taken as transferring whatever they purport on their face to convey. This contention results from a mistaken idea regarding the effect of the provisions of section 448, Code of Civil Procedure. That section provides only that, where a defense is founded upon a written instrument which is copied into the answer, "the genuineness and due execution of such instrument are deemed admitted," unless there is an answer under oath denying the same. That an instrument is genuine and has been duly executed can mean only that the party who appears to have made it has attached his signature thereto knowingly, and caused it to be delivered. Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 429, 51 Pac. 630. Plaintiff could not deny that the deeds had been signed by the purported parties or delivered. It was admissible, however, for him to prove that the conveyance to Warden was void. This he did by showing the insufficiency of the notices which by the former decision had been held to render the deed void. He showed, too, that at the time the former action was pending he had offered to pay the amount of the assessment charges, and all costs and penalties, which were less than the sum of $10, and made a continuing offer to pay the same to the defendants in this action, and particularly to the intervener. A tender of these amounts made before a deed had been legally applied for had the effect of extinguishing the assessment lien, and that lien thereafter would have only an apparent existence—apparent because the books of the tax collecting office would not show a discharge of the debt. This condition would create a cloud upon plaintiff's title which he would be entitled to have removed.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WHITNEY. (Cr. 907.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 25, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 24, 1922.)

1. Criminal law §1167(1)—Insurrection and sedition §2—Indictment charging criminal syndicalism need not allege name of organization, and omission held harmless.

An indictment charging a violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act by organizing and becoming a member of an organization to teach criminal syndicalism is sufficient without alleging the name of the organization which defendant is charged with joining, and defendant is not prejudiced by such omission where she was fully advised upon examination of the jurors and by the opening statement of the district attorney of the name of the organization involved.

2. Insurrection and sedition §2—Evidence of character of affiliated organizations admissible in prosecution for criminal syndicalism.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism by organizing and joining the Communist Labor Party, evidence of the character and pernicious activities of other organizations with which Communist Labor Party was affiliated or regarding which it had from time to time expressed its approval and sympathy was competent.

3. Criminal law §24—Insurrection and sedition §2—Defendant, knowing aims of organization, charged with knowledge they were unlawful; intent presumed from unlawful act.

A defendant who joined the Communist Labor Party and participated in drawing the resolutions adopted by it, which were in violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act, cannot rely as a defense on a claim that she did not realize she was aiding disloyalty, and, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, a guilty intent is conclusively presumed from the deliberate commission of an unlawful act.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Charlotte A. Whitney was convicted of criminal syndicalism, and she appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied; Lawlor and Lennon, JJ., dissenting.

Nathan C. Coghlan, John Francis Neylan, and J. E. Pemberton, all of San Francisco (William F. Herron, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., Ezra W. Decoto, Dist. Atty., John U. Calkins, Asst. Dist. Atty., and Myron Harris, Deputy Dist. Atty., all of Oakland, for the People.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment of conviction of the defendant for the alleged violation of the provisions of the Criminal Syndicalism Act (St. 1919, p. 281).

The information filed by the district attorney against the defendant consisted of five separate counts based upon the several subdivisions of said act. The jury found the defendant guilty as to the first count in the information, but disagreed as to the other counts therein, and dismissals as to these were subsequently filed. The charging part of the first count in said information upon which the conviction of the defendant was had is in the language of the statute and reads as follows:

"The said Charlotte A. Whitney prior to the time of filing this information, and on or about the 28th day of November, A. D. 1919, at the said county of Alameda, state of California, did then and there unlawfully, willfully, wrongfully, deliberately, and feloniously organize and assist in organizing, and was, is, and knowingly became a member of an organization, society, group, and assemblage of persons organized and assembled to advocate, teach, aid, and abet criminal syndicalism."

[1] The first contention of the appellant herein is that said first count in said indictment, of which the foregoing excerpt is the charging part, was insufficient to state a public offense; the alleged particular insufficiency therein being its omission to specifically designate the name of the organization, society, group, or assemblage of persons which she is charged with having organized and assisted in organizing and which were organized and assembled to teach, aid, and abet criminal syndicalism. Since the original submission of this cause the Supreme Court has decided the case of People v. Taylor (Cal. Sup.) 203 Pac. 85, covering the precise point which the appellant urges upon this contention. The two cases are identical as to the form of the charge and as to the procedure with relation to the trial thereon in the trial court. In each case the defendant was fully advised upon the voir dire examination of the jurors and in the opening statement of the district attorney that the organization which the defendant was charged with having organized and assisted in organizing in violation of the terms of the Criminal Syndicalism Act was the Communist Labor Party of Oakland, a local branch of the Communist Party of California. This being so, we are bound, in conformity with the decision in People v. Taylor, supra, to hold that the appellant's first contention is void of merit.

The next contention which the appellant urges upon this appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to justify her conviction upon said count in the information. The record is voluminous, and no useful purpose would be subserved by a detailed review of the evidence which it contains. Upon the main question, however, as to the part which the defendant took in organizing and assisting to organize the Communist Labor Party, there is no dispute. In the brief of the appellant upon this appeal it is stated to be an "admitted fact that the defendant became a member of the so-called Communist Labor Party, attended a party convention November 9, 1919, and was one of the committee on resolutions which reported the platform herein above set forth." In addition to the foregoing admission the evidence abundantly shows that the defendant not only took a leading and active part in the organization of the Oakland branch of the Communist Labor Party of California, but also in the subsequent meetings and acts of said organization. Notwithstanding this admission and these proofs, the appellant insisted upon the trial of the cause and now insists that said organization was not of such character and purposes as to bring it within the class of organizations forbidden and condemned by the terms of the Criminal Syndicalism Act. It was upon this branch of the case that the larger part of the evidence adduced on behalf of the prosecution upon the trial of this cause was presented.

[2] It is the appellant's contention that the admission of a very large portion of such evidence designed to show the pernicious activities of other organizations with which the Communist Labor Party of California was affiliated, or regarding which, or the membership of which, it from time to time by resolution or otherwise expressed its approval and sympathy, was highly prejudicial to the defendant's case, particularly in view of the fact that, as is claimed, her knowledge of and participation in these baneful activities was not sufficiently shown. As to the propriety of the admission of such evidence as tending to show the character and purposes of the Communist Labor Party of California there can be no further doubt, in view of the very full discussion of this subject in the case of People v. Taylor, supra, and of the determination of the Supreme Court therein. As to the knowledge which the defendant had and of her participation in the aims, expressions, and activities of the Communist Labor Party of California there can also be no doubt, in view of the admitted intelligence of the defendant and of her participation in the drafting of the resolutions and formulation of the constitution of the organization itself.

[3] That this defendant did not realize that she was giving herself over to forms and expressions of disloyalty and was, to say the least of it, lending her presence and the influence of her character and position as a woman of refinement and culture to an organization whose purposes and sympathies savored of treason is not only past belief, but is a matter with which this court can have no concern, since it is one of the conclusive presumptions of our law that a guilty intent is presumed from the deliberate commission of an unlawful act. Code Civ. Proc. § 1962.

As to the appellant's only remaining contention with relation to the alleged misconduct of the district attorney upon the examination of a juror, we have examined the record, and do not find that the episode complained of was of such prejudicial character or consequence as to justify a reversal of the case.

Judgment affirmed.

RILEY v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.
(Civ. 2430.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, April 27, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 26, 1922.)

1. Carriers ⇨318(8) — Passenger's testimony held to show carrier's liability for injury in attempting to board train.

Testimony by a passenger that the train stopped at the station but an instant, and started again while the passenger was in the act of stepping onto the step, as a result of which the passenger fell with his feet under the cars and was injured, which testimony was substantially corroborated by another witness to the accident, was sufficient to establish liability of the carrier for the injury.

2. Carriers ⇨247(3)—One injured while attempting to board train to become a passenger is a "passenger."

A person who, intending to board a train and become a passenger thereon, was injured while in the act of mounting the steps of the train, was a "passenger" within the definition that one is a passenger from the time he puts himself in the care of the carrier or directly within the carrier's control with the bona fide intention of becoming a passenger and is accepted as such by the carrier.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Passenger.]

3. Jury ⇨67(3)—Rules governing disqualification of jurors governs disqualification of sheriff to summon.

The same rule governs the disqualification of a juror and the disqualification of the sheriff to summon the jury; the theory of the law being that a biased and prejudiced officer will select biased and prejudiced jurors.

4. Jury ⇨67(3) — Sheriff's affidavit held to show he did not have such opinion as to disqualify him to summon jurors.

Where the sheriff, at the request of plaintiff's attorneys, went to the railroad station and made certain observations with respect to the speed of the cars, the view of the operatives thereof, and reported the result of his observations to plaintiff's attorneys, and testified to them at the trial, but his affidavit that he had no knowledge of the facts in the case except a general statement made by plaintiff's attorneys and had formed and expressed no opinion as to the merits was uncontradicted, the trial court was justified in finding he had no such opinion as would disqualify him as a juror, under Code Civ. Proc. § 602, subd. 6, and therefore was not disqualified to summon the jury.

5. Jury ☞67(3)—Fact sheriff testified to material matters does not establish disqualification to summon jurors.

The fact that the sheriff gave testimony in the case as to matters which the jury might find to be material does not alone show that he was disqualified to summon the jurors.

6. Jury ☞110(9) — Disqualification of sheriff to summon jurors is waived by failure to object at first opportunity.

Where defendant learned during the course of the trial of the facts which it claimed showed the sheriff was disqualified to summon the jurors in the case, but made no objection at the time and no motion to discharge the jury, and chose to take its chances with that jury, it thereby waived its right to object thereafter to the disqualification of the sheriff.

7. Appeal and error ☞1170(1)—Disqualification of sheriff was not prejudicial where jurors were summoned by deputies.

Even if the sheriff was disqualified by reason of his opinion to summon jurors for the trial of a case, and his disqualification technically extended to his deputies, a party was not prejudiced thereby where in fact the jurors were summoned by deputy sheriffs without consulting the sheriff, who had no voice in their selection, and they were fairly and impartially chosen from the citizens of the county, so that the sheriff's disqualification does not require reversal under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

8. Jury ☞110(9)—Method of selecting jurors is not a constitutional right.

The manner and method of summoning a jury is a matter of legislative control rather than a constitutional provision, so that objections thereto may be waived.

9. Appeal and error ☞1170(1) — Invasion of constitutional right does not require reversal if it was immaterial.

Even if a constitutional right was invaded, the error should be disregarded on appeal under Const. art. 6, § 4½, if it appears from an examination of the record that there was no miscarriage of justice.

10. Appeal and error ☞1004(3) — Judge's statement in requiring remittitur held not to show entire verdict was result of passion.

A statement by the trial judge in requiring a remittitur of a portion of the damages awarded by the verdict as a condition of denying a motion for a new trial that the amount of the verdict was excessive, and the excess was the result of passion and prejudice, does not show that it was the trial court's opinion that the entire verdict was the result of passion and prejudice, and therefore does not require a reversal of the judgment rendered after remittitur for an amount which was not excessive.

11. Appeal and error ☞758(3)—Particular error in instruction must be pointed out.

A suggestion that an instruction given by the trial court was erroneous may be disregarded by the appellate court where there was no attempt to point out any error in the instruction.

12. Carriers ☞321(2)—Instructions held not to state plaintiff was passenger while waiting at station.

Where one of the instructions stated that the plaintiff was not a passenger while the train was standing at the station unless actually attempting to board the train or so near the train and in such a position as to indicate his intention to board it, an objection that the instructions as a whole stated that plaintiff was a passenger from the time he went upon the station platform was untenable.

13. Appeal and error ☞1066 — Instruction plaintiff was passenger while waiting at station held not prejudicial.

An erroneous instruction that plaintiff was a passenger while waiting for the train at defendant's station was not prejudicial, where there was no evidence that plaintiff received any injury until he actually attempted to board the train.

14. Carriers ☞348(4) — Omission from requested charge on contributory negligence held not erroneous.

An omission from a requested instruction that, if the train had started, and plaintiff attempted to board it while it was in motion or while the gates were closed, he was contributorily negligent, of a portion stating that the rule was true whether the train stopped for a reasonable time at the station or not, because, if it did not stop or the stop was unreasonably short, plaintiff was not thereby justified in attempting to board it while it was traveling at a high rate of speed or while the gates were closed, was not erroneous, since the omitted statement added nothing to the instruction.

15. Carriers ☞348(13)—Statement requiring plaintiff to prove freedom from negligence was properly omitted from instructions.

A requested instruction requiring plaintiff to establish negligence of defendant unmixed with any negligence on his own part proposed to put on plaintiff the burden of proving freedom from contributory negligence, as to which the burden of proof was on defendant, and the omission therefrom of the reference to contributory negligence was proper.

16. Trial ☞295(7) — Instructions, considered as a whole, held not to eliminate contributory negligence.

Where the trial court inserted in many of the hypothetical questions given at plaintiff's request the phrase "without plaintiff's fault," and on defendant's request fully instructed on the law of contributory negligence, the instructions as a whole were not subject to the objection that they eliminated from consideration the issue of contributory negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by Guy Riley against the Southern Pacific Company and James O. Davis, substituted as Director General of Railroads. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Davis appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, and Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, for appellant.

Russell & Heid, of Tulare, and Farnsworth, McClure & Burke, of Visalia, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. At Vine street station in the city of Berkeley, while attempting at night on May 5, 1919, to board an electric train operated by appellant, plaintiff was seriously injured, and the appeal is from a judgment in his favor for the sum of $41,200. No objection is made to the sufficiency of the complaint, nor do we understand it to be seriously disputed that the evidence supports the verdict. However, that the peculiar feature of the case may be portrayed, we quote the following from the testimony of plaintiff:

"We (referring to a Miss Paiva and himself) took the street car down to the ferry building in San Francisco and took the ferryboat between 11 o'clock and 12 o'clock, and we ferried across the Bay. At the Oakland mole we took the Southern Pacific train and got off at Vine street station. We didn't know just exactly when the train came back, but we did know that was the last train I could go back on. Miss Paiva lived a distance of about four or five blocks from this station, so we decided to sit there and wait for this train to go back. * * * We went over to the side of the station and sat down and waited for this train to come back, because it was the last train I could get to San Francisco. It wasn't very long until it came back, and I immediately, when I saw the train coming around the curve here (indicating on the diagram), got up from my seat and walked straight out to the first track and waited for it to come on. When I saw this train coming around the curve it was coming at a pretty good rate of speed. I walked straight out from this seat here to the first track and stood there and the train was still coming on. It wasn't slowing down very much, and I stood there for a second and walked over to the second track. I didn't get clear over to the second track, but in about halfway between the two tracks, and the train was going at a speed that I didn't think it would stop where I expected it to right opposite the seat, so I turned and walked diagonally out there south, thinking that the train would go a little past my expectation and I would be that much further ahead. I got down there and walked right on down to the train, and I got just about to it and the train stopped, and I took and grasped the rear handle of the left-hand gate of the first car going toward San Francisco, and the train was stopped, and I grasped the handle, and it was still stopped when I stepped my left foot up on the lower step. As I did that, the train started; it just stopped a second, and threw my feet both to the ground. Then I was trying to get my balance, but in doing that I was half dragged and half ran along the side of the train still holding the handle with my right hand, and I must have gone that way 15 or 20 feet, or maybe further, trying to get up speed. I thought when I could get enough speed pushing I would throw my feet out and swing up around on this step, and when I thought I reached that rate of speed I swung, and, instead of my feet going on the step, they were swung back between the step and they lodged in the mechanism of the second car, the car behind the one I was trying to get on. And when I was gradually being dragged under the car and such pressure being brought on my hands, in time I would have to let go and slip right back under the car. Instead of waiting for that, I swung my whole body and arms away from the rail I was holding to and dropped. As I dropped, my feet were caught and held so they didn't swing clear of the track, and when I dropped both trucks of the last car ran over my feet and limbs. The gates on the last car were shut, so I walked immediately right down to the car ahead of it. That was the rear end of the first car, and the gate on my side was open, and the train stopped still. * * * Just as I stepped with my left foot the train jerked out, and jerked my foot off and I fell to the pavement. Just the start of the train jerked my foot off, and I lost my balance."

[1] His testimony was substantially corroborated by that of Miss Mary Paiva, who witnessed the accident, and there is no doubt that a case is thus presented against appellant within the undisputed and well-established principle of liability of common carriers for the safety of their passengers. 10 Corpus Juris, 948; Nilson v. Oakland Trac-tion Co., 10 Cal. App. 103, 101 Pac. 413; Franklin v. Visalia Electric Ry. Co., 21 Cal. App. 270, 131 Pac. 776; Raub v. Los Angeles T. Ry. Co., 103 Cal. 473, 37 Pac. 374; Boone v. Oakland Transit Co., 139 Cal. 490, 73 Pac. 243; Cody v. Market St. Railway Co., 148 Cal. 90, 82 Pac. 666.

[2] In the light of plaintiff's testimony we must, of course, regard him as a passenger and entitled to the highest degree of care on the part of defendant. This conclusion is in accordance with the definition of a passenger contained in an instruction to the jury given by the court on request of defendant as follows:

"A passenger is one who undertakes, with the consent of the carrier, to travel in a conveyance furnished by the carrier otherwise than in the service of the carrier, as such. The relation of carrier and passenger depends upon a contract of carriage, expressed or implied, between the carrier and the passenger, made by themselves, or their respective agents. The relation begins when the person puts himself in the care of the carrier, or directly within the carrier's control, with the bona fide intention of becoming a passenger, and is accepted as such by the carrier."

But, as before stated, there seems to be no serious controversy between the parties as to this feature of the case. Indeed, at the oral argument, while not waiving any of the points made in the briefs, the learned counsel for appellant confined himself to a discussion of two considerations which he deemed of sufficient importance to merit the careful attention of the court.

The first of these relates to the supposed disqualification of the sheriff of Tulare county to summon the jury which tried the case. It seems that on June 27, 1920, more than a year after the accident happened, said sheriff, Court Smith, delivered some prisoners to the state penitentiary at San Quentin, and on his return went to San Francisco to attend the National Democratic Convention that was then in session. While there he met two of respondent's attorneys, and at their request, on the evening of June 29, 1920, he accompanied them to said Vine street station in Berkeley, where he made certain observations with respect to the speed of the cars and powers of observation of operatives and others upon said cars. At the trial, in rebuttal, Mr. Smith testified, without objection, to the results of these observations. He completed his testimony on the afternoon of the day preceding the submission of the case to the jury, and immediately thereafter a recess was taken, at which time counsel for appellant claim that they learned for the first time the facts that constituted the disqualification of the sheriff. No suggestion, however, of such asserted disqualification was made to the trial court until the argument of the motion for a new trial. At said hearing affidavits were presented by both parties, and wherein there is any conflict as to the facts we must, of course, be controlled by the showing in favor of respondent. In his affidavit the sheriff deposed:

"That while at said Vine street station he was requested by said Messrs. Russell & Heid to make certain observations and inform them the result thereof, the exact nature and extent of which more fully appears from affiant's testimony as given at the trial of the above-entitled action; that said Messrs. Russell & Heid did not discuss with affiant the merits of the plaintiff's contention or the defendant's defense in the above-entitled action other than to state to him in a general way their understanding of how an accident occurred wherein one Guy Riley, the plaintiff in said action, was injured; that after making said observations and informing said Messrs. Russell & Heid the result thereof affiant returned to San Francisco and paid no further attention to said case until he was called as a witness to testify therein on behalf of the plaintiff.

"That affiant was not familiar or acquainted with, either on the 8th day of July, 1920, when said special venire was issued and said jury summoned as aforesaid, or on the 9th day of July, when he testified as a witness in said case, or at any other time, the merits of the plaintiff's claim, or of the defendants' defense, and did not entertain any opinion or conclusion with respect thereto, and particularly he did not entertain any opinion or conclusion that the plaintiff should recover any damages in said case. Affiant further states the fact to be that he was not acquainted with and did not even know Guy Riley, the plaintiff in said action, by sight or otherwise."

After denying that he made certain purported statements to appellant's counsel he proceeded:

"Affiant states the fact to be positively and absolutely that he did not state to W. I. Gilbert, E. L. Barnes, or any other person, or persons, at any time, that plaintiff ought to recover in said case, and affiant further states that he made no statement and used no words of similar import, or that could be construed to have that meaning.

"Affiant further states that he did not at any time said jurors were so summoned, or at the time of the trial of said case, or at any other time, have an unqualified or other opinion or belief as to the merits of the action, either founded upon knowledge of its material facts, or some of them, or otherwise, and further that there was not a state of mind in affiant evincing either enmity against or bias to either party."

There were other affidavits lending support to the contention of respondent that there was no legal disqualification on the part of the sheriff, but it is entirely unnecessary to go further to show a complete justification for the court's ruling.

[3] It is not disputed that the same rules govern the disqualification of a juror and the summoning officer; the theory of the law being that a biased and prejudiced officer will select biased and prejudiced jurors. People v. Le Doux, 155 Cal. 535, 102 Pac. 517.

[4] The disqualification, if any, therefore in the present case must fall within the specification of subdivision 6 of section 602 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as follows:

"Having an unqualified opinion or belief as to the merits of the action founded upon knowledge of its material facts or some of them."

The leading case upon the question, as it deals with criminal cases, is People v. Reynolds, 16 Cal. 129, wherein is discussed with great learning the character of the opinion that will disqualify a juror for implied bias. It was said that—

The statute implies "that, to exclude the juror, he must have a settled conviction of the guilt or innocence of the party, or has expressed such a conviction. * * * A mere suspicion or inclination of the mind towards a conclusion is not enough; the state of mind must be more decided. He must have reached a conclusion like that upon which he would be willing to act in ordinary matters. In other words, we repeat, the effect upon his mind must be more than an impression; it must amount to a conviction, in order to exclude him for implied bias."

This decision was approved in People v. Symonds, 22 Cal. 349, and subsequent cases, but, as the principle is undisputed, we need cite no further. Manifestly the rule would be no more strictly applied in civil than in criminal cases, and as thus applied, it is quite apparent that no serious objection could be made to the qualification of the sheriff. According to his affidavit, he had no knowledge of any of the material facts connected with the accident, nor had he been informed, except in a very general way, of the nature of the case. The trial judge was therefore warranted in believing his verified statement that he had neither formed nor expressed any opinion as to the merits of the action, and that he entertained neither prejudice nor enmity against either party.

It cannot be disputed that the question of the disqualification of the sheriff was one in the first instance for the trial judge to determine, and the showing was not such as to compel a finding in favor of appellant's contention. Graybill v. De Young, 146 Cal. 421, 80 Pac. 618.

[5] Of course it will not be argued that the mere fact that the sheriff testified as to some matters that might be considered of importance by the jury would disqualify him within the contemplation of the statute. This would be a strained and unreasonable construction of the law and would tend to interfere greatly with the practical administration of justice.

The Le Doux Case, supra, was entirely different, for therein it appeared that the sheriff "had an unqualified opinion of the guilt of the defendant, based upon his own activity in gathering evidence for the prosecution and founded upon his direct investigation of the facts."

[6] Moreover, it is equally plain that, if any disqualification existed, it was waived by the failure of appellant to make timely objection. As before stated, appellant became aware of the supposed disqualification a day before the conclusion of the trial, and there is no reason shown why it did not immediately seek to arrest the proceedings. It chose, however, to take chances upon receiving a favorable verdict; and in such cases the just and well-established rule is that, after the case goes against him, he cannot object to the validity of the verdict because of circumstances within his knowledge which he has declined to seasonably urge.

The principle is clearly stated in 24 Cyc. 316, from which we quote:

"It is well settled that a failure to challenge or object operates as a conclusive waiver if the ground of objection is known to the party at the time the jury is impaneled, is discovered during the progress of the trial, if he has knowledge of facts sufficient to put him upon inquiry, or is otherwise chargeable with knowledge of the ground of objection."

Many cases are cited by respondent illustrating this doctrine in various phases, of which we may mention the following: People v. Hamilton (Cal. App.) 192 Pac. 467; Monaghan v. Rolling Mill Co., 81 Cal. 190, 22 Pac. 590; Ipswitch v. Fernandez, 84 Cal. 639, 24 Pac. 298; People v. Ah Lee Doon, 97 Cal. 171, 31 Pac. 933; Sherwin v. Southern Pacific Co., 168 Cal. 722, 145 Pac. 92.

The authorities, indeed, seem to be uniform that a known cause of challenge is waived by withholding it until after verdict, "since such practice is incompatible with good faith and fair dealing which should characterize the administration of justice."

[7] Again, if it be conceded for the sake of argument that the sheriff was disqualified and that timely objection was made, what answer is there to the contention of respondent that no prejudice resulted to appellant? The special veniremen were summoned by deputy sheriffs without consulting the sheriff, who had no voice in the manner of selection or in naming the persons to be selected, and the jurors selected were fairly and impartially chosen from the citizens of Tulare county by persons entirely unbiased and unprejudiced and who knew nothing whatever about the facts of the case. In other words, the jurors were summoned in exactly the same way, and we must assume that persons of the same type and qualifications were obtained as though the coroner or an elisor had served the process. While, therefore, if the sheriff was disqualified, the disqualification would technically affect his deputies, it would not follow that the error was prejudicial. In fact, in view of the showing made on the hearing of the motion for a new trial, we can safely say that, if any error was committed, the case is one for the application of section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution.

[8] As to the contention of appellant that the question involves a constitutional right which cannot be reached by said section 4½, it is sufficient to quote the following:

"The manner and method of summoning a jury is a subject-matter of legislative control rather than of constitutional provision, * * * the benefit of which may be waived." People v. Nakis, 60 Cal. Dec. 433, syllabus (184 Cal. 105, 193 Pac. 92).

[9] But, even if it were a constitutional right that was invaded and it appeared from an examination of the record that there was no "miscarriage of justice," the error should be disregarded on appeal. People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 Pac. 1042.

It may be added, as pointed out by respondent, that when the trial was completed and the jury were about to retire to deliberate upon their verdict, the sheriff was sworn to take charge of them, and no objection whatever was made to the proceeding. This constituted not only a waiver, but evidence that appellant was satisfied that he had suffered no prejudice by reason of the alleged irregularity.

[10] The other point emphasized at the oral argument is, in our judgment, also entirely without merit. It is based upon the opinion of the trial judge expressed in determining the motion for a new trial as follows:

"(1) That the amount of the verdict rendered by the jury was and is excessive, and in that respect was not justified by the evidence; (2) that the excessive amount of the verdict was the result of passion and prejudice on the part of the jury."

It was further stated that the amount of the verdict was greatly in excess of any verdict allowed to stand in any of the courts of this country for a similar injury, and the court concluded that $20,000 should be remitted or else a new trial granted. Respondent consented to the reduction, whereupon the court denied the motion for a new trial, reciting that—

"Judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendant in the said sum of $41,200 and costs is supported by the evidence."

It is not disputed that it was within the discretion of the trial court to make such conditional order, but it seems to be the claim of appellant that, in the opinion of the trial judge, the whole of the verdict was tainted with passion and prejudice, and therefore it was his duty to set it aside and grant the motion for a new trial. This view would rather imply a serious reflection upon the good faith of the trial judge, although we are satisfied that no such charge was contemplated by the capable and courteous counsel who argued the cause. The record shows conclusively that by the use of said terms the court simply meant that to the extent of $20,000 the verdict was not supported by the evidence, and to that extent only it might be said to be the result of passion or prejudice. If the trial judge had believed that the whole of the verdict was the product of passion or prejudice, he would not have recited in the order that the balance was supported by the evidence, and he would, of course, have set the verdict aside.

Indeed, in the use of said expressions the trial judge probably had in view the decisions holding that said language is in legal contemplation equivalent to a declaration that the amount of the verdict is not supported by the evidence. In Kinsey v. Wallace, 36 Cal. 462, the Supreme Court declared "that a verdict for a sum so greatly disproportionate to the actual damage of the plaintiff, under the facts of the case, is of itself sufficient evidence that it was rendered under the influence of passion or prejudice," but this circumstance was not deemed sufficient to vitiate the entire verdict, as the Supreme Court made a conditional order allowing the plaintiff the privilege of remitting a part of it with the alternative of a reversal of the judgment.

In Doolin v. Omnibus Cable Co., 125 Cal. 141, 57 Pac. 774, it is said:

"To say that verdict for damages was enhanced by passion or prejudice is one mode of saying that the evidence did not justify it; and the only means of discovering therein the element of passion or prejudice, within the meaning of the statute, is by comparing the amount with the evidence which was before the court at the trial. Harrison v. Sutter Street Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 156. Whatever may be the rule which should govern the trial judge, it is certain that when his action in granting a new trial on the ground of excessive damages, or requiring a reduction of the amount as the condition of denying one, comes to be reviewed on appeal, his order will not be reversed unless it plainly appears that he abused his discretion; and the cases teach that when there is material conflict of evidence regarding the extent of damage the imputation of such abuse is repelled, the same as if the ground of the order were insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict."

It may be added that appellant expressly admits that the amount of the verdict as allowed by the trial judge is not at all disproportionate to the extent of the injury suffered by plaintiff, and this admission virtually nullifies the force of his criticism of said action of the trial judge.

The other objections urged in the briefs deserve, we think, but scant consideration.

[11] Appellant, while intimating that instruction No. 7 as given by the court is erroneous, has not attempted to point out any error, and we might therefore disregard the suggestion. It embodies, we may add, however, a generally accepted principle of liability on the part of common carriers for the safety of one attempting, without fault on his part, to board a train, and was undoubtedly applicable to the facts as related by plaintiff.

[12] Appellant is mistaken in the claim that the court instructed the jury that "from the time the plaintiff in this case went upon the cement platform adjacent to Vine street station, as it is called, he was to be considered a passenger, and that the defendant was in duty bound to use the utmost care and caution for his protection." We think no such inference can be fairly drawn from the consideration of the various instructions upon the subject which were given by the court. We are satisfied the jury must have understood the law to be as admitted by appellant that a person "does not become the object of the utmost care of the railroad company until he actually starts to make his entry upon the train." Indeed, it is made to appear clearly by the various instructions of the court that the utmost care was required of appellant only in case plaintiff was a passenger, and there was a specific direction that "plaintiff in this case was not a passenger and cannot be considered by you as such while the train mentioned in the pleadings was standing at Vine street station, unless plaintiff, in the exercise of reasonable care and prudence on his part, was actually attempting to board defendant's said train, or was so near to said train, and in such a position as to indicate his intention so to board the same," etc. It is not at all probable that the jury was misled as to this feature of the case.

[13] Moreover, if any error was committed in that respect, it was entirely without prejudice, for the reason that there was no evidence or no contention that any act of appellant contributed to the injury except the negligence in starting the train while plaintiff was attempting to board it. The care required of appellant toward plaintiff while he was sitting or standing on the platform was entirely foreign to the issues and could not have been regarded by the jury. There were only two theories presented by the pleadings and the evidence. The one urged by plaintiff which we have already indicated and the other by appellant that plaintiff attempted to board the train while it was in motion and while the gates were shut, and the jury were instructed with great particularity and precision as to the law applicable to each of these theories. There was no room for confusion or misunderstanding as to what was required of each party upon either hypothesis.

[14] Appellant complains because the trial court omitted from a requested instruction the following:

"This statement holds true, whether the train stopped for a sufficient or reasonable time at Vine street station to allow passengers to board the same or not, because, if the stop made at Vine street station was unreasonably short, or if said train did not stop at Vine street station at all, the plaintiff would not have been justified in attempting to board it while it was traveling at a dangerously high rate of speed, or while the gates were closed, regardless of the rate of speed at which it was traveling or whether it was moving at all or not."

It is perfectly apparent that this clause added nothing to the portion of the proposed instruction which was given by the court as follows:

"If the car or train described in the complaint had started away from Vine street station, and if the plaintiff, seeing that it had started, ran after it and attempted to board it while it was in motion, and was injured because of the rate of speed at which said train was traveling, or if plaintiff attempted to board said train when the gates thereof were closed regardless of the rate of speed at which it was traveling or whether the train had started at all or not, in either event he (the plaintiff) did not exercise and was not exercising that reasonable care and caution which he should have exercised in protecting himself from injury, and such failure to so exercise reasonable care and caution for his own safety was the direct and proximate cause of the injury he received, and plaintiff cannot recover."

Beside, these various contingencies were specifically covered by other instructions given by the court, and the rejected clause was also argumentative, and misleading by reason of the suggestion that the train might not have stopped at said station, whereas the evidence all showed to the contrary.

[15] There was no error in striking from defendant's proposed instruction No. 21 the phrase "unmixed with any negligence on his own part contributing directly and proximately to such injury." The instruction as proposed put upon plaintiff the burden of proving not only that the negligence of defendant contributed to the injury, but that he was free from contributing negligence; whereas the law is well settled that the duty is cast upon defendant to prove such contributing negligence, and the plaintiff is not required to anticipate such defense. Besides, this identical phrase is contained in a similar instruction, No. 17, given by the court on plaintiff's request. It was more favorable to appellant than he had a right to expect, but of this he cannot complain.

[16] It is entirely a misapprehension of the situation to say that the issue of contributory negligence was eliminated from the case by the instructions of the court. In many of the hypothetical instructions given at the request of plaintiff the modification "without plaintiff's fault" was introduced by the court, and on appellant's request the doctrine was fully presented. It is sufficient to quote the following:

"If it should appear to you from the evidence that the plaintiff in this case neglected those precautions for his own safety indicated in and required by these instructions, and you should further find that said conduct directly or proximately contributed to his injury, you must find in favor of the defendant, even though you may believe that the employés of the train were guilty of negligence while engaged in operating said train."

We fail to see any contradiction in any material respect in the instructions. As we have stated, they presented the law applicable to the different theories of the parties. It was the duty of the court to so instruct the jury, leaving it to them to determine which theory was in consonance with the facts. There was no invasion of the province of the jury, but there would be cause for complaint if the court had failed to accommodate and adapt the instructions to any rational inference that might be derived from the evidence.

The fact is that a careful examination of the record justifies the statement that the case was tried with extraordinary care, the rights of both parties were apparently guarded with scrupulous concern, and we have not been able to discern any error in the proceedings from beginning to end.

The judgment is affirmed.

57 Cal. App. 509

Ex parte TOSELLO. (Cr. 1057.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 29, 1922.)

1. Municipal corporations  § 111 (4) — Section of ordinance not unconstitutional because another section was invalid.

One section of a city ordinance, which prohibited keeping saloons, etc., where intoxicating liquors were sold or given away was not rendered invalid by another section which permitted intoxicating liquors to be given to guests in homes, and to be sold under certain conditions, contrary to Const. U. S. Amend. 18.

2. Intoxicating liquors  § 13, 132 — Neither Eighteenth Amendment nor the Volstead Act was intended to affect local prohibitory laws.

Neither Const. U. S. Amend. 18 nor the Volstead Act was intended to nullify prohibitory state or local laws.

Application of John Tosello for a writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Sheriff of Santa Clara county to secure the release of the petitioner from custody. Writ denied.

H. A. Gabriel, of San Jose, for petitioner.

Archer Bowden, City Atty., of San Jose, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. [1] The petitioner alleges that he is unlawfully confined by the sheriff of Santa Clara county under color of a commitment of the police court of the city of San Jose after his conviction of a violation of an ordinance of that city approved November 6, 1917, entitled, "an ordinance pertaining to and providing for limiting and regulating the sale of spirituous, malt, vinous or other alcoholic liquors, * * *" and that the conviction and confinement are void because the ordinance is unconstitutional as contravening the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in that it regulates, limits, and permits the sale of intoxicating liquors under certain conditions.

The first section of the ordinance provides as follows:

"On and after January 1, 1918, no person, either as principal, agent, servant or employee, shall open, establish, keep, maintain or carry on within the corporate limits of the city of San Jose any tipping house, dramshop, cellar, saloon, bar, barroom, sample room, buffet or other place where spirituous, vinous, malt or other alcoholic liquors are sold or given away, except as provided in section two (2) hereof."

The second section provides that it shall not be unlawful under the ordinance to serve alcoholic liquors in the home to members of the family or to guests without compensation, to distribute wine at sacramental service, for any registered pharmacist to sell or dispense alcoholic liquors at a pharmacy for medicinal purposes only, to sell or serve vinous and malt liquors with meals in any hotel, restaurant, or club under a permit obtained from the city council, or to sell alcoholic liquors in sealed or corked packages under a license for that purpose obtained from the city council. Section 4 of the ordinance authorizes the city council to grant permits to sell liquors in accordance with the terms of the ordinance.

The complaint on which the petitioner was tried and convicted charges that he did "at the time and place aforesaid, willfully and unlawfully open, establish, keep, maintain, and carry on within the corporate limits of the city of San Jose * * * a tipping house, dramshop, sample room, and place where spirituous, vinous, malt, and other alcoholic liquors were sold and given away, contrary to the provisions of said ordinance of said city."

In brief, the position of the petitioner is that, inasmuch as section 2 of the ordinance permits the city council to license a sale of intoxicating liquors contrary to the provisions of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and as the provisions of that section cannot be segregated from the provisions of section 1, the whole ordinance must fall. Cases are cited to the proposition that, where the constitutional and unconstitutional provisions of the statute are so inseparably blended together as to make it clear that either clause would not have been enacted without the other, the whole act is void. The weakness of this argument is that the ordinance was not unconstitutional in any respect when it was enacted. We are not, therefore, concerned with what the people intended when they enacted the ordinance, or whether they would have enacted the provisions of section 1 without the exceptions contained in section 2. The fact is that they enacted it just as it reads today, and they alone can repeal it. The ordinance having been constitutional when enacted, and not having been repealed by the city, the question is: How far did the constitutional amendment No. 18 suspend its operation? The first section is plainly a prohibition against the sale or giving away of intoxicating liquors in any tippling house, dramshop, saloon, or similar place of business. To this extent the ordinance is prohibitory, and is in harmony with the provisions of the constitutional amendment. The petitioner is charged with doing this very thing. The exception relates only to the "other place" where spirituous, vinous, malt, or other alcoholic liquors are sold or given away, such as private homes, churches, pharmacies, hotels, restaurants, clubs, and places where alcoholic liquors are sold in sealed or corked packages. As the constitutional amendment (Const. U. S. Amend. 18) and the Volstead Act (41 Stat. 305) which followed it were designed to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and distribution of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, certain portions of the provisions of section 2 of the ordinance were, of course, rendered inoperative. This does not, however, affect the prohibitory features of section 1.

A similar question arose in People v. Capelli (Cal. App.) 203 Pac. 837. In that case the appellant had been convicted of violation of the Wylie Act (St. 1911, p. 599), and based his appeal upon the ground that, because section 11 of that act authorizes the electors of any subdivision which had become no license territory to vote upon the question of licensing the sale of alcoholic liquors therein, the whole act was rendered void by the adoption of the constitutional amendment. The appellate court held that, though the provisions of section 11 of the Wylie Act were inoperative because of the constitutional amendment, this did not affect the prohibitory features of the act as a whole. To the same effect is Ex parte Crookshank (D. C.) 269 Fed. 980, 987.

[2] To the point that neither the constitutional amendment nor the Volstead Act were intended to affect or nullify prohibitory state or local laws, see In re Volpi (Cal. App.) 190 Pac. 1090; People v. Collins (Cal. App.) 202 Pac. 344; In re Polizzotto (Cal. Sup.) 205 Pac. 676; Woods v. City of Seattle (D. C.) 270 Fed. 315; State v. District Court, 58 Mont. 684, 194 Pac. 308; State v. Turner, 115 Wash. 170, 196 Pac. 638.

The writ is discharged, and the prisoner remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

SORAN v. HARRIS. (Civ. 3814.)

1. Detectives — Evidence held to sustain an allowance to plaintiff on his account for money paid out for defendant.

In an action on account to recover balance due plaintiff for salary, commissions, and expenses arising out of employment of plaintiff by defendant, a detective, evidence by defendant that he told plaintiff that if F., another employee of defendant, got a sum of money paid for handling a case, it should be charged to defendant, and testimony of plaintiff that he paid the money to F., held sufficient to sustain the allowance of that amount of money to plaintiff in his account.

2. Detectives — Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding under which an amount was allowed detective on an account.

In an action by detective to recover the balance due on a mutual account for salary, commissions, and expenses arising out of the employment, evidence held sufficient to sustain findings allowing plaintiff part of customary final charge for handling case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by W. T. Soran against Nicholas B. Harris. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Warren L. Williams and Seymour S. Silvertown, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Howard F. Shepherd, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover a balance claimed to be due to him on mutual account for salary, commissions, and expenses arising out of the employment of the plaintiff by the defendant, whose business was that of a detective. The plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendant appeals therefrom. The sole ground of appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings, in this, that certain items were improperly allowed to the plaintiff.

The amount of the judgment is $431.96. Appellant concedes that the items constituting this amount are sustained by the evidence to the extent of $173.66. This leaves a disputed balance of $258.30.

[1] The first disputed item is the sum of $125 paid by the plaintiff to one Fuentez out of a certain sum of $250 which plaintiff received from Mrs. D'Aleria in the course of certain business transacted by defendant for Mrs. D'Aleria. Plaintiff was in charge of the D'Aleria case at San Diego, and Fuentez was another employee of defendant who had been sent to San Diego to assist the plaintiff. Appellant, in his testimony, admitted that he told the plaintiff that if Fuentez got the $125, it should be charged to appellant. Respondent testified that he did pay that amount to Fuentez. The evidence is sufficient to sustain the allowance of this amount to the plaintiff in his account.

[2] Next it is contended that, under the evidence, the plaintiff is not entitled to a credit of $125 for "closing the D'Aleria case." The plaintiff testified to a long-standing arrangement under which, upon the making of a special charge for the closing of a case, and where there were two "operators," the operators received 50 per cent. of this closing charge. He therefore claimed 25 per cent. of the closing charge of $500 which was made and paid in that case. The defendant testified that the reason, and the only reason, why the plaintiff was not entitled to this item, was that the plaintiff was in a drunken condition at the time when the case was closed. He stated that in this particular case, if the plaintiff had not been drunk, he would have been entitled to share in the fee. There is testimony, by a witness who was present on the occasion in question, that the plaintiff was not intoxicated at that time. The evidence is sufficient to sustain the findings under which this item was allowed. There is a group of items stated in the testimony, and referred to in the brief for respondent, which satisfactorily covers at least $8 of the $8.30 of disputed items. We have not made an extended search for the other 30 cents.

The judgment is affirmed.

HELMS et al. v. PACIFIC MILL & TIMBER CO. (Civ. 2407.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 25, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 22, 1922.)

1. Pleading — 398—Where plaintiffs' names in title of complaint appeared as individuals and in the body as partners, and the court found a partnership, variance immaterial.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 469, providing that a variance is not to be deemed material unless it has actually misled, and section 470, providing that where the variance is not material the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence, where a trial court found that a contract was executed by plaintiffs as copartners, where plaintiffs' names appeared in the title of a complaint as individuals and in the body of the complaint they were alleged to be copartners and that each became owner of one-half of certain goods manufactured by them and that an agent acting for both of plaintiffs sold the goods to defendant, the complaint was not prejudicially defective.

2. Appeal and error — 174—The objection that complaint failed to allege partnership name cannot be first raised on appeal.

In an action by copartners against a purchaser of goods to recover the price agreed to be paid therefor, in which defendant urged on motion for nonsuit that the cause of action is a partnership demand and the action was prosecuted in their individual names, the objection that the partnership name was not alleged in the complaint, and if the partnership was fictitious and no certificate had been filed as required by Civ. Code, § 2466, the matter would have been delayed until the filing and publication of the certificate if plaintiffs elected so to act, not being raised at the trial, cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

3. Sales — 82(4)—Seller under contract held entitled to payment upon each delivery of the goods as ordered.

Where contract for the sale of 100,000 grape stakes consisted of an accepted order from the buyer to "ship to ourselves at instructions to follow," and in pursuance thereof six carloads, amounting to about half of the total order, were shipped as ordered by the buyers during a period of 17 days, held, that the seller was entitled to payment upon each delivery as ordered, so that the seller was not in default in not shipping more stakes until those already shipped were paid for.

4. Sales — 82(4)—Contract of sale held to entitle seller to payment on delivery of goods.

Where a seller contracted to sell all railroad ties he made during a certain year, with a specified minimum quantity to be delivered by the end of the year, which were to be delivered from time to time as made throughout the year, in view of seller's inability to furnish a bond as required in the contract of sale and of the fact that the buyer advanced $500 on the contract price, the contract held to contemplate payment on delivery of each shipment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by J. F. Helms and another against the Pacific Mill & Timber Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sterling Carr, of San Francisco, and E. W. Wilson, of Eureka, for appellant.

Puter & Quinn and H. L. Ford, all of Eureka, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiffs, alleging that they were copartners, sued for the recovery of the agreed price of certain grape stakes sold to defendant. In appellant's opening brief it is argued that the court erred in denying defendant's motion to strike out the fourth amended complaint, but in the reply brief it is admitted that such objection is not tenable on this appeal.

[1] It is urged that there is a fatal variance between the allegations of the complaint and the proofs, in that plaintiffs sue as individuals and allege a contract made by them as individuals while the evidence shows that the contract was executed by the partnership. Plaintiffs' names appear in the title of the complaint as individuals merely, but in the body of the complaint it is alleged that the plaintiffs, as copartners, manufactured the grape stakes; that thereupon each became the owner of one-half thereof; and that Helms, acting for both, sold them to defendant. While the pleading is not a model, it is difficult to see in what manner defendant has suffered prejudice from any defect therein. A variance is not "to be deemed material, unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice." Code Civ. Proc. § 469. "Where the variance is not material, as provided in the last section, the court may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence." Code Civ. Proc. § 470. The court found that the contract was executed by plaintiffs as copartners.

[2] In appellant's brief it is said that if the partnership name had been alleged, and "if the same was fictitious and no certificate had been filed as required by the Civil Code" (section 2466), the defendant could have alleged such failure "and the matter would then have been delayed until the filing and publication of such certificate, if plaintiffs elected so to act." The answer in no manner raised the question here urged, and the evidence does not show under what name the partnership business was conducted or whether any certificate was filed. The record does not disclose that such objection was made at any stage of the case in the trial court; the contention there urged, on motion for nonsuit, being that the cause of action proved "is a partnership demand, and the action is prosecuted in their individual names." The question cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

[3] It is contended that the plaintiffs failed to perform their part of the contract. The contract consisted of a written order by the defendant and its acceptance on behalf of plaintiffs. The order reads as follows:

"Ship to ourselves at instructions to follow. Prices are f. o. b. Humboldt points Eureka rate. 100,000 2x2x6 No. 1 split redwood grape stakes pointed 23.00. Please sign and return promptly to us at San Francisco."

Six carloads of grape stakes, amounting to a total of 50,490, were shipped as ordered from time to time during a period of 17 days, from September 25 to October 11, 1917. The shipments were made direct to defendant's customers as ordered by its agent at Eureka. It does not appear when defendant next ordered a shipment of the stakes, but its president testified that he made several demands for delivery after October, 1917. Plaintiffs refused to make further deliveries until paid for the stakes furnished, and defendant declined to make payment, claiming that no payments were due until the entire 100,000 stakes were delivered. Nielson testified:

"We made a contract with the defendant for the sale of 100,000 redwood grape stakes, and there was present Helms, myself and Herrick. * * * I don't remember when they were to be delivered, but not all at once. They were to be delivered at several times, we could not deliver all at once."

Herrick was the Humboldt county representative of defendant. Nielson testified relative to the failure of defendants to make payment as follows:

"They said they would send money up time and again, but it failed to come. * * * I was present when Helms and Herrick talked over the failure of the defendant to pay. The amount of the conversation was that Herrick told Helms not to ship any more until they made him a payment. * * * Herrick said nothing to the effect that they would not pay anything till they got the other part of the shipment."

Witnesses for the defendant contradicted much of Nielson's testimony, but it was for the trial court to decide whom to believe.

The written contract provided for shipments "at instructions to follow." This provision, construed in the light of the attending circumstances and the manner in which the contract was carried out by the parties in so far as performed, justifies the inference that the parties understood at the time the contract was executed that a considerable time might elapse between the first and the last deliveries thereunder. The defendant might, at its discretion, have postponed the last delivery for months. Under the circumstances shown, it would be unreasonable to hold that the parties intended to make the time of payment dependent upon the will of the purchaser. It must be held that the plaintiffs were entitled to payment upon each delivery as ordered. Veerkamp v. Hulburd C. & D. Co., 58 Cal. 229, 41 Am. Rep. 265; United Canneries Co. v. Seelye (Cal. App.) 192 Pac. 341; Morton v. Clark, 181 Mass. 134, 63 N. E. 409; Dees v. Self, 165 Ala. 229, 51 South. 735; Press v. Vandergrift, 165 App. Div. 180, 150 N. Y. Supp. 238; Neal v. Shewalter, 5 Ind. App. 147, 31 N. E. 848; People v. Grant, 138 Mich. 60, 100 N. W. 1006.

By way of counterclaim, the defendant alleged damages in the sum of $198.04 by reason of plaintiffs' failure to deliver the remainder of the grape stakes. Since the plaintiffs were justified in refusing to make further deliveries until paid for the stakes furnished, the defendant had no just cause of counterclaim.

[4] The defendant filed a cross-complaint against plaintiff Helms, praying for damages alleged to have been suffered by reason of his failure to deliver certain railroad ties in accordance with the terms of a contract between them. By written contract, dated January 15, 1917, Helms agreed to sell to the defendant "all the 6x8 split Rwd. railroad ties I make during the year 1917 at 36c apiece, * * * minimum quantity to be delivered 30,000 by January 1st, 1918." The contract further provided:

"The Pacific Mill & Timber Company agree to advance $1,300.00 to be deducted from the first shipment. I agree to put up a bond of $2,000 which will be satisfactory to the Pacific Mill & Timber Company."

Helms was unable to furnish the required bond, and on August 13, 1917, Helms and defendant agreed to reduce the number of ties to 5,000 and defendant agreed to advance $500 on the contract and took an assignment of Helms' right in and to all 6x8 ties owned by him at that time, Helms agreeing to promptly manufacture and deliver to defendant such additional ties as, added to those on hand, would, "at the price listed in the contract already entered into as aforesaid, fully compensate party of the second part for said advance of $500.00." Helms delivered 1,605 ties under this contract which, at the contract price, amounted to more than the $500 advanced. He thereupon refused to make any further deliveries unless defendant would pay for each carload as delivered. What has been said relative to the contract for grape stakes is equally applicable here. From the provisions of the contract it appears that the ties were to be delivered from time to time as made throughout the year. Helms' inability to furnish a bond and the provision for an advancement to him of $500 on the contract price indicate that the parties understood that his financial ability to carry out his part of the contract was dependent upon receipt of payment on delivery of each shipment.

The evidence supports the court's findings in favor of the plaintiffs on their complaint and against the defendant on its counterclaim and cross-complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCOTT v. AUSTIN. (Civ. 4136.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 3, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 29, 1922.)

1. Husband and wife ⚭270(8)—Evidence in action by guardian of insane wife held to prove husband's transfer of community property to third person without consideration.

In an action by guardian of insane wife to require defendant to account for one-half of certain personal property constituting community property transferred to defendant by the husband shortly before his death without the wife's consent, in which it was claimed that the husband gave third party a gift of community property in violation of Civ. Code, § 172, evidence held to justify conclusion that the transfer of the property was not supported by any valuable consideration.

2. Husband and wife ⚭265—Guardian of insane wife could not recover one-half of sum given by husband to third party and used by him to pay husband's debts and funeral expenses.

Where the husband shortly before his death gave third party a certain sum of money for payment of the husband's debts, and third party spent the money partly for such purpose and partly to defray the funeral expenses of the husband, the guardian of the insane wife could not recover one-half thereof from third person on the ground that it was community property.

3. Husband and wife ⚭265—Husband could make gift of community property without wife's consent, where acquired before marriage or prior to amendment of statute prohibiting such gifts.

Where community property was acquired either before marriage or prior to amendment of Civ. Code, § 172, prohibiting gifts of community property by a husband without wife's consent, the husband could make a gift of such property without the wife's consent.

4. Husband and wife ⚭262(1)—Property acquired by either husband or wife other than by gift, bequest, devise, or descent presumed to be community property.

Property acquired by either party to a marriage other than by gift, bequest, devise, or descent is presumed to be community property, but there is no presumption as to the time of such acquisition.

5. Husband and wife ⚭262(1)—No presumption as to whether community property given away by husband was acquired before marriage or when gift valid.

In action by guardian of insane wife to compel third party to account for one-half of community property transferred to third party shortly before death on the ground that the husband gave the third party a gift of community property without the wife's consent, in violation of Civ. Code, § 172, as amended, there is no presumption as to whether such property was acquired before marriage or prior to the amendment of such statute so as to make the statute applicable.

6. Husband and wife ⚭270(10)—Judgment awarding wife one-half of community property as against donee of deceased husband free from claims of creditors and expenses of administration held erroneous.

In an action by insane wife's guardian to compel defendant to account for one-half of the personal property transferred to defendant by husband shortly before his death, in which it was claimed the husband made a gift to the defendant without the wife's consent, in violation of Civ. Code, § 172, it was error to award the wife one-half the property free from the claims of creditors and expenses of administration, but under section 1402, the court should merely have limited its judgment to declaring the wife the owner in an undivided one-half interest in the property, subject in common with the remaining property of the estate to the payment of the husband's debts, the family allowance, and expenses of administration.

7. Husband and wife §270(10)—Wife's share of community property on husband's death subject to debts, family allowance, and charges and expenses of administration.

The court will at the instance of a wife set aside a voluntary conveyance by the husband of community property so far as it affects the interest therein to which she succeeds at his death, but the right to have such relief does not free her recovery of the property from the burden imposed upon it by Civ. Code, § 1402, providing that on husband's death the wife's share in the community property is equally subject to the debts, family allowance, and charges and expenses of administration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Emma Scott, an insane person, by J. A. Cornett, guardian of her person and estate against Milton W. Austin, as administrator of the estate of Horace W. Austin, deceased, substituted instead of Horace W. Austin, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for appellant.

Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, and Daugherty & Theille, of Salinas, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action brought by her guardian to compel the defendant to account for one-half of certain personal property consisting of cash in the sum of $450, and a stock of merchandise, and the fixtures of a drug store, which had been transferred to him by John B. Scott, the husband of plaintiff, a few days before Scott's death.

Plaintiff and her deceased husband intermarried May 14, 1873, and continued to be husband and wife until the death of the former on February 18, 1920. Plaintiff is a patient in the state hospital for the insane at Stockton, Cal., and has been such for over 30 years. Prior to Scott's death he transferred to the defendant the stock and fixtures of his drug store and $450 in cash; he also conveyed to him certain real property, in consideration of which conveyance the defendant entered into an agreement in writing whereby he undertook to pay for the support and maintenance of the plaintiff herein "such amounts as from time to time may be fixed or required by the public authorities," and to furnish her with necessary clothing. The court found that the money and personal property was community property of the deceased and plaintiff, and that the turning over of said money and personal property constituted a gift amounting in value to about $6,450, and that the plaintiff had no knowledge and did not consent to said transfer. As matter of law the court concluded that plaintiff was entitled to judgment for one-half of said personal property, and one-half the income and profits thereof from the date of the death of deceased. Interlocutory judgment was rendered accordingly, and the defendant was ordered to account to plaintiff for said cash, personal property, and profits. A referee was appointed for the purpose of rendering such an account. It was further ordered that upon the filing of said referee's report final judgment in favor of plaintiff be entered for one-half of the value of said personal property and one-half of said income and cash, together with costs. From this judgment defendant appeals.

The first contention of the appellant is that the finding of the court that the transfer to him of the fixtures and stock of merchandise was a gift is not supported by the evidence. On this subject the evidence shows that this transfer was made by a written assignment dated January 31, 1920, and executed by John B. Scott less than three weeks before his death. The day preceding the transfer said Scott conveyed to the defendant a parcel of real property of the value of $20,000, and on the same day the defendant executed and delivered to Scott the following writing:

"Salinas, Cal., January 30, 1920.

"In consideration of a deed of conveyance this day made to me by John B. Scott I hereby agree that from and after the death of said John B. Scott I will pay towards the care and support of his wife, now confined in the asylum for the insane at Stockton, California, such amounts as from time to time may be fixed or required by the public authorities, and will likewise furnish her with necessary clothing.

"This obligation is to continue until the death of the said wife of John B. Scott, and is to bind my heirs, executors and administrators.

"In witness whereof," etc.

[1] The defendant undertook to testify that this agreement on his part was also the consideration for the transfer to him of the personal property; but in this connection he also testified that at the time of the execution and delivery of such assignment nothing was said, either by Scott or himself, with reference to it. It will be observed that the written agreement recites that the consideration therefore was the conveyance of the real estate made and delivered on the day of the execution and delivery of said agreement, and makes no mention of the transfer of the personal property. It is also significant that at the very time of its transfer to the defendant he was the holder of a note for $2,000 against Scott, which, notwithstanding said transfer and conveyance was not surrendered to the maker nor agreed to be regarded as paid, and at the time of the trial of this action was still retained by the defendant as an existing obligation against the estate of the deceased. In view of this state of the testimony we think the trial court was amply justified in concluding that the transfer of the personal property was not supported by any valuable consideration.

[2] As we have seen, the judgment awards to the plaintiff one-half the sum of $450, treating it as money given by the decedent to the defendant. The only testimony on this point, however, is that John B. Scott turned over this money to the defendant three or four weeks before his death for the purpose of paying bills against the drug store, and that it was used partly for that purpose and partly to defray the funeral expenses of the deceased. Under these circumstances, while it would be the duty of the defendant to account to the personal representatives of the deceased for this sum, we do not perceive how this fact entitles the plaintiff to a judgment against the defendant for one-half thereof. To this extent the judgment of the trial court is erroneous.

[3] The third contention of the appellant must also be sustained, namely, that the court erroneously made its judgment cover the fixtures in the drug store. The record is totally devoid of evidence as to when this particular property was acquired. It is admitted that the community existed from the year 1873 down to the death of the deceased. If these fixtures were acquired either before marriage or prior to the amendment of section 172 of the Civil Code, prohibiting gifts of community property without the wife's consent, a gift thereof was within the power of the husband without such consent. Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 349, 48 Pac. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170; Clavo v. Clavo, 10 Cal. App. 447, 449, 102 Pac. 556.

[4, 5] While it is well settled that property acquired by either party to a marriage other than by gift, bequest, devise, or descent is presumed to be community property, there is no presumption as to the time of such acquisition; and a wife makes no case for the setting aside of a gift by the husband of community property, unless she shows that it was acquired subsequent to the going into effect of said amendment.

[6, 7] The appellant's final contention is that the judgment in favor of plaintiff is incorrect in form, because it awards to her one-half of the community property in question free from the claims of creditors and the expenses of administration. This contention also we think to be correct. Section 1402 of the Civil Code provides that the share of the wife in the community property is equally subject to the debts, family allowance, and charges and expenses of administration. Although the court will at the instance of the wife set aside a voluntary conveyance by the husband of community property so far as it affects the interest therein to which she succeeds at his death, the right to have such relief does not free her moiety of the property from the burden imposed upon it by the provision of the Code cited. We think, therefore, that the court should have limited its judgment to declaring the plaintiff to be the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the property in question, subject in common with the remaining property of the estate to the payment of the debts of the decedent, the family allowance and expenses of administration. It is true that in the case of Dargie v. Patterson, 176 Cal. 716, 169 Pac. 360, the judgment in terms declared the wife to be the "owner of an undivided one-half interest in the property in question," without this qualifying clause; but in that case the evidence disclosed that such property was but a very small part of the estate, and that there remained ample property to meet such debts and expenses. That it was not intended by the opinion in that case to lay down the rule that the wife may recover her community interest freed from such burden we think is evident from other language used by the court in the same case, namely:

"The privilege of avoiding the gift is conferred upon her [the widow] as a means of protecting her interest in the community property. We see no reason why in assailing the gift she should enjoy greater rights than she would have had if the gift had never been made."

The respondent points out that in the case cited the widow was held to be entitled to recover an undivided one-half interest in certain property voluntarily conveyed by the husband "without regard to the amount or condition of the estate remaining in his hands at the time of his death," but the language quoted was used in disallowing a contention made in that case that the conveyance ought not to be set aside, since there was ample property in the estate from which the widow could recoup the loss of her community interest in the property conveyed, and had no reference to the condition of the estate with regard to debts and expenses of administration.

For the errors adverted to, we think the judgment should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

BOYD v. PENDEGAST et al. (Civ. 3888.)(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 28, 1922.)1. Officers ⇨77—Possession of office creates no vested property right in officers.

The possession of an office, or the enjoyment of employment with the government, or under any of its agencies, does not confer a vested property right of any quality whatsoever; the ancient offices to which the common law attached the property character of incorporeal hereditament finding no legal counterpart under the political systems of government in this country.

2. Constitutional law ⇨277(2)—Lack of due process of law not involved in removal from office.

Under whatever procedure is adopted to work the removal of a person from office, the constitutional question as to lack of due process of law cannot be involved.

3. Officers ⇨66—May be removed without cause.

Whether for cause, or without cause, when the removal of an officer is accomplished, after full compliance with the existing regulations affecting the matter, no ground is left on which to found any action against the removing power.

4. Officers ⇨70—Procedure on removal from office.

In the absence of regulations fixing the procedure for removal from office, the law defining the term may be looked to in deciding the question.

5. Officers ⇨50, 72(1)—Appointments during pleasure terminated at any time without notice.

Appointments to hold office during the pleasure of the appointing power may be terminated at any time and without notice.

6. Officers ⇨66, 72(1)—Appointments during good behavior terminated only for cause.

Appointments to office, "to continue during good behavior or for a fixed term of years," cannot be terminated, except for cause, and the office holder is entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard.

7. Officers ⇨66, 72(1)—Right to remove for cause permits removal without hearing.

A right to remove an officer "for cause," with no right of appeal or review, where the statute does not specify the particular causes, leaves the determination of the cause and its sufficiency to the removing power, which may act summarily and without according a hearing to the officer.

8. Municipal corporations ⇨185(4)—Police officers held entitled to hearing on application.

Los Angeles Charter, as amended in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 2107, art. 9, § 93), makes findings of police commissioners as to cause for removal of officer final and conclusive, regardless of any defect or deficiency in the evidence, but contemplates that a police officer, ordered to be suspended or removed, shall be accorded a hearing before the commissioners, if he applies for it within five days after the chief of police has given him notice of the order.

9. Municipal corporations ⇨185(4)—Notice of suspension by chief of police need not contain description of acts making delinquency charge.

Notice by chief of police of the city of Los Angeles to a police officer that he was suspended for "neglect of duty" was sufficient, without setting out the acts making up the delinquency charge; it being presumed that the commissioners, on request, would acquaint him with the details, under Los Angeles Charter, as amended in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 2107, art. 9, § 93).

10. Municipal corporations ⇨185(3)—Notice of suspension in effect a removal.

A police officer, removed from the force of the city of Los Angeles, cannot complain that the notice was only to the effect that he was suspended; the suspension, not stating the time for reinstatement, being in effect a removal, under Los Angeles Charter, as amended in 1911 (St. 1911, p. 2107, art. 9, § 93).

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Robert L. Hanley, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Appellant, having been removed from his position as a member of the police force of the city of Los Angeles, brought this proceeding in the superior court, asking that a writ be issued requiring defendants to certify for review the record of the proceedings had and evidence taken upon which the order of removal was made. A demurrer was interposed to the petition, and sustained. Judgment dismissing the proceeding followed. From that judgment petitioner has appealed.

By the demurrer of defendants several objections to the petition were urged, only one of which need be here considered. The general ground that sufficient facts were not stated to entitle petitioner to the writ sought presents questions which are determinative to this appeal.

The charter of the city of Los Angeles, as amended in 1911 (section 93, art. 9, p. 2107, Stats. 1911), makes provision for the appointment of police officers by the chief of police subject to the approval of the police commission and such civil service regulations as may be existent. It is then provided that:

"The chief of police shall have the power to suspend or remove any officer or employee in the police department; but no such suspension or removal shall be made except for cause, which shall be stated in writing and filed with said board, with certification that a copy of such statement has been served upon the person so suspended or removed, personally, or by leaving a copy thereof at his last known place of residence if he cannot be found. Upon such filing the suspension or removal shall take effect. Within fifteen days after such statement shall have been filed, the said board, upon its own motion may, or upon written application of the person so suspended or removed, filed with said board within five days after service upon him of such statement, as above provided, shall, proceed to investigate the grounds for such suspension or removal. If, in the case of a removal the said board, after such investigation, shall find in writing that the grounds stated were insufficient, or were not sustained, and also finds in writing that the person removed is a fit and suitable person to fill the position from which he was removed the said board shall reinstate him in such position; and if, in the case of a suspension the board, after such investigation, shall find in writing that the grounds stated were insufficient, or were not sustained, the said board shall restore the person so suspended to duty. The order of said board with respect to such suspension or removal shall be final and conclusive."

The petition of appellant, as filed herein, set forth that petitioner was served with a notice by the chief of police that he was suspended from his position for (as stated in the notice) "neglect of duty"; that within five days thereafter he applied for a hearing before the board of police commissioners. He alleged, further, that said board did not, nor did the chief of police, serve him with a statement of any specific charges and did not confront him with any witnesses; that the board, however, "permitted" petitioner to appear before it and relate "the history of his work in the police department for the many years that he had served as such member"; that the board on a later date made an order peremptorily removing petitioner from his position; and that the chief of police gave him written notice of the making of said order.

[1-3] The possession of an office, or the enjoyment of employment with the government, or under any of its agencies, does not confer a vested property right of any quality whatsoever. The more ancient offices to which the common law attached the property character of incorporeal hereditament find no legal counterpart under the political systems of government in this country. Connor v. City of New York, 5 N. Y. 285; Trimble v. Phelps, 19 Colo. 187, 34 Pac. 981, 41 Am. St. Rep. 236; Matter of Carter, 141 Cal. 316, 74 Pac. 997. It is not necessary here to consider whether, as between the office holder, and a stranger to the appointing power, there may be, in abstract contemplation, a qualified property right which may be subject to damage. In general, then, it follows necessarily that, under whatever procedure is adopted to work the removal of a person from office, the constitutional question, as to lack of due process of law, cannot be involved. Whether for cause or without cause, where the removal of an officer is accomplished after full compliance with existing regulations affecting the matter, no ground is left upon which to found any action against the removing power.

[4-7] In the absence of regulations fixing the procedure on removal from office, the law defining the term may be looked to in deciding the question. Appointments to hold during the pleasure of the appointing power may be terminated at any time and without notice; appointments to continue "during good behavior" or for a fixed term of years, cannot be terminated except for cause, and the authorities are generally to the effect that in the latter cases the office holder is entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard. Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) vol. 2, § 473; Mechem on Public Officers, p. 454; In the Matter of Carter, supra; Coleman v. Glenn, 103 Ga. 458, 30 S. E. 297, 68 Am. St. Rep. 608; Ex parte Hennen, 13 Pet. 227, 10 L. Ed. 138; Reagan v. U. S., 182 U. S. 419, 21 Sup. Ct. 842, 45 L. Ed. 1162. There are cases holding that the right to remove "for cause," with no right of appeal or review, where the statute does not specify the particular causes, leaves the determination of the cause and its sufficiency to the removing power, which may act summarily and without according a hearing to the officer. Trimble v. People, 19 Colo. 187, 34 Pac. 981, 41 Am. St. Rep. 236; People v. Martin, 19 Colo. 565, 36 Pac. 543, 24 L. R. A. 201. Observing the generally accepted rule, the question to be determined here is whether the procedure outlined by the charter provision was in the case of petitioner substantially followed. That provision makes the findings of the police commissioners final and conclusive, which means that such findings must be so accepted, regardless of any defect or deficiency in the evidence.

[8-10] However, it seems clear that it is contemplated that a police officer ordered to be suspended or removed shall be accorded a hearing before the commissioners, if he applies for it within five days after the chief of police has given him notice of the order. The provision does not in terms require that there be stated in the notice of the chief of police a description of the acts which make up the delinquency charged against the officer, although it will be presumed that, if an investigation is had, the commissioners will, upon request of the officer, acquaint him with such details. The manner in which the investigation is to be conducted and the class of evidence to be heard is left with the commission. It is imperative only that a hearing be accorded the officer upon his request, and that he be permitted to produce his evidence. The commission acts in a quasi judicial way (Speed v. Common Council, 98 Mich. 360, 57 N. W. 407, 22 L. R. A. 842, 39 Am. St. Rep. 555), and may be required by appropriate writ to accord a hearing to the person affected by a removal order. When such a hearing has been had, the decision, by the very terms of the charter, is placed beyond the reach of any review by the courts.

The petition in this case shows that the petitioner was permitted to appear before the commission and that he narrated a history of his work in the police department. There is no allegation in the petition of any request that a more particular statement of the charge against him be furnished, or that a demand was made that he be allowed to produce witnesses. It may well have been that the commission, upon petitioner's own statement, was satisfied that the order of suspension should stand. In the final notice given by the chief of police, advising petitioner that he was removed from his position, was contained the statement that there was attached a "copy of findings of police commission." Whatever the contents of these findings were, the petition does not show. The fact that the chief of police in his subsequent notice advised the petitioner that he was removed from his office, whereas the first notice advised him that he was suspended, is of no moment, for a suspension without a time stated for reinstatement, would be in effect a removal. Upon the petition, as it represented the facts of appellant's case, the ruling of the trial court was right.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LEW FAT. (Cr. 2400.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 6, 1922.)

1. Criminal law $\S$ 407(1)—Deceased's accusatory statements in defendant's presence properly admitted to show latter's acts and conduct on hearing them.

In a prosecution for murder, accusatory statements by deceased in the presence and hearing of defendant, who made no reply, were properly admitted, not as evidence of the truth of the facts stated, but to show defendant's acts and conduct on hearing such accusations.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1137(5)—Defendant cannot complain of refusal to strike hearsay testimony elicited by his own counsel by improper cross-examination.

In a prosecution for murder, where defendant's counsel, on cross-examination of a police officer, who had not testified in chief respecting defendant's membership in a Chinese tong, invited him to give a general dissertation on tongs before asking him whether defendant was a member of a particular tong, to which he replied that he had always understood him to be a member and was informed by an officer thereof that he had been expelled after the shooting, and, after a motion to strike out such testimony as hearsay was denied, persisted in pursuing such inquiries on the express assumption of defendant's membership therein, defendant could not complain of the court's refusal to strike out the testimony.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 730(8)—Refusal to direct jury to disregard state's attorney's remarks as to existence and location of bullet hole near place of homicide held not erroneous.

In a prosecution for murder, where a diagram showing a bullet hole, the existence of which defendant claimed was not shown, in or near a door of the room in which the shooting took place, was in evidence and being exhibited to the jury when objection was made to remarks relative to the fact and location thereof by the state's attorney and the jury had inspected the premises with particular regard to its location, the court did not err in refusing to direct the jury to disregard such remarks; defendant not being injuriously affected thereby.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 829(12)—Refusal to give instruction substantially covered by those given not erroneous.

In a prosecution for murder, where the court gave instructions in the usual and approved forms that defendant's guilt must be proved to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt and clearly and correctly charged as to the presumption of innocence, its refusal to give requested instructions with respect thereto in more diffuse and amplified forms was not error.

5. Homicide $\S$ 253(2)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

Evidence, though circumstantial, held sufficient to sustain a conviction of murder in the first degree.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Lew Fat was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

George R. Perkins and R. Porter Ashe, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., Stanislaus A. Riley, Asst. Dist. Atty., and Harry E. Michael, Special Prosecutor, all of San Francisco, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The appellant herein was convicted of murder in the first degree; his crime consisting in the alleged slaying of one Lum Bing, an elderly Chinese, in a building in Chinatown in the city and county of San Francisco, on the afternoon of May 18, 1921. He appeals from the judgment following such conviction and urges several grounds of error upon his said appeal.

[1] His first ground of alleged error is that the trial court erred in the admission of evidence of certain accusatory declarations made by the dying decedent in the presence of the arresting officers and of the defendant, and of the acts and conduct of the latter at the time such accusations were made. The first of these occurred within a few moments after the deceased had been shot and mortally wounded and after the defendant had been arrested within a short distance of the scene of the crime with a discharged and still smoking weapon in his hand. The arresting officer took the defendant into the presence of the wounded man, and he testified that when the latter saw the defendant he pointed his finger at him and said in the English language, "That man shot me," to which accusation the defendant made no reply. A short time thereafter, when the mortally wounded man had been taken to the harbor emergency hospital, the defendant and an alleged accomplice were again brought into his presence, and, when asked by one of the arresting officers who shot him, the dying man pointed at the defendant and said in English, "That was the man." To all of this evidence the defendant objected on the ground that it was not shown that the defendant understood the English language. He urges the same objection here, but the record before us does not sustain him in that regard. Prior to the introduction of the evidence thus objected to, a police officer had testified to having held conversations at various times with the defendant in English and to having received replies in that language. Another officer had also testified to numerous occasions in which he had spoken to the defendant in English and received replies from him in that language. There was also some testimony to the effect that during the trial of the cause the defendant and his attorney held conferences in the courtroom in the English language. This evidence brings the case fully within the rule laid down by this court in People v. Ong Mon Foo, 182 Cal. 697, wherein upon a much less satisfactory showing of a knowledge of the English language on the part of the defendant in that case this court held that the evidence of accusatory statements made by the deceased in the presence and hearing of the defendant were properly admitted in evidence for the limited purpose for which this class of evidence is admissible. It is to be noted that the trial court in its instructions to the jury herein carefully limited the purpose for which such evidence was admissible and was to be considered by the jury, viz. not as evidence of the truth of the facts stated in the accusation, but only for the purpose of showing the acts and conduct of the defendant in the presence of the accusation. The action of the trial court was not erroneous in the admission of this evidence for the purpose to which it was thus confined.

[2] The next contention of the appellant is that the trial court committed prejudicial error in refusing to strike out as hearsay certain evidence given by a police officer as to defendant's membership in the Suey Sing Tong. The evidence and ruling of the court thus assailed arose during the cross-examination of a police officer by counsel for the defendant, who asked the witness this question: "Q. Do you know whether this defendant is a member of the Suey Sing Tong?" It is to be noted that the witness who was asked this question had given no testimony upon his examination in chief respecting the defendant's membership in the Suey Sing Tong; his only reference to this particular society consisting in the statement that he had once seen the defendant in a building belonging to this society and had held some conversation with him there. It is thus evident that the question was not cross-examination, but was apparently an independent inquiry upon the part of the defendant's counsel for the purpose of learning what knowledge the witness had of the defendant's membership in this particular tong. The answer of the witness was:

"I have always understood him to be a member of the Suey Sing Tong and in fact I was informed by * * * Tom Wah, member of the Suey Sing Tong and also one of its officers, that following the shooting, this man [the defendant] was thrown out of the society."

The defendant's counsel moved to strike out this answer as hearsay, which, after some discussion, the court denied. Preceding this question and answer, the defendant's counsel had invited the witness to give a general dissertation as to what Chinese tongs were and as to the nature and qualities of their membership and their purposes in general. After the foregoing question had been asked and answered and said motion made and denied, the defendant's counsel persisted in pursuing these inquiries upon the express assumption of the defendant's membership in this particular tong. Under the foregoing circumstances, the entire inquiry of the defendant's counsel being an excursion outside the limits of cross-examination, and being in part predicated at least upon the assumption of the defendant's membership in this tong, we fail to see what basis of complaint he can have over this bit of hearsay evidence elicited on his own initiative and in the course of an inquiry which was not properly cross-examination, and which, in the main, called for information on the part of the witness which was in the nature of things chiefly hearsay.

[3] The next contention of the appellant is that the trial court was in error in its refusal to direct the jury to disregard certain remarks made by the deputy district attorney with respect to the fact and location of a certain bullet hole in or near a door of the room in which the shooting of the deceased had taken place, and in the drawing of certain inferences by him from the fact and location of the said bullet hole at said point. The appellant claims that there was no showing of the existence of any such bullet hole, but, in the colloquy which occurred between defendant's counsel and the court at the time of making the objection, it appeared that there was in evidence, and then being exhibited to the jury, a diagram of the premises upon which a bullet hole at the indicated point was shown, and it was upon this showing that the trial court allowed the deputy district attorney to proceed with his argument. The record also discloses that the jury had been taken to the premises and had inspected the same with particular regard to the location of the bullet hole. This being so, it is apparent that the defendant could not have been injuriously affected by any remarks or inferences which the prosecuting officer might indulge in with respect to a nonexistent bullet hole, if such were the fact. We see no error in the action of the trial court in refusing to give the requested direction to the jury.

[4] The appellant's next contention is that the trial court erred in its refusal to give certain instructions requested by the defendant. The first group of these instructions which the appellant insists should have been given undertake to set forth in various forms the familiar rule that the guilt of the defendant must be proved to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt. The reason assigned by the judge of the trial court for his refusal to give these instructions were that they had been given in substance elsewhere in the general body of his instructions. The record fully bears out this assertion as to each one of these instructions, showing them to have been framed and given in the usual and ordinary and approved forms of expression of the rule. The defendant was entitled to no more than this. The next group of his requested instructions which the defendant claims should have been given refer to the presumption of innocence to the benefit of which the defendant was entitled throughout his trial and up to the moment of the determination by the jury of his guilt or innocence. But an examination of the instructions which the court gave discloses that it covered the entire matter of these instructions with a clear, concise, and correct charge. It was not required to repeat the rule in the more diffuse and amplified form of the defendant's requested instructions.

[5] Finally, the appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, but as to this point the appellant concedes that the evidence is substantially conflicting as to the main circumstances of the case upon which the appellant's conviction rests. In view of the fact, however, that this is a capital case, we have carefully scrutinized the record and are entirely satisfied that the evidence sustains the verdict. Without attempting to review all of the facts elicited at the trial, a single set of circumstances may be adverted to as indicating the seriousness of the case against the defendant. The deceased, an aged and inoffensive Chinese, living with his wife in a building in San Francisco's Chinatown, and seldom leaving his own room except to go to another room in the same building to play with two little children who lived there, was going from or returning to his own room on the afternoon on the day of his murder, when he was shot six times through the body. At the report of these shots two police officers, who happened to be passing the building, rushed in and dashed up the stairs, at the top of which they met two Chinese, each with a revolver in his hand. One of these pointed his weapon at the approaching officers, who promptly knocked him down and arrested him. The other defendant, the defendant herein, threw away his still smoking revolver just before his arrest, which, being recovered, was found to be still hot and smoking, with all of its cartridges exploded, and which weapon was also found to be of the same caliber as that with which the deceased had been mortally wounded. When taken immediately into the presence of the victim he was identified by him as the man who had shot him, to which accusation he made no reply. There were many other circumstances tending to show the defendant's motive for the commission of the crime, while his explanations of his presence with a smoking revolver so near the place and moment of the homicide were neither probable nor convincing. The evidence, while circumstantial, was overwhelming as to the defendant's guilt of the crime. The judgment is affirmed.

NICOLAS HERNANDEZ & CO. v. W. T. WELISCH & CO. (S. F. 9941.)

1. Brokers ⇐66 — Under contract between broker in Porto Rico and broker in United States, former held entitled to share in commissions on sales made in United States.

Under a contract between plaintiff broker in Porto Rico and defendant broker in United States, plaintiff "to receive your share of the profits on all orders received directly or indirectly from your territory," plaintiff was entitled to its share of commissions earned by defendant on sales to the Porto Rico Food Commission, though the execution of the contracts on the part of such purchaser were made within the United States.

2. Brokers ⇐66—Brokers held to share equally in profits under contract.

Under a contract between two brokers dealing in rice, whereby one of them was to receive "five cents per pocket of 100 pounds, which is one-half of our profit, as soon as we receive same from the seller," held that the brokers intended that there should be an equal division of the commission where it amounted to less than 10 cents per pocket, the brokerage usually received.

Action by Nicolas Hernandez & Co. against W. T. Welisch & Co. From a judgment for part of the relief demanded, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Percy E. Towne, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. We approve the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal in this case that, under the contract made between the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff's share of the profits on orders received directly or indirectly from the island of Porto Rico was not to be more than one-half of the amount of commissions or profits received by the defendant. In making the calculation, however, the District Court included, as a part of the profits, the sum of $650, being 6½ cents per pocket on 100 pounds on the sale of 10,000 pockets made on June 15, 1918. It appears from the findings that the defendant did not receive $650, either as commissions or as profits, on that sale, but received only one-half thereof; that is, $325. The result is that the computation made by the District Court of Appeal allows the plaintiff $162.50 in excess of the amount it is entitled to. The opinion stated that the amount shown by the findings as due to the plaintiff was $3,325; that being one-half of the total sum of $6,650. It should have stated that the amount for which the plaintiff was entitled to judgment was the sum of $3,162.50, being one-half of $6,325, which the findings show to be the total amount received by defendant, and that he was entitled to interest on $2,000 thereof at 7 per cent. per annum from May 10, 1918, and interest on the balance from the date of the commencement of the action. With this modification, the opinion of the District Court is adopted. Excepting the last paragraph thereof, which, as above stated, we find erroneous, the remainder of the opinion is as follows:

"This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in its favor in the sum of $2,420; its contention being that the judgment should have been for a greater sum.

"Both the plaintiff and the defendant are rice brokers; the former doing business in the island of Porto Rico, and the latter in San Francisco, Cal. They entered into a written contract by which the plaintiff agreed to conduct in Porto Rico a branch office of and for the defendant, the contract being in the form of a letter addressed by the defendant to the plaintiff, the terms of which the latter accepted. Among the provisions of said contract were the following:

"Division of profits. On all sales confirmed by us we will allow you 5 cents per pocket of 100 pounds, which is one-half of our profit, as soon as we receive same from seller.

"Exclusive arrangement. It is agreed that you will not offer rice from any other source than ours with the present exception of Southern rice (La. Tex. Ark.). * * * We, in turn will not offer rice in your territory (hereinafter described) excepting through you. You to receive your share of the profits on all orders received directly or indirectly from your territory.

"Territory. Your territory will be the entire island of Porto Rico."

"According to the findings of the court the defendant during the existence of this contract, as broker, sold to the 'Porto Rico Food Commission, of San Juan, Porto Rico,' four several lots of rice, namely, 40,000 pockets on November 2, 1917, two lots of 20,000 pockets each on April 22, 1918, and 10,000 pockets on June 15, 1918, and received as brokerage on such sales a total sum of $6,650, being $2,000 on each of the three lots first enumerated, and $650 upon the last. It credited the account of plaintiff with one-half the brokerage so received upon the second and third of said lots, which it claims to have done by error, and refused to pay the plaintiff either the amount so credited or any part of the brokerage received upon the remaining two lots. The court also found that the contracts for the sale of said four lots of rice were made and executed by the seller and an officer of said Porto Rico Food Commission, of San Juan, Porto Rico, within the borders of the United States, and were negotiated by defendant without assistance from the plaintiff.

"As a conclusion of law from the facts so found the trial court decreed that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for $2,000, with interest thereon from the 10th day of May, 1918—the date upon which the defendant had credited the plaintiff's account with said sum, and judgment was accordingly entered. Thereafter the plaintiff moved to set aside and vacate said judgment, and for an order entering another and different judgment, upon the ground that the conclusions of law upon which it was entered were not consistent with and not supported by the findings of fact. This motion was denied, and the sole question on this appeal is whether the judgment entered was correct in view of the court's finding as to the facts in the case.

[1] "It seems clear to us that the four sales above referred to come within the terms of the contract. They were made to the 'Porto Rico Food Commission, of San Juan, Porto Rico'; and although the execution of the contracts on the part of said purchaser was made within the territory of the United States by one of its officers, the provision of the contract giving to the plaintiff the right to share with the defendant 'the profits on all orders received directly or indirectly' from its territory would seem to be designed to cover a sale made under these circumstances. That this is the true construction of the contract is strongly suggested by the action of the defendant in crediting the account of the plaintiff with one-half the brokerage on two of these sales, and the fact that it afterwards changed its mind would not affect the plaintiff's right. And in any event these four sales having been made under precisely similar conditions, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover upon two of them (as the court found), its right to recover upon the remaining two cannot be denied.

[2] "The appellant contends that it should have judgment at the rate of 5 cents per pocket upon the 90,000 pockets forming the aggregate of the sales in question; but we think that, reading the contract as a whole, the plaintiff's share was limited to one-half the amount received by the defendant. The language is, 'We will allow you 5 cents per pocket of 100 pounds, which is one-half of our profit as soon as we receive same from the seller; and in the next paragraph, 'You to receive your share of the profits on all orders received directly or indirectly from your territory.' Upon one of such sales the defendant's commission only amounted to 5 cents, and upon another one of them to only 6½ cents per pocket. The brokerage usually received by the defendant was 10 cents, and it was doubtless expected that most of the transactions between the parties would be governed by this figure; but the statement that 5 cents was one-half the brokerage, construed with the later provision of the contract giving to the plaintiff the right to share with the defendant brokerage upon sales coming indirectly from the plaintiff's territory, sufficiently indicates that the plaintiff's share could not be more than one-half the amount received by the defendant."

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter judgment in accordance with this opinion.

BARNES et al. v. FOLEY. (L. A. 7222.)

1. Appeal and error — 345(1)—Premature notice of motion for a new trial after verdict, but before findings, does not extend time for appeal.

Where the trial embraced several issues, some of which were tried by the court and some by a jury, a notice of intention to move for a new trial, served and filed after the verdict on the issues submitted to the jury, but before the decision on the issues tried by the court, is premature, and does not prolong the time for appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 939, giving 30 days after the termination of a motion for a new trial within which to appeal.

2. New trial — 153—Statute, requiring notice within 10 days after verdict, applies only where all issues are determined by a jury.

In the amendment of Code Civ. Proc. § 659, by the Act of 1915, the phrase "within ten days after verdict if the trial was by a jury" refers to cases where all the issues were submitted to the jury, and does not apply where a part of them were tried by the jury and the rest by the court.

Walter E. Barry and Barry & McReynolds, all of Ventura, for appellant.

F. E. Borton, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

SHAW, C. J. The plaintiffs move the court to dismiss the appeal taken by the defendant from the judgment in this action upon the ground that the appeal was not taken within the time allowed by law. The complaint states a cause of action to enjoin trespasses by the defendant upon land of the plaintiffs, and to recover damages caused by trespasses already committed. A trial by jury of the issues as to damages was demanded by the defendant. A jury was impaneled to try that issue, and on September 29, 1921, a verdict was returned thereon. The court proceeded with the trial of the cause of action for injunction, and on October 26, 1921, filed findings and rendered judgment granting the injunction and for the recovery of damages. The judgment was entered on that day. Notice of the judgment was served on the defendant on the following day, October 27, 1921.

[1] On October 8, 1921, which was after the rendition of the verdict, but before the filing of the findings and the entry of judgment thereon, the defendant filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial. On December 27, 1921, the court below made an order denying the motion for a new trial. The notice of appeal was filed on January 4, 1922, stating that the defendant appeals from the judgment rendered against him on October 26, 1921. Where the motion embraces several issues, some of which are tried by the court and some by a jury, a notice of intention to move for a new trial, served and filed after the verdict on the issues submitted to the jury, but before the decision on the issues tried by the court, is premature, and gives "to the court no power to act upon the motion which should thereafter be made under the notice." Reclamation District v. Thisby, 131 Cal. 574, 63 Pac. 918. See, also, Bell v. Marsh, 80 Cal. 414, 22 Pac. 170; Warring v. Freear, 64 Cal. 56, 28 Pac. 115; Bates v. Gage, 49 Cal. 126.

[2] The language of the amendment of 1915 to section 659 did not change this rule. The phrase "within ten days after verdict, if the trial was by jury," inserted by that amendment, refers to cases where all the issues joined in the action are submitted to a jury, and does not apply where only a part of such issues are tried by the jury. This proposition was elaborately discussed and determined by the District Court of Appeal in San Joaquin, etc., Co. v. Stevinson, 30 Cal. App. 405, 158 Pac. 768, and was approved by the Supreme Court by denying a petition for rehearing thereof.

The consequence is that the notice of intention in this case did not constitute a valid proceeding for new trial sufficient to prolong the time for appeal under the provisions of section 939, Code of Civil Procedure, giving 30 days' time after the termination of the motion for new trial within which to appeal. The appeal, taken more than 60 days after October 26, 1921, the date of the entry of the judgment, was therefore too late.

The appeal is dismissed.

STEIN v. LACASSIE. (S. F. 9544.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 12, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error §1002—Verdict on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Where the evidence was conflicting as to many of the essential features of the case, and a verdict either way would find a substantial support therein, the Supreme Court cannot disturb the verdict because of the insufficiency of the evidence, even though it might conclude that the evidence preponderates against it.

2. Appeal and error §1031(1)—Verdict apparently against evidence requires careful scrutiny for error.

Where the evidence apparently preponderates against the verdict, it is the duty of the Supreme Court carefully to scrutinize the rulings and instructions of the trial court in matters of law, to determine whether any errors alleged to have occurred therein had prejudicial influence upon the verdict.

3. Trial §253(3)—Instruction defining lack of probable cause regardless of facts known held erroneous.

In an action for malicious prosecution, an instruction that, if the proceedings against plaintiff were instituted by defendant over a fixed and malicious determination of her own, and not from the advice of counsel, or that she did not communicate a fair statement of all facts known to her to the sheriff and district attorney, and that the district attorney did not advise her there was probable cause, such conduct would constitute lack of probable cause, was erroneous as excluding probable cause which defendant herself might have had, regardless of the advice of others, to institute the proceedings.

4. Trial §296(2)—Short erroneous instruction held not cured by long, complicated one.

A short, erroneous instruction, requiring the jury to find lack of probable cause, though facts known to defendant might have amounted to probable cause, was not cured by a later instruction reviewing the evidence from defendant's point of view, which was much involved in detail and concluded with a direction to find for defendant if they found the facts as therein stated.

5. Malicious prosecution §72(1)—Instruction on motive held erroneous.

Where the trial court had correctly instructed the jury that malicious prosecution involved both the elements of malice and want of probable cause, an instruction that the prosecution of a person with any other motive than to bring the guilty person to justice is ~~in~~ law a malicious prosecution was erroneous as implying that the presence of another motive was sufficient to establish want of probable cause, as well as malice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Action for malicious prosecution by Lorenz Stein against Mary E. Lacassie. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Chas. E. Snook, and Snook & Brown, all of Oakland (F. P. Tuttle, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant.

J. E. Rodgers and A. F. Bray, both of Martinez, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action to recover damages for alleged malicious prosecution. The cause was tried before a jury. The evidence in the case may be briefly summarized as follows: During the year 1918, and for some time prior thereto, the plaintiff and the defendant lived upon adjoining ranches near Walnut Creek, in the county of Contra Costa. Plaintiff was of German extraction, but was a naturalized citizen of the United States. The defendant's husband was of French extraction. She had herself never met the plaintiff, and the evidence is in dispute as to whether there had been prior instances of discord between the two families. On April 23, 1918, the dead body of a horse belonging to the defendant was found by her in an inclosure adjoining the land of the plaintiff. The animal had been last seen alive two days before and was then in good health. Upon the discovery of the death of the horse the defendant sent for a veterinary surgeon, who, on the following day, came to the defendant's premises and examined the body of the animal, cutting it open and finding the intestines punctured, and finding also other evidences of corrosive poisoning, he concluded that the death of the animal had been caused by phosphorus poisoning, and so informed the husband of the defendant, who, in turn, told her. In the colon of the animal the veterinarian also found a dark green substance similar to filaree or clover. On the following day the veterinarian informed Sheriff Veale and his son, who was his undersheriff, that the horse had been poisoned by phosphorus, and stated his reasons for this conclusion. The defendant and her husband tracked the animal to a point near the line fence of the plaintiff and noticed that certain strands of wire upon said fence were broken near the point where the tracks of the animal were to be seen.

On April 25, 1918, the undersheriff and a deputy sheriff came to the defendant's premises and examined the dead animal and were informed by the defendant that the horse had been traced to a point near the line fence and had been poisoned with phosphorus, and that she thought that the plaintiff might have poisoned the horse. The two officials then made an examination of the carcass, which led them to believe and state that the horse had been poisoned with phosphorus. They also noticed the dark green substance in the colon of the animal, which had the appearance of chopped alfalfa. The officials then went over to the premises of the plaintiff, where they saw some alfalfa in a pig pen similar to that found in the stomach of the horse. They then interviewed the plaintiff, who made some conflicting statements as to his possession of phosphorus and also as to his knowledge of the fact that the horse of Lacassie was dead. During this interview with the plaintiff, the undersheriff told him that he believed he had poisoned Lacassie's horse with phosphorus, and upon his return to the Lacassie premises this official informed the defendant as to what he had found upon the plaintiff's premises and of the fact that he believed and had stated that the plaintiff had knowledge of the poisoning of the horse. The defendant, upon learning these facts, desired to have the plaintiff arrested, but the undersheriff informed her that it would be necessary for her to swear to a complaint and that she had better go to Martinez on the next day and confer with the district attorney and her own attorney regarding the matter. He also, on the same evening, informed the district attorney of his discoveries and belief. On the following day the sheriff, the undersheriff, and a deputy sheriff went to the Lacassie ranch, and on their way thither met the defendant and her husband coming to Martinez to swear to a complaint, but the undersheriff advised the defendant that she had better wait for a chemist's report before swearing to a complaint. On April 29, 1918, several samples from the body of the horse were submitted to a chemist, who, some three weeks later, made a report which was rather negative upon the question of the existence of alfalfa or of signs of phosphorus in the exhibit submitted to him as coming from the body of the dead animal. During the intervening period some correspondence passed between the undersheriff and the defendant, the latter complaining of the tardiness of the chemist's report, and after it arrived declined to swear to a complaint in the face of its negative finding.

On June 10, 1918, matters were brought to a crisis by the discovery of a cow of the defendant lying dead within the premises of the plaintiff, its death having been caused by violence inflicted upon it in some manner. Upon learning of the death of her cow the defendant again called in the veterinarian, who examined its body. She also sent for the undersheriff, who looked over the body of the cow and interviewed the plaintiff as to his knowledge of the cause of its death, and after doing so advised the defendant to go to Martinez and lay the facts before the district attorney. She went to the county seat and had an interview with the district attorney, who offered to draw a complaint for her to sign. She had an angry dispute with the undersheriff over some of the facts in the case, and finally left the office of the district attorney without signing the complaint, but later returned and had a further interview with the district attorney, who told her that if she wanted to swear to a complaint he would draw it up, but it would be difficult to get a conviction. The complaint was finally drawn in the district attorney's office; whereupon the undersheriff, the defendant, and her husband went to the office of a justice of the peace, where the complaint was sworn to and filed, and a warrant for the arrest of the plaintiff upon the charge of poisoning the defendant's horse was issued. The plaintiff was arrested thereon and put to trial, when he was acquitted of the charge. Thereupon he commenced this action.

[1-3] The foregoing is merely a summary of certain salient facts of the case. There is much other evidence bearing upon the defendant's mental attitude toward the plaintiff herein and her good faith in instituting the proceedings against him. The evidence was conflicting as to many of the essential features of the case. It is one of those cases wherein the verdict of the jury either way would find substantial support in the evidence. This being so, it is not the province of this court to usurp the function of the jury in cases of this character. Runo v. Williams, 162 Cal. 449, 122 Pac. 1082. We cannot, therefore, uphold the appellant's contention that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, even though we might be disposed to conclude from a review of the record that the evidence preponderates in the appellant's favor. In such a case, however, it becomes the duty of this court to carefully scrutinize the rulings and instructions of the trial court upon matters of law in order to determine whether any errors alleged to have occurred therein had a prejudicial influence upon the verdict. The trial court, at the plaintiff's request, gave the following instruction:

"You are instructed that if you find from the evidence in this case that the criminal proceedings against plaintiff were instituted by defendant over a fixed and malicious determination of her own, and not from the advice of counsel, or that she did not communicate a full, fair and true statement of all the facts known to her to the sheriff and the district attorney, and that the district attorney did not advise her there was probable cause for the arrest, then such would constitute lack of probable cause."

[4] It would seem to require no argument to show that this instruction is erroneous, and is prejudicially so, since it might well be that the defendant herself might have had abundant cause for insisting upon and procuring the plaintiff's arrest upon the charge of having poisoned her horse, even though, in so doing, she was acting upon a fixed and malicious determination of her own and without the advice of counsel; and even though she had not communicated all of the facts known to her to the sheriff and district attorney, or made a full, fair, and true statement of the facts to these officials; and even though the district attorney had not advised her that there was probable cause for the plaintiff's arrest. Nor do we find that this error has been corrected in any other or later instruction. There is a later instruction in which the trial court makes a review of the evidence in the case from the defendant's point of view. It occupies several pages of the record, is much involved in detail, and concludes with the direction to the jury that, if they shall find all of its asserted facts to be true, they should find a verdict for the defendant. But this instruction cannot be held to have removed the sting of the former instruction wherein the court had already erroneously charged the jury that, upon a few facts clearly and tersely stated, they were bound to find that the defendant had acted without probable cause in bringing about the plaintiff's arrest.

[5] The trial court wandered further in the path of error in giving the following instruction:

"You are instructed that the prosecution of a person with any other motive than to bring the guilty person to justice is in law a malicious prosecution."

The chief vice of this instruction consists in its use of the term "malicious prosecution," since this term has in law a technical meaning, embracing the twofold elements of malice and want of probable cause. The court had already, in substance, charged the jury that both of these elements must be found by the jury to exist before it could render a verdict in the plaintiff's favor; yet, in the instruction last above quoted, the jury is told in plain terms that the prosecution of a person with any other motive than to bring the guilty person to justice is sufficient in itself to constitute, in point of law, a malicious prosecution; or, in other words, to furnish sufficient proof of both of the foregoing elements to justify a verdict in the plaintiff's favor. It cannot with reason be contended that instructions such as these, so obviously erroneous, and yet so tersely put as to be easily comprehensible by the jury, were not prejudicial, or that the verdict of the jury, in a close case like this, would not be injuriously affected thereby. In the case of Runo v. Williams, supra, this court has stated:

"The law is clearly and definitely settled how a jury shall be instructed in the cases of this character. Grant v. Moore, 29 Cal. 644; Harkrader v. Moore, 44 Cal. 144; Eastin v. Bank of Stockton, 66 Cal. 123, 4 Pac. 1106, 56 Am. Rep. 77; Fulton v. Onesti, 66 Cal. 575, 6 Pac. 491; Ball v. Rawles, 93 Cal. 222, 28 Pac. 937, 27 Am. St. Rep. 174; Smith v. Liverpool Ins. Co., 107 Cal. 433, 40 Pac. 540; Scrivani v. Dondero, 128 Cal. 31, 60 Pac. 463."

To this list of cases may be added the recent decisions of this court in Burke v. Watts, 204 Pac. 578, and Michel v. Smith, 205 Pac. 113.

Since this case must go back for a new trial, the parties and the court should have no difficulty whatever, in the light of the foregoing authorities, in formulating and giving to the jury clear and definite instructions governing their duties in considering their verdict.

The judgment is reversed.

SILVA v. SILVA et al. (S. F. 9831.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1922.)

1. Husband and wife $\S$ 272(5)—Husband cannot avoid property settlement in absence of fraud or mutual mistake.

A husband cannot avoid property settlement with wife in the absence of a showing of fraud or mutual mistake.

2. Husband and wife $\S$ 272(5)—That wife realized on notes more than valuation placed thereon in making settlement not ground for setting aside of settlement.

Where husband, in making property settlement with wife, agreed to accept specified sum in cash, leaving the wife what was left, including certain notes, the mere fact that the wife realized on the notes more than it was thought that she would realize at the time the settlement was entered into was not ground for setting aside of the agreement in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation.

3. Husband and wife $\S$ 272(5)—Sums withdrawn from mutual bank accounts by wife without husband's consent held not ground for setting aside of property settlement.

Husband could not avoid a property settlement made with wife on the ground of withdrawals previously made by the wife from the mutual bank accounts without the husband's knowledge or consent, in the absence of a showing that the amount so withdrawn was not used for community purposes or that the withdrawals were not considered by the parties in making the settlement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Action by Joseph Silva against Mary Ann Silva and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James P. Montgomery, of Oakland (George F. Sharp, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant.

F. L. De Freitas and John L. McVey, both of Oakland, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. Plaintiff brought this action for an accounting and to recover from defendants, his wife and stepson, money which he claimed was wrongfully and fraudulently withheld from him in a settlement previously had between plaintiff and his wife. Judgment was for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

The trial court found that in the settlement referred to property affairs of the marital community were determined and adjusted by mutual agreement between the parties, and that the plaintiff had entered into such agreement voluntarily and with full knowledge of all the facts and uninfluenced by fraud or mistake, and that such settlement was final and conclusive as to plaintiff's rights.

The property consisted of bank accounts and certain notes and mortgages aggregating in value about $9,000 or $10,000. This property was the accumulation of the earnings of plaintiff and his wife during a period of 30 years of married life, mostly from the wages and earnings of plaintiff. The deposits of earnings were made in bank in the joint names of plaintiff and his wife, but, the plaintiff being constantly employed and unable to read or write, the management of the account was left to the wife and the defendant Manuel J. Silva, her son by a former marriage, and all deposits and withdrawals were made by the wife.

Some differences having arisen between the parties over the management of the property, the plaintiff demanded a division and employed a lawyer to represent him in effecting such settlement.

All the parties met at the lawyer's office. The plaintiff at that time, though without any definite knowledge or information on the subject, estimated the whole amount of deposits and loans at a value of $12,000, and proposed an equal division. The wife objected to an equal division and threatened to obtain a divorce if she did not receive more than half. A basis of settlement was finally agreed to by which the plaintiff received as his share $4,574.36 in money, and his wife received a small balance in money and the notes and mortgages, amounting at their face value to $4,700.

It does not appear either from the findings or the evidence at what actual valuation the notes were estimated in the settlement, or what amount of cash the wife received in addition to the notes, but the court finds that the share of the wife amounted to from $150 to $200 more than the $4,574.36 received by plaintiff, which would make her portion of a valuation of $4,724 or $4,774. Plaintiff himself only claims that the wife's share exceeded his own by $500.

There is testimony in the record that the plaintiff on the recommendation of his attorney agreed to making his wife's share from $150 to $200 more than his own, and it is a fair inference that the notes were put in at a figure which would give such result in the settlement. At their full face value it is claimed that Mrs. Silva received $502.-64 excess. It is a reasonable assumption that in taking notes instead of money, with the risk attending upon converting them into cash, that they were estimated at something less than their face in the settlement, and there was testimony that the plaintiff expressed a preference for cash as his share in the division. At any rate, the plaintiff, with the counsel of his attorney who was present and advising him, accepted the $4,574.26 in cash as his share, and turned over the balance of the property to his wife in full satisfaction of their respective claims. There can be no question from all the evidence in the case but that this division was intended to vest a separate property in each to the amount agreed upon.

[1] Plaintiff cannot go back of this settlement in the absence of a showing of fraud or mutual mistake. There are only two averments in his alleged cause of action which give any color to such a showing, and the findings, supported by the evidence, are against plaintiff on both of these. He claims that he was induced to make this settlement by the understanding that his wife was to receive only $150 or $200 more than he. That was not, however, the basis of the division. The division was made by plaintiff accepting $4,574.26 in cash and turning over to his wife what was left, and it must be presumed that the notes were included on a valuation which brought their shares to the proportion agreed upon. All of the money and property was before them, and the final terms of settlement were that plaintiff took the agreed sum of money and his wife took what was left. There is nothing to indicate that it was not at the time, and in view of the values before them and the agreed excess in the wife's favor, a fair settlement.

[2] The finding by the trial court that the wife's share exceeded that of the plaintiff by only $150 or $200, even if not supported by the evidence, cannot affect the judgment, because the division was made upon a valuation fixed by the parties at the time the division was made, and the circumstance that Mrs. Silva realized $200 or $300 more than was estimated cannot defeat the settlement, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation, and there is no evidence of any.

[3] The other point of appellant's contention is that prior to the date of the division Mrs. Silva had drawn from the mutual bank accounts sums aggregating $2,872.06 without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, that plaintiff was ignorant as to the amount of the deposits, and that the settlement made with Mrs. Silva did not include or take into account any of these withdrawals, and it is the claim of plaintiff that the defendants had wrongfully and fraudulently appropriated these sums to their own use.

The bank books introduced in evidence disclose the fact that such withdrawals had been made from this mutual deposit account by Mrs. Silva from time to time as follows: January 10, 1908, $100; February 12, 1908, $422.06; July 29, 1910, $1,100; March 13, 1913, $600; October 1, 1913, $650.

The settlement and division of property between plaintiff and his wife was on or about July 30, 1914. Plaintiff testifies that he had no knowledge or notice of the withdrawal of these items and received no part of the money. It is conceded that the handling of all the community earnings was during all the period covered by these transactions intrusted to the wife, who evidently paid therefrom the household expenses, deposited the savings, and drew upon the account in her own name. While there is no explicit evidence accounting for the disposition of the amounts checked out of this account, there is evidence that loans of money from the community funds were made from time to time, some of them corresponding closely with the dates of the larger withdrawal. There was, indeed, no source disclosed other than the community savings from which the several thousands of dollars represented by the notes which were allotted to Mrs. Silva in the settlement could have been derived. Mrs. Silva was legally the custodian and dispenser of these funds, and there is not the slightest evidence in the record of any appropriation or application of any money to other than community debts and investments, and there is no ground for presumption or inference of any such misappropriation.

The finding of the trial court is that it is not true that any of these amounts "were withdrawn from deposit in the bank by either said defendant, Mary Ann Silva, or Manuel J. Silva, in fraud or wrong of plaintiff."

Moreover, it is not shown in evidence that all these items were not considered by the parties in the settlement. It is true that the plaintiff is unlettered and lacking in business acumen, and he testifies that the fact of these withdrawals was not known to him at the time the division was made, but he was at the time represented by a competent and trustworthy lawyer. This attorney, when asked on the trial if at the time of the settlement the plaintiff was informed as to the withdrawals from the bank account, answered:

"Not in detail, but I think the total amounts, whatever the books show, were known at the time. Of course, we went to the bank."

With the books and accounts before them it must be presumed that the agreement arrived at took into consideration all that was there disclosed.

Considering the apparent ignorance and incompetence of the plaintiff, we have not confined ourselves in reviewing this matter to the portions of the evidence set out in the synopsis of the briefs, but have carefully read the entire typewritten record on appeal, and have been unable to discover anything to indicate that the settlement between the parties was not the result of "open covenants openly arrived at."

Indeed, it is difficult to conceive how the community property, under the plaintiff's own testimony that the entire income of this couple during the 30 years of its accumulation, derived from plaintiff's meager earnings of but $60 per month during most of the time, and after deducting their necessary household expenses, could have amounted to the respectable sum of $10,000.

There is no ground for doubting that Mrs. Silva was a frugal and careful steward of the family affairs, and that the defendant Manuel Silva acted the part of a dutiful son to both his mother and stepfather.

It is an interesting circumstance that, in the face of the years of litigation that has attended these differences over property affairs, the plaintiff and Mrs. Silva have continued to live together in the same house as man and wife.

The judgment is affirmed.

WAER v. WAER et al. (L. A. 6727.)

1. Evidence ☞597—Positive testimony of grantor he did not deliver deed supports finding against delivery.

Positive testimony by the grantor that, after executing the deed, he did not deliver it, but retained it and placed it in a drawer from which it was surreptitiously taken by one of the grantees, is not a mere general statement or assertion, and is sufficient to support a finding against delivery, notwithstanding conflicting evidence on the part of the grantees that it was delivered.

2. Appeal and error ☞1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence not set aside, though appellate court would have found otherwise.

A judgment may not be reversed for insufficiency of evidence, when the evidence is in conflict, though it may seem to be against the weight of the evidence, and the Supreme Court, if sitting in place of the trial judge, might have found the facts differently.

3. New trial ☞105—Impeaching evidence newly discovered does not require new trial.

In so far as the evidence set forth in an affidavit in support of a motion for a new trial merely narrated a statement of plaintiff inconsistent with his testimony at the trial, it was impeaching in its character and insufficient to require the granting of a new trial.

4. New trial ☞104(1)—Affidavit of new evidence as to declarations of plaintiff not inconsistent with testimony does not require new trial.

An affidavit setting forth newly discovered evidence which, except in so far as it consisted of statements by plaintiff inconsistent with his testimony, consisted of declarations by him corroborating his testimony, does not require the granting of a new trial.

5. New trial ☞105—Affidavit as to admission of party against interest is not impeaching.

An affidavit setting forth as newly discovered evidence an admission by plaintiff that he had deeded his property, is not merely impeaching evidence, since such an admission would be competent as a declaration against plaintiff's interest under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, even though plaintiff had not been a witness in his own behalf.

6. Appeal and error ☞981—Sufficiency of evidence to require new trial is within trial court's discretion.

Even though the newly discovered evidence on which a motion for a new trial was based was not solely impeaching or cumulative as additional evidence of the same character to the same point, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1838, its efficacy to change the result is a question peculiarly addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and the exercise of that discretion will not be disturbed except in case of manifest abuse.

7. New trial ☞151—Affidavits as to newly discovered evidence can be controverted.

Not only is the introduction of counter affidavits proper upon the hearing of a motion for a new trial for newly discovered evidence, but the truth of the evidence itself, as well as the weight thereof and the credibility of the witnesses may be contested by such counter affidavits.

8. New trial ☞151—Denial for new evidence contradicted by controverting evidence held not abuse of discretion.

Where the affidavit in support of a motion for new trial, setting forth an admission by plaintiff contrary to his interest was denied by plaintiff's controverting affidavits, the trial court's decision in favor of the credibility of plaintiff's affidavit was not a manifest abuse of his discretion, so as to require reversal of his denial of the new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Robert Waer against Charles R. Waer and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Manning & Thompson, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Walters & Anderson, of Los Angeles, Moore & Woods, of Whittier, Walters & Mauk, of Los Angeles, and A. Moore, of Whittier, for respondent.

LENNON, J. The plaintiff in this action sought and secured a judgment quieting his title as against the defendants to certain real property, and annulling a recorded deed thereto, which purported to convey title therein to the defendants and to have been made and delivered by plaintiff to the defendants. Briefly stated, the facts of the case are these: The plaintiff, an elderly widower with several children, contemplating matrimony, made and signed a deed, giving to his children, the defendants herein, the title to the property in suit, reserving, however, to himself a life estate therein.

Plaintiff admitted that he had made the deed in question, but testified, as a witness in his own behalf, that he did not at any time deliver the same to the defendants, or any of them, and that, after making the deed, he placed it in a bureau drawer in his home from which it was surreptitiously taken by one of the defendants and recorded without his knowledge and consent. The defendants, on the other hand, claimed, and one of them testified, that the plaintiff had delivered the deed to the defendants a short time after its making. The trial court found that the deed had never been delivered and the controversy here involves in part the question as to whether or not the evidence adduced upon the whole case is sufficient to support this finding.

[1] Apparently the finding of the trial court was made and based upon the testimony of the plaintiff concerning the making of the deed, coupled with evidence of the circumstances preceding, attending, and following its making. The testimony of the plaintiff consists of much more than "mere general statements or assertions" and, taken as a whole, sufficiently supports the finding. Much may be said argumentatively against the persuasiveness of the plaintiff's testimony, but, after all has thus been said, there still remains a conflict in the evidence adduced upon the whole case, which cannot be dissipated by arguments which do no more than weigh the evidence upon which the findings in question rest, and assail the credibility of the witness giving such testimony.

[2] It is the well-settled and generally well-understood rule that a judgment may not be reversed for insufficiency of evidence when the evidence adduced upon the whole case is in conflict and that, upon appeal with the evidence in that situation, no inquiry may be made concerning the preponderance of the evidence. The fact that a judgment may seem to this court to be against the weight of the evidence and that this court, if sitting in the place of the trial judge, might have found the facts different, will not avail to obviate the application and operation of the rule. Webster v. Lowe, 177 Cal. 385, 170 Pac. 850; Levi v. Chesley, 178 Cal. 145, 172 Pac. 607; Ross' Estate, 171 Cal. 64, 151 Pac. 1138; Lick v. Madden, 36 Cal. 208, 213, 95 Am. Dec. 175; Heinlen v. Heilbron, 97 Cal. 101, 31 Pac. 838; Meyer v. Great Western Ins. Co., 104 Cal. 381, 28 Pac. 82. In the face of a substantial conflict in the evidence, in the instant case, the trial court's finding of nondelivery of the deed in controversy will not be disturbed.

[3, 4] In support of a motion for a new trial grounded, in part, upon alleged newly discovered evidence, the defendants presented in evidence upon the hearing of the motion an affidavit of one Flora Smith, which alleged that in January, 1920, after the controversy over the deed had arisen, in a conversation with her concerning the loss of the deed, the plaintiff said that "it was taken out of his possession, that four or five days after the deed was executed he discovered the deed was gone, that Elva (meaning defendant Elva Luella Smith) had seen the deed and notified Charles Waer (one of the defendants) and they had concocted to steal it and had stolen it." It was an admitted fact in the case that the deed in question had been made and signed by plaintiff on or about May 10, 1919, and, upon the trial of the case, plaintiff testified that he had not discovered the loss of the deed until December, 1919, at which time he had made a search for the deed and failed to find it. In so far as the affidavit immediately under consideration purported to narrate a statement of the plaintiff which in effect was contradictory of something he had testified to at the trial, it was impeaching in its character and, therefore, insufficient on appeal as the basis of review of a motion for a new trial, for it is the rule in this state that "newly discovered evidence which is merely * * * designed to contradict a witness is not of a character to warrant a new trial." People v. Anthony, 56 Cal. 397; Chalmers v. Sheehy, 132 Cal. 459, 64 Pac. 709, 84 Am. St. Rep. 62; Hanton v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., 178 Cal. 616, 174 Pac. 61. Moreover, the affidavit in question, in addition to being impeaching in its nature, purported to embody evidence which had it been produced at the trial of the case would have had no probative force against the testimony of the plaintiff concerning the nondelivery of the deed, for the reason that it was in harmony with and corroborative of the plaintiff's testimony that the deed in question had been purloined from him and not by him or any one in his behalf delivered to the defendants. Upon the whole, therefore, the affidavit in question, standing alone, was valueless as a support for the motion for a new trial.

[5] In addition to the affidavit last mentioned, the defendants offered and there was received in evidence upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial the affidavit of one Caroline Boring, which averred that plaintiff, subsequent to the time of the alleged delivery of the deed to the defendants, told her "that he had deeded his home and property to his children but that he had a home there as long as he lived and a pension and that if she would marry him she could have a home there as long as she lived." This alleged newly discovered evidence embodied a direct admission of the plaintiff that he had "deeded" his home to his children and it would have been competent evidence in behalf of the defendants upon the original trial of the case, because it tended to show declarations of the plaintiff which were against his interest. It was obviously material to the paramount issue in the case and it was not solely impeaching within the meaning of the rule which prevents the granting of a new trial where the newly discovered evidence is merely cumulative and impeaching. It was not solely impeaching for it would have been admissible even if the plaintiff had not been a witness in his own behalf. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870; Kenezleber v. Wahl, 92 Cal. 202, 208, 28 Pac. 225.

[6-8] But conceding all this and that it was not cumulative for the reason that it is not "additional evidence of the same character to the same point" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1838), nevertheless it does not follow that, because the affidavit last in discussion did not fail within the inhibition of the rule which ordinarily rejects newly discovered evidence, which is merely cumulative and impeaching, that the court below erred in refusing to grant the defendants a new trial. The question as to the efficacy of newly discovered evidence is peculiarly one which is addressed to the discretion of the trial court (People v. Oxniam, 170 Cal. 211, 215, 149 Pac. 165), and the exercise of this discretion will not be disturbed except in case of a manifest abuse (People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 1, 78 Pac. 235; People v. Feld, 149 Cal. 464, 86 Pac. 1100). While the alleged newly discovered evidence, in the instant case, was competent and material and not solely impeaching and perhaps not cumulative and would probably have justified an order granting a new trial on the ground that such evidence was of sufficient importance as to render a different result likely on a retrial of the case, still the fact remains that the affidavit of Caroline Boring was contradicted by the counter affidavit of the plaintiff. Not only is the introduction of counter affidavits proper and permissible upon the hearing of a motion for a new trial, grounded upon newly discovered evidence (People v. Rice, 97 Cal. 459, 32 Pac. 531; People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 1, 78 Pac. 235), but it is well settled that the truth of the evidence itself, or the truth of the facts as alleged, as well as the weight thereof and the credibility of the witnesses may be contested by counter affidavits (People v. Vitro [Cal. App.] 201 Pac. 610). The trial court in the instant case evidently balanced the affidavits one against the other and, deciding in favor of the credibility of the plaintiff's affidavit, denied the motion for a new trial. This being so, this court is not prepared to say that there was a manifest abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in denying the motion for a new trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SAMA. (Cr. 2415.)

Rehearing Denied July 13, 1922.)

1. Criminal law — Indeterminate sentence for attempted robbery is for maximum term of half of defendant's life.

Under Pen. Code, §§ 213, 671, the maximum penalty for robbery is imprisonment for life, and under section 664, a person convicted of attempted robbery may be sentenced for half the maximum sentence permitted for the completed offense, so that the maximum sentence for attempt to rob would be half of defendant's natural life, and an indeterminate sentence imposed under Pen. Code, § 1168, as added by St. 1917, p. 665, can be sustained only as a sentence for the maximum punishment permitted.

2. Constitutional law — 80(2)—Criminal law — 1208(9)—Prison directors cannot be given power to fix the sentence.

In so far as Pen. Code, § 1168, as added by St. 1917, p. 665, authorizing indeterminate sentences, purports to vest in the state board of prison directors the power to fix the sentence, it is invalid as an invasion of the judicial powers, contrary to Const. art. 3, § 1.

3. Criminal law — 1208(9)—Indeterminate Sentence Law does not apply where maximum sentence is half of defendant's life.

Where the maximum sentence that could be imposed is half of the sentence for life, which is obviously impossible of ascertainment, the Indeterminate Sentence Law, which can be sustained only as an imposition of the maximum sentence, cannot apply.

4. Criminal law — 1208(3)—Court can fix term where maximum sentence is half of defendant's life and unenforceable.

Where the Indeterminate Sentence Law cannot apply because the maximum sentence would be half of defendant's life and unenforceable, but the imposition of the maximum sentence is not required, the court has authority, under Pen. Code, §§ 264, 664, 671, to sentence the defendant for a definite term of years.

5. Pardon — 2—Indeterminate Sentence Act did not impliedly repeal Parole Law.

The Indeterminate Sentence Act did not, in terms or by implication, repeal the provisions of the Parole Law, so that a defendant who cannot be sentenced under the Indeterminate Sentence Act may be paroled under the Parole Law after sentence for a definite term.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; George Samuels, Judge.

Joe Sama was convicted of attempt to commit robbery, and he appeals. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with instructions to impose proper sentence.

Rehearing denied; Sloan, J., not voting.

Milton W. Sevier, of San Francisco, and Geo. M. Naus and Chester H. Case, both of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LAWLOR, J. Appellant was accused, by information filed on January 5, 1921, of the crime of attempt to commit robbery, to which he pleaded not guilty, and upon the trial was found "guilty of an attempt to commit robbery as charged in the information." The judgment purports to be rendered under the Indeterminate Sentence Law (St. 1917, p. 665), and provides that appellant "be confined in the state prison of the state of California as prescribed by law." From that judgment appellant takes this appeal.

The only question presented on appeal is whether the judgment is invalid because under the sentence a definite maximum punishment was not in legal effect imposed. Appellant contends that it is void for uncertainty, because "It sentences appellant to be imprisoned for one-half of his life, and no one knows, or can know, before appellant's death, what one-half of his life will be." It is insisted the decisions are unanimous that an indeterminate sentence is really one for the maximum sentence; that the prison board in fixing the term at less than the maximum is merely exercising executive clemency; that the maximum sentence in this case is one-half of appellant's life; that such a sentence has always been held void for uncertainty; that, therefore, there is no valid penalty provided in this case, and the court cannot impose any punishment for the commission of the crime, and that appellant should be discharged. Respondent's contention is that there is a definite minimum term of six months; that when the minimum sentence has been served it becomes the duty of the state board of prison directors to determine what length of time appellant shall serve; that there is, therefore no time during which the penalty is vague or uncertain; that the maximum term of imprisonment for this crime was the same before the adoption of the Indeterminate Sentence Law as it is now, and that then the trial court had power to fix a term of imprisonment; that the Indeterminate Sentence Law has transferred this power to the said board; that the statement that an indeterminate sentence is a sentence for the maximum term is but a theory.

The Penal Code provides:

"Robbery is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one year." Section 213. "Every person who attempts to commit any crime, but fails, or is prevented or intercepted in the perpetration thereof, is punishable, where no provision is made by law for the punishment of such attempts, as follows: 1. If the offense so attempted is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for five years, or more, * * * the person guilty of such attempt is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, * * * for a term not exceeding one-half the longest term of imprisonment prescribed upon a conviction of the offense so attempted." Section 664. "Whenever any person is declared punishable for a crime by imprisonment in the state [prison] for a term not less than any specified number of years, and no limit to the duration of such imprisonment is declared, the court authorized to pronounce judgment upon such conviction may, in its discretion, sentence such offender to imprisonment during his natural life, or for any number of years not less than that prescribed." Section 671. From these statutory provisions it would appear that the longest term of imprisonment for an attempt to commit robbery is one-half the natural life of the offender.

[1] The problem presented is, Does the Indeterminate Sentence Law have any applicability to this case? Section 1168 of the Penal Code, as added by St. 1917, p. 665, declares:

"Every person convicted of a public offense, for which public offense punishment by imprisonment in any reformatory or the state prison is now prescribed by law, if such convicted person shall not be placed on probation, a new trial granted, or imposing of sentence suspended, shall be sentenced to be confined in the state prison, but the court in imposing such sentence shall not fix the term or duration of the period of imprisonment."

In the case of In re Lee, 177 Cal. 690, 171 Pac. 958, the prisoner was granted relief on habeas corpus from a purported indeterminate sentence of from 1 to 10 years' imprisonment for the crime of manslaughter, upon the ground that section 1168 was ex post facto as to him. In discussing the constitutionality of section 1168 generally, the court declared:

"It has uniformly been held that the indeterminate sentence is in legal effect a sentence for the maximum term. It is on this basis that such sentences have been held to be certain and definite, and therefore not void for uncertainty. [Citing cases.] In answering the claim that the authority vested by the Indeterminate Sentence Law in the board of prison directors is a delegation of either legislative or judicial powers to an executive body, it is pointed out that the legislative function is filled by providing the sentence which is to be imposed by the judicial branch upon the determination of the guilt of the offender. This is done by the enactment of the Indeterminate Sentence Law. The judicial branch of the government is intrusted with the function of determining the guilt of the individual and of imposing the sentence provided by law for the offense of which the individual has been found guilty. The actual carrying out of the sentence and the application of the various provisions for ameliorating the same are administrative in character and properly exercised by an administrative body."

[2] This being the settled law, it follows that the sentence imposed in the case at bar is one for the maximum term prescribed by law, which, as already indicated, would be for one-half of appellant's life. It also follows from In re Lee, supra, that the function which the state board of prison directors would perform in determining what term of years appellant must serve is no part of the actual fixing of the sentence itself, and that if it were so regarded it would be the exercise of a judicial function by an executive board, and void under section 1, article 3, of the Constitution. The Legislature has no authority to vest this judicial power in the state board of prison directors, and in so far as section 1168 of the Penal Code purports to do so it is in violation of that section. Hence, in determining whether or not this sentence is valid the test is the term of imprisonment called for by the judgment—one-half of appellant's life—and not the term of years which would be fixed by the state board of prison directors at the expiration of the minimum term.

[3] In People v. Burns, 138 Cal. 159, 69 Pac. 16, 70 Pac. 1087, 60 L. R. A. 270, the defendant was convicted of an attempt to commit robbery, and admitted having suffered the two previous convictions of felony alleged in the information. In that case it was held that, under subdivision 1 of section 666 of the Penal Code, the court might, for the offense there in question, sentence the defendant to any term of imprisonment between the minimum of 10 years and life. Discussing a sentence of imprisonment for one-half the defendant's life, the court said:

"What the actual life of a particular person would be, and what would be the half of it, cannot be known; and if one-half of the life of the appellant were the only punishment prescribed for the crime of which he was convicted, such punishment would be too vague and indefinite to be possible of enforcement, and no judgment could be rendered against him."

Since a sentence for half a life would be invalid, authority to sentence appellant must be found apart from section 1168. This view of that section does not mean that it may not operate in cases where it is applicable, for it is not necessary that the provision, to be uniform in its application, shall apply universally. It is sufficient that the law bear equally, in its burdens and benefits, upon persons in the same category, and this depends upon the facts that characterize the offense. People v. Judge of the Twelfth District, 17 Cal. 549, 554.

It follows that section 1168 of the Penal Code makes no provision for an indeterminate sentence in the case of a conviction of an attempt to commit robbery, and for that reason the sections of the Penal Code providing for the sentencing of persons applicable before its adoption remain in full force and effect.

[4] In the case of People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 32 Pac. 880, the defendant was sentenced to serve a term of 5 years in the penitentiary for an attempt to commit rape. Under sections 264, 664, and 671, the maximum punishment for that offense was not more than one-half of the defendant's natural life, but the maximum was not required. The sentence of 5 years was upheld on the grounds that, inasmuch as a defendant convicted of the complete crime of rape might, under section 671, be imprisoned for the term of his natural life or for any term not less than the minimum, the court had power to impose either the maximum punishment, or any term of years between the minimum and the maximum; that for an attempt to commit rape the sentence, under sections 664 and 671, might be one-half of the defendant's life, or any term of years less than that period; that whether a sentence for a term of years were regarded as longer or shorter than one for the defendant's life, imprisonment for a term of years would be less than one-half the maximum term which might be imposed, and would be proper under sections 664 and 671. This reasoning was adopted in People v. Burns, supra. There is no difference in the punishment between the case at bar and People v. Gardner, supra, save in the minimum. It follows from the latter case that the trial court had authority to sentence appellant for a definite term of years.

[5] As section 1168 has no application, the state board of prison directors is without authority under that section to determine the length of time appellant shall be confined. We are not to be understood as intimating that appellant, while undergoing punishment, may not apply for, nor the state board of prison directors have authority to grant, such relief as was afforded before the adoption of section 1168. In this connection it may be remarked that neither section 1168 nor any other provision has in terms or by implication repealed the provisions of the "Parole Law." St. 1913, p. 1048, as amended by St. 1915, p. 981.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the superior court to render a judgment sentencing appellant to imprisonment in the state prison for such a term of years as, in its opinion, would be a just and fair punishment.

SPAULDING v. DESMOND et al.
(S. F. 10057.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1922.
Rehearing Denied June 23, 1922.)

1. Mandamus ⇨77(1)—Mandamus is proper remedy to compel city clerk to file oath of office of city tax collector.

Mandamus is the proper proceeding to compel a city clerk to file an official oath of office of a city tax collector.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨48(2)—Charter adopted by city, approved by Legislature, is organic law of city.

Under Const. art. 11, § 8, a charter adopted by the qualified voters of a city and approved by the Legislature by concurrent resolution becomes the organic law of the city, and supersedes an existing charter and all laws inconsistent with the charter so adopted.

3. Municipal corporations ⇨48(2)—Charter of city passed by concurrent resolution of Legislature and enrolled is conclusive as to form of charter adopted.

Under Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that a charter adopted by a Legislature of qualified voters of a city and approved by concurrent resolution of the Legislature shall become the organic law of the city and that one copy shall be filed with the secretary of state and that thereafter the courts shall take judicial notice of the provisions of the charter, a charter adopted by the city of Sacramento and approved by concurrent resolution of the Legislature, enrolled and authenticated by the officers thereof, and filed in the office of the secretary of state, is conclusive as to the form of charter adopted.

4. Statutes ⇨286—Act signed, enrolled, and filed constitutes a record which is conclusive evidence of its passage.

Where an act has been passed by the Legislature, signed by the proper officers of the senate and assembly, approved by the Governor and properly enrolled and authenticated, and filed in the office of the secretary of state, it constitutes a record which is conclusive evidence of its passage and of its terms and provisions, and neither the journals of either house nor the bill as originally introduced, nor any of the amendments thereof, nor parol evidence can be received to show that it did not become a law in accordance with the prescribed forms or as so enrolled.

5. Evidence ⇨1—"Judicial knowledge" defined.

"Judicial knowledge" is not reached by the use of evidence; it is a matter pertaining to the judicial function, and its existence, like that of an admission, stipulation, or rule of presumption, dispenses with evidence as to the point covered.

6. Evidence ⇨31—No judicial notice taken of city charter not authenticated by officers of either house thereof.

Under Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that the courts shall take judicial notice of the provisions of a charter of a city adopted by a majority of the qualified voters and passed by concurrent resolution of both houses of the Legislature and filed in the office of the secretary of state, no judicial notice can be taken of a charter of a city authenticated by the mayor and the city clerk of the city, but not authenticated by officers of either house of the Legislature.

7. Municipal corporations ⇨48(2)—Charter of city of Sacramento filed in office of secretary of state held to supersede former charter and laws inconsistent therewith.

Under Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that a charter, adopted by a majority of the qualified voters of a city and passed by concurrent resolution of both houses of the Legislature and filed in the office of the secretary of state, shall be the organic law of the city, the charter of the city of Sacramento so adopted and so approved and filed in the office of the secretary of state January 24, 1921, is the existing and valid charter of that city, superseding the charter of 1911 and all laws inconsistent with the provisions of the charter so adopted and so filed.

On Rehearing.

8. Evidence ⇨31—Courts must take judicial notice of city charter ratified by people of city and approved by concurrent resolution of Legislature and filed with secretary of state.

Under Const. art. 11, § 8, declaring that, when a city charter is ratified by the people of the city and approved by concurrent resolution of the Legislature, one copy thereof shall be filed with the secretary of state, one with the recorder of the county in which the city is located, and one in the archives of the city, and that thereafter the courts shall take judicial notice of the provisions of the charter, the courts must take judicial notice of the charter, a copy of which is so filed.

9. Evidence ⇨328—Only competent evidence as to form of city charter ratified by people is copy attached to or included in concurrent resolution of the Legislature and copies filed as directed.

Under Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that, when a city charter is ratified by the people of the city and approved by concurrent resolution of the Legislature, one copy of the charter so ratified and so approved shall be filed with the secretary of state, one with the recorder of the county in which the city is located, and one in the archives of the city, and that the courts must take judicial notice thereof, the only competent evidence of the contents of the charter is either the copy attached to or included in the copy of the concurrent resolution and the copies filed as specified in the Constitution, and, in case of conflict between the copies so filed and the copy attached to the concurrent resolution, the latter prevails.

10. Constitutional law ⇨68(1)—Remedy for mistake in enacting charter of municipal government is for Legislature.

Where a city charter is adopted under Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that a charter ratified by the people of a city and adopted by concurrent resolution of the Legislature shall become the organic law of the city, if by mistake the charter adopted by the Legislature is different from the one ratified by the people, the question of correcting the error is one for the Legislature, since the matter of the formation and government of such municipal corporation is political and does not determine private rights nor involve due process of law, so as to bring the question of the mistake in adopting the charter within the jurisdiction of the courts.

Application by L. H. Spaulding for writ of mandate, to be directed to M. J. Desmond, as Clerk of the City of Sacramento, and the City of Sacramento. Writ denied.

R. Platnauer, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

R. L. Shinn and Devlin & Devlin, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

SHURTLEFF, J. This is an original application for the issuance of a writ of mandamus directed to Harry G. Denton, who has been regularly substituted as a defendant in the place and stead of M. J. Desmond, deceased, directing the said Denton, as clerk of the city of Sacramento, to file the oath of plaintiff as the alleged city collector of said city. Plaintiff bases his right to have such oath filed upon the provisions of the charter of said city, known and hereinafter referred to as the charter of 1911 (Statutes 1911, Extra Session, p. 305), which provided for a city commission in which was vested the power of appointing a city collector, and which charter plaintiff contends is still in force. It would, we think, conduce to a better understanding of the questions arising upon this application to state at this point that, on November 30, 1920, the electors of said city of Sacramento ratified a new charter, hereinafter designated as the charter of 1920, which provided for a municipal governing body termed the city council, and which charter, if legally adopted, became operative on June 30, 1921, with the one exception that, for the sole purpose of the election of said city council, the members of which were the only officers under said charter to be elected by the people, it should go into effect immediately after its approval by the Legislature, which approval, it is claimed by defendants, was accorded on January 20, 1921. Stats. 1921, p. 1919.

The petition, in substance, alleges: That, at all the times in it mentioned, the city of Sacramento was a municipal corporation of the state of California, organized and existing under the laws of said state, governed in accordance with the provisions of a charter adopted and approved by the Legislature in 1911, in the manner provided by the Constitution. That the defendant M. J. Desmond from July, 1913, up to the time of his death on December 27, 1921, was the duly appointed, qualified, and acting city clerk of said city. That, on the 15th day of November, 1921, which, it will be noted, was after the charter of 1920, if valid, became fully operative, the said commission of said city of Sacramento, which derived its authority as previously stated, if any it had for such act, from the charter of 1911, appointed the plaintiff city collector of said city, and that, in compliance with the provisions of an ordinance of said city, adopted in January, 1919, he executed his bond as such collector, with sufficient sureties to said city in the penal sum required, which bond was approved and filed with the auditor of said city. That, on the 18th of November, 1921, and after such approval of said bond, plaintiff, as such city collector, regularly subscribed and took his official oath in writing, and presented it to M. J. Desmond, the then clerk of the city of Sacramento, as such clerk, and demanded that it be filed, which demand was refused. That the reason assigned by said Desmond for such refusal was that the charter of 1911 was superseded and abrogated by the charter of 1920, and that there was no longer a city collector or any law creating such an office. That, on the 30th day of November, 1920, the qualified electors of said city ratified a proposed charter for the government of said city, framed as provided by section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution of California. That the last-mentioned charter was never submitted to the Legislature of the state of California for its approval or rejection, and was never approved by the Legislature. That the Legislature, at its session in 1921, by concurrent resolution, passed by a majority of the members elected to each house thereof, approved what purported to be a copy of the charter of 1920 as ratified, but which in truth and in fact was not a complete copy thereof.

The city makes two appearances, one by answer of the city commission, admitting all the allegations of the petition, and the other through or by the city council, which demurred and answered at the same time. We have therefore separate appearances of the alleged governing bodies created respectively by the charter of 1911 and the charter of 1920. It is not necessary to give any consideration to the answer of the city commission, for it raises no issues in that it concedes the correctness of plaintiff's contentions. We will therefore confine the discussion to the petition and pleadings of the city council, and it will be understood, unless otherwise stated, that the use of the term defendants refers to the city thus appearing and the defendant Denton.

The demurrer alleges, first, that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or a cause "for the issuance of a writ of mandamus"; and, second, that it appears upon the face of the petition that the only possible cause of action stated therein is one in favor of the people of the state of California, which must be made the subject of a proceeding by the state in quo warranto. The answer of the defendants, in substance, avers: That the charter of 1911 was superseded by the charter of 1920, and that, ever since the 20th day of January, 1921, the last-named charter has been and is the organic law of said city; that, on November 18, 1921, a copy of the charter of 1920, so ratified and approved, was filed respectively with the secretary of state of the state of California, the county recorder of the county of Sacramento, and in the archives of said city of Sacramento. That said M. J. Desmond was the city clerk of the city of Sacramento under said charter of 1911, from July, 1913, the exact date not appearing in any of the pleadings, until the 30th day of June, 1921, upon which latter date the charter of 1911 ceased to have any operative effect. That, upon said last-mentioned date, the said M. J. Desmond voluntarily surrendered his office as city clerk under the charter of 1911, and ever since the 30th day of June, 1921, neither he nor either of his successors has been city clerk of the city of Sacramento under said charter of 1911. That on said 30th day of June, 1921, said M. J. Desmond was elected city clerk of said city by the city council of said city, pursuant to, and charged with the duties provided in, the charter of 1920, and that thereupon he duly qualified as such city clerk under said charter of 1920, and that ever since said 30th day of June, 1921, he, or a successor to him, of whom the defendant Denton was one, has been the duly appointed, qualified, and acting city clerk of the city of Sacramento, with the duties provided for in the said charter of 1920. That the ordinance, pursuant to which plaintiff alleges that he filed his bond and took his office, is not and has not been in effect at any time since June 30, 1921, and that since said date there has not been any such office as city collector of said city. The answer further denies that the charter of 1920 was never submitted to the Legislature for its approval or rejection, but avers that it was so submitted, and, by concurrent resolution passed by each house of the Legislature, was, on January 20, 1921, approved, and that the charter so approved by the Legislature was the same charter ratified by the qualified electors of said city of Sacramento on November 30, 1920. The answer admits the averments of the petition touching the oath by plaintiff as city collector, his attempt to file the same with the city clerk, the latter's refusal to make such filing, and the reasons assigned for such refusal. It is alleged as a separate defense that there is another action, in the nature of quo warranto, pending between the same parties and involving the same subject-matter, but, in view of the conclusions which follow, it is not necessary for us to consider this special defense, and we express no opinion concerning it. To the defendant's answer, plaintiff demurs upon the ground of its insufficiency. Inasmuch as the questions, the decision of which is in our opinion determinative of this controversy, are raised by the petition and answer as well as by the demurrers, we will not separately consider the latter pleadings, but dispose of the matter upon its merits.

The record shows that an enrolled copy of the concurrent resolution, approving the charter of 1920, authenticated by the proper officers of the senate and assembly, was filed in the office of the secretary of state on January 24, 1921.

[1] What we regard as the controlling questions raised by the pleadings are: First, do the facts alleged in the petition support a proceeding in mandamus? And, second, is the charter of 1920 the organic law of the city of Sacramento, and, if so, can we, in this proceeding, question the verity or validity of the enrolled copy thereof filed with the secretary of state? The first of these propositions must be answered in the affirmative. The plaintiff is not, as contended by defendants, attempting in this application to try the title to his alleged office or to have himself judicially declared to be the city collector of the city of Sacramento, but, as already stated, is asking for an order directing the defendant, as city clerk, to file his official oath as such city collector, which he claims is essential in order for him to be fully clothed with official authority. That this is the proper proceeding to accomplish such result, if he is legally entitled to have such oath filed, and it is the duty of the city clerk, under the law, to file it, does not admit of doubt, for it is well settled in this state that mandamus is proper to compel the performance of a duty especially enjoined by law. Kelly v. Edwards, 69 Cal. 460-462. 11 Pac. 1; Peck v. Board of Supervisors of Los Angeles Co., 90 Cal. 384, 27 Pac. 301; Bannerman v. Boyle, 160 Cal. 203, 116 Pac. 732; Fox v. Workman, 6 Cal. App. 633, 92 Pac. 742; Code Civ. Proc., § 1085.

[2] We pass to the discussion of the second and more important question. The provision of the Constitution with which we are directly concerned is the following:

"If a majority of the qualified voters voting thereon at such general or special election shall vote in favor of such proposed charter, it shall be deemed to be ratified, and shall be submitted to the Legislature, if then in session, or at the next regular or special session of the Legislature. The Legislature shall by concurrent resolution approve or reject such charter as a whole, without power of alteration or amendment; and if approved by a majority of the members elected to each house it shall become the organic law of such city or city and county, and supersede any existing charter and all laws inconsistent therewith. One copy of the charter so ratified and approved shall be filed with the Secretary of State, one with the recorder of the county in which such city is located, and one in the archives of the city; and thereafter the courts shall take judicial notice of the provisions of such charter." Article 11, § 8. (Italics ours.)

In speaking of this provision and the legal status of a charter approved thereunder, this court, in Brooks v. Fischer, 79 Cal. 173-176, 21 Pac. 652, 653 (4 L. R. A. 429), said:

"It provides: 1. For submission [of the ratified charter] to the Legislature for its approval or rejection. 2. That if approved by a majority vote of the members elected to each house, it shall become the charter of said city. This does not in terms require any action on the part of the governor, but expressly provides that, immediately upon its being approved by a majority of the members of the two houses of the Legislature, it shall become the charter of the city. * * * It seems to us that this language is so plain and unequivocal that it cannot call for a construction by this court. It is enough that the Constitution has so provided."

Again, in a more recent case, addressing itself to the same subject, this court used the following language:

"It is now expressly provided that the charter may be approved by concurrent resolution, and that then such charter 'shall become the organic law thereof'—that is, it is a special mode for the enactment of a law by the Legislature. It is clear that it is made a law by the Legislature, and becomes a law by this expression of the sovereign will of the state. It prevails and has force as a law of the state, and is not made a law by the people of the municipality by virtue of authority delegated to them. It is proposed by the municipality, and is accepted and passed into a law by the Legislature or rejected, as it shall see fit." Ex parte Sparks, 120 Cal. 395-399, 52 Pac. 715, 716.

[3-5] It is, therefore, settled that it is the charter adopted by the Legislature which becomes the organic law of the city by which it was ratified and submitted for approval. The correctness of this proposition is not contested by any of the parties to this proceeding, but plaintiff affirms that he can impeach the validity of the charter filed with the secretary of state, or either of the other depositaries designated in the Constitution, by showing, through the means of comparison or otherwise, that it is not a correct copy of the charter ratified by the electors; and the defendants assert that they have the right to prove by the journal of the respective branches of the Legislature that, in fact the charter adopted was the one ratified, and that they are not precluded by the filed copy. But in our opinion neither of these contentions can be sustained. It has long been the law of this state that, where an act has been passed by the Legislature, signed by the proper officers of the senate and assembly, approved by the Governor and properly enrolled and authenticated, and filed in the office of the secretary of state, it constitutes a record which is conclusive evidence of its passage and of its terms and provisions, and that neither the journals of either house, nor the bill as originally introduced, nor any of the amendments thereof, nor parol evidence, can be received in order to show that it did not become a law in accordance with the prescribed forms or as so enrolled. Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 253, 89 Am. Dec. 93; County of Yolo v. Colgan, 132 Cal. 265, 64 Pac. 403, 84 Am. St. Rep. 41. While, so far as the briefs and our research disclose, it has never been held that this rule applies to an enrolled and authenticated copy of a concurrent resolution filed with the secretary of state, we can see no reason, resting upon principle, why it is not applicable here. That it is controlling finds support in that portion of the Constitution quoted, which affirms that, when the charter is filed as directed, the courts shall take judicial notice of its provisions. We think this mandate, reinforced by the foregoing rule, precludes us in this hearing from going behind the enrolled and filed charter.

"Judicial knowledge [notice] is not reached by the use of evidence; it is a matter pertaining to the judicial function and its existence, like that of an admission, stipulation, or rule of presumption, dispenses with evidence as to the point covered." 18 Cyc. § 850.

The Constitution goes even further than the quoted text and, in effect, declares that, when the controversy involves a provision of the charter, the courts shall determine it from what appears in the copy filed with the secretary of state or with the other depositaries mentioned in the Constitution. It would practically nullify this provision of the Constitution to construe it as meaning that the courts must take judicial notice of the contents of the filed copy, except where the issue is that such copy is invalid because not an exact reproduction of the charter as ratified by the electors and approved by the Legislature. Taking judicial notice of the contents of the charter is taking notice of such contents as a whole—as a completed document—as well as of some specific part thereof. The wisdom and purpose of this requirement of the Constitution are manifest. It is essential, commercially and otherwise, that there exist some established memorial, some authoritative and permanent record of the charter, which is conclusive and unimpeachable, at least against an attack such as the one made here, and to which those desiring to be advised of its terms may with security and confidence resort. Were it otherwise, a municipal government would be constantly exposed to the possibility of having its organic law assailed upon the ground that the enrolled and filed copy of the concurrent resolution approving it is defective by reason of the asserted omission therefrom of some portion of the ratified and approved charter.

Sherman v. Story, supra, although decided under the Constitution of 1849, contains language in point here. We quote the following from the opinion (30 Cal. 278, 89 Am. Dec. 93):

"There is nothing in the Constitution * * * that requires or authorizes us to avoid, correct or in any way modify, by aid of the Journals, the acts of the Legislature properly enrolled, authenticated and deposited with the secretary of state as records of the act. * * * Much less is there any authority for resorting to the bill as originally introduced, * * * or to parol evidence for the purpose of impeaching the record. * * * The question, then, whether an important public law, upon which the rights of all our citizens depend or may depend was ever passed, is to rest, through all time, upon equivocal memoranda upon amendment tags and the frail recollection and veracity of man." (Italics ours.)

And this question the court there answers emphatically in the negative. County of Yolo v. Colgan, supra, decides that the change from the old to the new Constitution did not abrogate or affect the rule that the record of the authenticated and enrolled statute in the office of the secretary of state cannot be impeached by evidence of any fact outside of such record.

The late Chief Justice Beatty, speaking for the Supreme Court of Nevada, of which court he was then a member, used these words:

"How is a court to be satisfied as to the existence and terms of a statute? Is it bound by the statute-roll, or can it look beyond the record? And if so, how far can the investigation be extended? * * * Whoever engages in any transaction the validity or construction of which depends upon statutory provisions, whoever holds or acquires any sort of property, or right, the title or enjoyment of which may be affected by the operation of any law, is bound to take notice, at his peril, what the law is. And it is not enough for him to know what the law is after a court of last resort has made an investigation and determined what part of the statute-roll is to stand and what part to fall, but he must know in advance of litigation, and govern his conduct accordingly. If there is any record or document outside of the statute-roll to which a court will resort for the purpose of testing the validity of an enrolled law, he must not overlook it. If a court will hear oral testimony to impeach the record, he must be able to conjecture in advance what the testimony will be, and what weight will be allowed to it. Considering the exigency of this rule it is easy to perceive of what extreme importance it is that there should be some high, authentic and unquestionable record to which not only courts and public officers, but private citizens, may resort, and, by a simple inspection, determine for themselves with infallible certainty what are the statutes of the state, and what are their terms." Nevada v. Swift, 10 Nev. 176-182.

[6] As before noted, defendants in their answer aver, that on November 18, 1921, a copy of the charter of 1920, as ratified and approved, was filed in the office of the secretary of state, and, while the demurrer to the answer would ordinarily admit the truth of this averment, we treat it as denied in obedience to the rule that the averments of the answer are deemed denied. The answer sets forth a copy of the charter, which it avers was filed on November 18, 1921, as aforesaid, but it is not authenticated by the officers of either house of the Legislature, but by the mayor and city clerk of the city of Sacramento. We know of no law authorizing the filing of this document, so attested, and we regard it as of no potency whatever. Clearly, it is not a record of which this court can take judicial notice, or a certified copy of which would be admissible here. As we have said, it is the copy attested by the proper officers of the respective legislative bodies approving the charter, filed with the secretary of state, and no other, of which the courts take judicial notice, which, in this instance, is the one so filed on January 24, 1921.

[7] Our conclusion is that, in this inquiry, we are precluded from going behind the said copy of the charter of 1920, which was filed in the office of the secretary of state on January 24, 1921, and that, as so filed, it is the existing and valid charter of the city of Sacramento, superseding the charter of 1911 and all laws inconsistent with the provisions of said charter of 1920. It follows, therefore, and we so hold, that there is no such office as city collector of the city of Sacramento, and that plaintiff has failed to establish his right to have his oath as such alleged city collector filed in the records of said city as demanded by him or otherwise.

In view of what precedes, it is unnecessary to consider the additional points urged in the briefs.

The application for a writ of mandate is denied.

On Rehearing.

SHAW, C. J. The respondent has filed a petition asking the court to modify in certain particulars the opinion hereinbefore rendered,

[8, 9] Upon further consideration of the matter, we are satisfied that the modification should be made. The Constitution (art. 11, § 8) declares that, when a city charter ratified by the people of the city has been submitted to the Legislature and has been approved by concurrent resolution, "one copy of the charter so ratified and approved shall be filed with the secretary of state, one with the recorder of the county in which such city is located, and one in the archives of the city; and thereafter the courts shall take judicial notice of the provisions of such charter." The natural meaning of this language is that the courts must take judicial notice of the charter, the copy of which is so filed. We have held, and we adhere to that opinion, that the doctrine of the decision in Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 253, 89 Am. Dec. 93, and Yolo County v. Colgan, 132 Cal. 266, 64 Pac. 403, 84 Am. St. Rep. 41, is applicable to city charters approved by the Legislature, certified and filed with the secretary of state, as fully as it is to statutes enacted by the Legislature, and enrolled, authenticated, and filed with the secretary of state. Under that doctrine the only competent evidence of the contents of such charter is either the copy attached to or included in the concurrent resolution, if any copy was so attached or included, and the copies so filed, as specified in the part of the Constitution above quoted. In case of a conflict between the copies so filed, and the copy, if any, attached to the concurrent resolution, the latter would prevail. No judicial proceeding has been provided in which the inquiry whether or not such copy is a true copy can be made or in which the question can be determined, or in which a mistake, if one was made, can be corrected. The imperative reasons upon which that doctrine rests are clearly and forcibly set forth in the two decisions cited, and need not be repeated here.

[10] The petitioner suggests that under this doctrine it would be within the physical power of the Legislature, if it were disposed to act in bad faith, to impose upon a city a charter for its government wholly different from the one which the people of the city had ratified. One answer to this objection is that the courts will not impute bad faith to the legislative department of the state. Another is that, even assuming that the same result might be caused by a mistake, the matter of the formation and government of such municipal corporations is political; that it does not determine private rights nor involve due process of law (People v. Ontario, 148 Cal. 634, 84 Pac. 205; People v. Cal. Fish Co., 166 Cal. 606, 138 Pac. 79), and that the remedy, if any is desired, is to be provided by the Legislature. In view of the fact that during the 72 years of the existence of this state, in the vast mass of laws enacted, no instance of such bad faith, nor any serious mistake, has occurred, the necessity for a remedy does not seem urgent. The possibilities of dangers from such occurrences are inconceivably less detrimental to the public good than would be the difficulties produced by the doctrine that extrinsic evidence could be given to show an error in the official record of general or local laws and that no one could be assured that he was acting in accordance with law at any time, because he could not foresee that some other person would not be able to discover and prove an error which had eluded his own search.

The decision in People v. Gunn, 85 Cal. 238, 24 Pac. 718, as we understand it, is not contrary to the above. It holds that, in a quo warranto proceeding the validity of such charter may be disputed, not by showing that the copies thereof officially filed as aforesaid are erroneous, but by showing that the election at which it was ratified by the people of the city was not lawfully held, and that point was put upon the ground that such ratification was a condition precedent to the power of the Legislature to approve the charter, one for which the Legislature was not responsible, and one into which it could not inquire, and, hence, that it was a judicial question for the courts to determine. If there is anything in that decision that is contrary to the doctrine of Sherman v. Story it must be deemed to have been overruled by the decision in Yolo County v. Colgan, supra.

Anything in the opinion hereinbefore rendered suggesting that the accuracy of such copies might be disputable in some other proceeding and leaving that question open is to be considered as withdrawn.

The application by the petitioner for a rehearing is denied.

BARRY v. HANDLIN et al. (Sac. 3172.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 20, 1922.)

1. Partnership ⇐21—Contract for admission as partner could not be terminated by defendants without creating liability for damages.

Under a contract between defendants, who furnished money for a business, and plaintiff, who was employed for two years at a certain salary, with a provision that he should be admitted as a partner when one-third of the profits reached a certain amount, held, that plaintiff was to have one-third of the profits, subject only to the contingency that he remain in the employment of the firm, and that his rights could not be terminated by the defendants without creating a liability for damages.

2. Partnership ⇐21—Employee wrongfully deprived of right under contract to become partner in business entitled to damages suffered.

One employed by others forming a partnership, with the provision that he be made a partner when the profits reached a certain amount, was entitled to such damages as he could show he suffered by reason of being wrongfully deprived of his prospective interest in the profits of the business, where his employers wrongfully terminated the relation without cause.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by W. E. Barry against L. F. Handlin and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Ralph H. Lewis, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Chas. A. Bliss and Thomas B. Leeper, both of Sacramento, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $13,500 damages for a breach of contract. Defendants had judgment on demurrer, and the plaintiff appeals. The breached contract is an exhibit to the complaint. It is an agreement by Barry, Handlin, and Barton to form a copartnership. Handlin and Barton were to advance the sum of $10,000 for the purchase of a wall paper business, and were to constitute the copartnership until the plaintiff under the terms of the contract had secured an equal interest therein as a copartner. The plaintiff was to be manager of the business, and receive $150 per month, and to be credited with a third interest in the profits as hereafter stated. This third interest in the profits was to be carried on the books as the "Barry reserve fund." It was provided that when this fund amounted to $3,333.33 one-half of this fund should be paid to Handlin and one-half to Barton, and thereupon the partnership should be composed of Barton, Handlin, and Barry. The contract was entered into on the 2d day of June, 1919, and on the 4th day of October, 1919, the plaintiff was discharged, and his further participation in the business was prevented by the defendants. Plaintiff alleges that at the time of his discharge the profits of the business amounted to $8,000. The defendants demurred to plaintiff's complaint generally, and for lack of jurisdiction. The defendants' contention is, in effect, that plaintiff's employment was to continue for two years; that unless at the end of that term the Barry reserve fund then amounted to $3,333.33 or more plaintiff was not entitled to enter into the copartnership or to any part of the profits; that if, in the meantime, for any reason plaintiff ceased his connection with the business he was not entitled to any part of the profits; and upon this hypothesis they claim the only injury sustained by reason of his discharge is the sum of one month's salary accruing between the date of discharge and the date when plaintiff secured other employment, and that this amount ($150) was not sufficient to give the superior court jurisdiction.

It will be observed that at the date of the discharge one-third of the profits amounted to $2,166.66, and that, if the profits had been continued for another month at that rate, one-third of the profits would have been $3,333.33. The contract provided:

"7. When said Barry reserve fund shall have amounted to thirty-three hundred thirty-three and one-third dollars (\$3,333 $\frac{1}{3}$), one-half thereof shall be paid to the party of the first part and one-half thereof to the party of the second part, and thereupon and thereafter the party of the third part shall be let into and become an equal partner with the parties of the first and second parts in said business, provided he shall have continued in the employ of said partnership as hereinabove provided, and shall have during said time, in all matters and things, promoted and worked for the best interests of said partnership, and in all other particulars complied with his obligations and duties under this agreement."

It is clear that Barry's third interest in the copartnership was to begin as soon as the profits amounted to $10,000, unless there are other provisions of the contract modifying paragraph 7. Paragraph 5 of the contract with relation to the profits is as follows:

"5. Upon the 1st day of January of each year after the signing of this agreement an inventory of said business shall be taken, and balance shall be struck, and the net profit of the previous year shall be ascertained and determined, and thereupon said profit shall be disposed of as follows:

"(a) One-third thereof shall be paid to the party of the first part.

"(b) One-third thereof shall be paid to the plaintiff of the second part.

"(c) One-third thereof shall be put in a fund to be known as 'Barry reserve fund'; said reserve fund shall be carried on said books as cash on hand, but the same may be used by said partnership for the purpose of carrying on said business, discounting bills, etc., provided, however, that before a balance shall be struck for the succeeding year said reserve fund shall be restored and be intact at the time of ascertaining the profit for such year."

Paragraph 3 is as follows:

"3. The party of the third part shall be employed by said partnership at a salary of one hundred and fifty dollars ($150) per month, beginning with the 1st day of June, 1919, and shall give his entire time and attention, and his best energy and efforts in promoting the welfare of said business and the interests of said partnership; and agrees to continue in such employment for a period of two years, and thereafter until this agreement has been fully carried out, and has become an equal partner in said business enterprise as hereinafter provided."

It is not necessary for us to determine whether if the profits had continued at the rate of $2,000 per month for another month the plaintiff would have been entitled to his partnership interest on November 4th or would have been compelled to have waited until the first of the next January, when the inventory was to be taken, subject to the postponement of his partnership interest in the event that during the period of November 4, 1919, to January 1, 1920, there were losses instead of profits. It is sufficiently clear from the paragraphs quoted that the plaintiff suffered a substantial damage by reason of the loss of his contingent interest in the profits of the business, and that if his dismissal was wrongful he was entitled to such damages.

[1, 2] The defendants claim that section 9 deprives plaintiff of any interest in the profits or in the Barry reserve fund in the event that his employment is terminated from any cause, even though such termination may have been wholly without his fault and wrongful on their part. We do not think that the contract is reasonably susceptible of such construction. There was a definite agreement that the plaintiff was to be employed for two years at $150 per month. It was also clear that he was to have one-third of the profits, subject only to the contingency that he remain in the employment of the company, and that such profits amount in the aggregate to $10,000. It is clearly not contemplated that the plaintiff should be penalized for the wrongful conduct of the defendants. That is to say, the termination of the employment referred to in subdivision 9 of the contract which terminates plaintiff's right in the profits must be caused by the fault of the plaintiff or by agreement. It is not a reasonable construction of the contract to hold that it was agreed that the defendants reserved the right to discharge the plaintiff at their whim at any time, and that this discharge might occur the day before an inventory is taken, which inventory would disclose that the plaintiff is then entitled to a third interest in the partnership. Plaintiff was entitled to such damages as he could show he suffered by reason of being wrongfully deprived of his prospective interest in the profits of the business. He alleges his damages at $15,000, and asks judgment for this amount, and this brings the case within the jurisdiction of the superior court. The demurrer should have been overruled.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

VAN HOOSEAR v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA. (S. F. 10076.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 30, 1922.
Rehearing Denied July 27, 1922.)

1. Contempt $\S$ 24 — Jurisdiction to punish rests on ability of accused to comply with order.

It is essential to the jurisdiction to punish for contempt for disobeying the order of the court that the party charged shall have been able to comply with such order, unless he has voluntarily and contumaciously disabled himself.

2. Contempt $\S$ 63(4) — Adjudication must show power of guilty party to perform order.

Adjudication of contempt for failure to perform an act directed by the court is void as a basis for the imposition of punishment, unless it appears therefrom that it is within the power of the guilty person to perform the act.

3. Public service commissions $\S$ 19(4) — Lack of frankness in dealing with tribunal is not disregard affording basis for contempt proceedings.

That a party fails to act with frankness in dealing with the Railroad Commission, as in appearing at hearings concerning public utilities involved in certain properties without disclosing that he was not their owner, is not a contumacious disabling of himself from complying with the Commission's order such as to render him punishable for contempt.

4. Prohibition $\S$ 11 — Does not lie to correct errors of tribunals having jurisdiction.

Prohibition does not lie to prevent a subordinate court from deciding erroneously or from enforcing an erroneous judgment in a case over which it has jurisdiction, and in such cases the superior court will leave the party aggrieved to his ordinary remedies, such as writ of error or certiorari.

5. Prohibition — 28—Record will be examined to ascertain petitioner's ability to obey order of the Railroad Commission in proceeding to restrain enforcement of judgment of contempt.

An application for writ of prohibition to restrain the Railroad Commission from enforcing its judgment of contempt, bringing up a complete record, will be treated as application for writ of review, and the court will determine jurisdictional facts and give the relief that the record warrants, notwithstanding the Public Utilities Act limits all review of the Commission's rulings to writ of certiorari, and where the evidence shows petitioner's inability to obey the order upon which the contempt is founded, as where the Commission had not adjudicated the extent of his control over a water system regarding which its order was issued, relief from the judgment of contempt will be granted.

In Bank.

Application for writ of prohibition by William S. Van Hoosear, petitioner, prayed to be directed against the Railroad Commission of the State of California, respondent, to prevent the enforcement of a judgment of commitment for contempt. Order convicting petitioner of contempt annulled.

H. S. Craig, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Hugh Gordon and William W. Clary, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This is a proceeding to prohibit the enforcement of a judgment committing the petitioner for contempt in disobeying an order of the State Railroad Commission.

In proceedings duly had the Railroad Commission determined on December 23, 1919, by the decision of said Commission, that the petitioner, William S. Van Hoosear, was in the control of a certain public utility water system within this state, consisting of a flowing spring and pipe line therefrom, used and operated for the purpose of supplying water for domestic and other purposes to several consumers; that without authority of law he had discontinued such service, and it was by the Commission adjudged as follows:

"It is hereby ordered that said William S. Van Hoosear be and he is hereby directed to re-establish the public utility service of water to his consumers in Castro Valley within (5) five days of the date of this order and to continue such public utility service at the rates herein found to be the legal rates in effect.

"It is hereby ordered that William S. Van Hoosear be and he is hereby directed to file the above rates with this commission within 10 days of the date of this order."

This proceeding and order of the Railroad Commission was afterwards before this court on a writ of review, and on December 22, 1920, an opinion and order was filed therein, affirming the order and decision of the Commission. 194 Pac. 1003.

The foregoing order of the Railroad Commission, thus approved and affirmed, is the basis for the contempt proceedings now before us. Van Hoosear, the petitioner here, was cited for contempt for failing and refusing to comply with the order to restore the water service.

Proceedings in due form were had before the Commission, and petitioner was found guilty of contempt for disobeying the order of the Commission, and on the 1st of December, 1921, it was adjudged by the Railroad Commission that he be punished therefor by paying a fine of $250, and in default thereof that he be imprisoned in the county jail for 30 days.

Petitioner seeks to restrain the enforcement of this judgment on the ground that the Railroad Commission has exceeded its jurisdiction in imposing this penalty.

The facts in the case are practically undisputed, and we will proceed to consider such issues as are presented which are essential to determining petitioner's right to the relief demanded without reference to the manner or order in which they are pleaded.

That the Railroad Commission has jurisdiction to punish for contempt is sufficiently manifest. Const., art. 12, § 22; Public Utilities Act (St. [Ex. Sess.] 1911, pp. 48, 62) §§ 54, 81; Pacific Telephone, etc., Co. v. Eshelman, 166 Cal. 640, 650, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822. The jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission in this matter is sustained on the face of the record so far as concerns the validity of the order which petitioner is charged with disobeying, and the right of the Commission to enforce it, and the citation and proceedings for contempt were regularly had and conducted.

So far as we are able to discover, the only question of jurisdiction to punish petitioner arises upon the sufficiency of the record to show that petitioner was legally able to comply with the order at the time the citation for contempt was issued. By his verified answer to the affidavit and citation for contempt, petitioner alleged that he had not been the owner of said water system, or the land on which it was situated, since the month of June, 1910. That on that date he had conveyed all of this property to his wife, Margaret P. Van Hoosear, and that she had ever since continued as the sole owner in possession of the same to the 15th day of November, 1919, at which date she sold and transferred said real property, with the springs located thereon, to one F. J. Lewis, who had ever since been the owner thereof.

The Public Utility Act under which the Railroad Commission obtained control of water service utilities was not in existence at the time of the alleged conveyance of this property to petitioner's wife, and petitioner was not, according to his answer, the owner thereof at the time the water service was discontinued or at the time the order of December 23, 1919, to re-establish such service was made, or during any of the proceedings culminating in the judgment for contempt. In short, if the deeds pleaded in the answer herein are recognized as valid transfers of title, the petitioner at no time covered by the proceedings shown in this record was the owner of this water system.

In this connection it may be said that the evidence produced before the Commission in the contempt proceedings, without dispute, bears out the allegations of the answer as to the transfers of this property, and there seems to be no ground to question that Margaret P. Van Hoosear, and later, F. J. Lewis, and not the petitioner here, were, at all times covered by claim of jurisdiction by the Railroad Commission, the legal owners of the property constituting the alleged water system. So far as the rights of Mrs. Van Hoosear and C. F. Lewis are concerned, it is apparent that they are not affected by any of the proceedings before or on behalf of the Railroad Commission, as neither of them was at any time made a party thereto.

Regarding the effect of the judgment and order of December 23, 1919, as fixing the status of this property as a public utility water system as to petitioner, William S. Van Hoosear, there can be no doubt. He appeared in the proceedings, submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the Commission, and at no time prior to the citation for contempt in any way disclaimed ownership and control of the property.

Nothing has occurred since the judgment of December 23, 1919, so far as disclosed, to alter the situation as regards the petitioner. There was available at that time the same defense to the order requiring him to resume the water service, as that interposed to the judgment in contempt for disobeying that order.

It may be noted, however, that in the judgment directing a resumption of the water service there was no adjudication of the nature and extent of petitioner's interest in or control over the water system. And we know of nothing to estop him from showing as an excuse for failing to obey the commissioner's order that he had no legal rights in the premises that would permit him to resume the operation of the system, which the former decision of the Railroad Commission showed that he had discontinued and abandoned.

As already indicated, it appears beyond dispute that the petitioner at no time covered by the proceedings of the Railroad Commission had any title or ownership of the physical properties constituting the water system. The title was in his wife, and pending the proceedings she conveyed her title to C. F. Lewis. This she could do without permission from the Railroad Commission, as she was at no time a party to the proceedings taken by the Commission. After the sale of the premises to Lewis the record before us shows without controversy that the latter took possession of the land and the springs, and that petitioner no longer had any right, interest, or possession under which he could obey the order to resume the operation of the water system. He testified that upon the transfer of this property by his wife to Lewis there was no reservation of any kind relating to the water, and that he thereafter had or exercised no rights of ownership or control therein. Whatever control he may have reserved or exercised while his wife owned the premises was terminated on the sale to Lewis. This testimony, as well as the presumptions arising from transfer of title, were not disputed. Under this state of facts it is clear that at the time the contempt was charged the petitioner here was without right or power to obey the order of the Railroad Commission to resume the distribution of water.

[1, 2] It is essential to the jurisdiction to punish for contempt for disobeying the order of a court that the party charged shall have been able to comply with such order, unless he has voluntarily and contumaciously disabled himself from complying. Ex parte Cohen, 6 Cal. 318; Galland v. Galland, 44 Cal. 475, 13 Am. Rep. 167; Ex parte Silvia, 123 Cal. 293, 55 Pac. 988, 69 Am. St. Rep. 58; Ex parte Todd, 119 Cal. 57, 50 Pac. 1071. And an order "adjudging one guilty of contempt for failure to perform an act directed by the court is void as a basis for the imposition of punishment, unless it appears therefrom that it is within the power of such person to perform the act" (Bakeman v. Superior Court, 37 Cal. App. 785, 174 Pac. 911), and a mere recital in the order that obedience thereto is willfully refused is not sufficient. In re Cowden, 139 Cal. 244, 73 Pac. 156.

[3] In the present case the petitioner cannot be held to have contumaciously disabled himself to obey the order of the Commission, unless he can be held responsible for the act of his wife in disposing of the property, and there is no evidence to support such a conclusion. It may be true that he did not act with frankness or fairness to the Commission in failing to disclose before the original order was made that this property had been conveyed to Lewis, but that is another matter. He is not charged with having contumaciously put it out of his power to obey the order of the Commission.

In Egilbert v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. App.

190, 91 Pac. 748, on petition for writ of review of an order committing for contempt of court, the petitioner had been ordered to produce certain books of a corporation of which he was secretary. He had resigned as such secretary before the order had been served on him. In the absence of a showing that such resignation was brought about to avoid compliance with the order, the court was held without jurisdiction to punish for contempt. As Justice Chipman says in the opinion:

"The fact that Egilbert withheld from the court the fact of his resignation on May 20th, and allowed the court to grant the writ under the impression that Egilbert was then the secretary, is not the ground on which the contempt judgment is based. That judgment rested on his failure and refusal to produce the books of the company."

[4] A more serious question presented on the consideration of this petition is whether prohibition is the proper remedy. Prohibition is directed only to the jurisdiction of the court or tribunal to act in the premises, rather than to the question as to whether it has acted in the proper exercise of its jurisdiction. In the present case the judicial function of the Railroad Commission had terminated. Its judgment of commitment had been made, and it is only sought here to restrain the ministerial act of enforcing the penalty.

Moreover, there is room for contention that the judgment on its face shows jurisdiction. As heretofore stated, the only ground for attacking the judgment of the Commission is on the question of the ability of the petitioner to comply with the order on which the contempt is based. The finding of the Commission in the contempt proceeding is that at all times in said finding specified petitioner was the owner of this water system, and that during said time he operated and managed said system for compensation. If this finding can be construed as including the period covered by the contempt proceedings, as it was apparently intended to do, it is, in effect, a finding that petitioner was at the time able to comply with the order of the Commission. This was one of the facts which the Commission had jurisdiction to try, and it is contended that as against a writ of prohibition its finding is conclusive. The general rule applicable to prohibition is thus stated in High on Extraordinary Remedies, § 772:

The writ of prohibition "is never allowed to usurp the functions of a writ of error or certiorari, and it is never employed as a process for the correction of errors of inferior tribunals. And the courts will not permit the writ of prohibition, which proceeds upon the ground of an excess of jurisdiction, to take the place of or be confounded with a writ of error, which proceeds upon the ground of error in the exercise of jurisdiction which is conceded.

"The proper functions of a prohibition being to check the usurpation by inferior tribunals, and to confine them within the limits prescribed for their operation by law, it does not lie to prevent a subordinate court from deciding erroneously, or from enforcing an erroneous judgment in a case in which it has a right to adjudicate. In all cases, therefore, where the inferior court has jurisdiction of the matter in controversy, the superior court will refuse to interfere by prohibition, and will leave the party aggrieved to pursue the ordinary remedies for the correction of errors, such as the writ of error or certiorari."

This court has sustained this rule in recent decisions in denying prohibition to restrain a superior court from granting letters of administration, upon a proffered showing that the decedent was not a resident of the state, or that there was no property of the decedent within the jurisdiction. Dungan v. Superior Court, 149 Cal. 102, 84 Pac. 767, 117 Am. St. Rep. 119. Similar rulings have been made denying prohibition where a complaint fails to state a cause of action, or where the evidence is alleged to be insufficient to sustain a judgment. Brush v. Smith, 141 Cal. 469, 75 Pac. 55; Lange v. Superior Court, 11 Cal. App. 1, 103 Pac. 908. These, however, were cases where there was a remedy by appeal. In a contempt proceeding there is no remedy by appeal, and unless the jurisdiction can be attacked by a showing that there is no evidence to support the judgment it would appear that the defendant is without remedy, unless it can be provided under a writ of review.

There is also the question as to the authority of this court to restrain the action of the Railroad Commission by prohibition, even in the matter of contempt proceedings, in the light of the general limitation by the Public Utilities Act of all review of the rulings of the Commission to the writ of certiorari.

[5] We do not deem it necessary, however, to attempt to solve these doubts as to the application of prohibition to this matter, as we are satisfied that the record before us presents a case for consideration as under application for a writ of review. The petition was made in time, and a complete record has been brought up on this hearing, including a transcript of the evidence. Under these circumstances, although the petition may have demanded the wrong relief, there is no reason why, with the facts before us, this court should not give such relief as the record so presented warrants. Johnson v. Polhemus, 99 Cal. 240, 244, 33 Pac. 908; Zellerbach v. Allenberg, 99 Cal. 57, 68, 33 Pac. 786; Code Civ. Proc. § 580.

That under a writ of review the evidence of facts upon which the lower court or tribunal depended for its jurisdiction may be considered, and its judgment set aside if jurisdiction is without support in the evidence, is beyond dispute.

In McClatchy v. Superior Court, 119 Cal. 413, at page 418, 51 Pac. 696, 698 (39 L. R. A. 691) it is said:

"While the writ of certiorari is not a writ of error, 'it is nevertheless,' as suggested in Schwarz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 112, 'a means by which the power of the court in the premises can be inquired into; and for this purpose the review extends, not only to the whole of the record of the court below, but even to the evidence itself, when necessary to determine the jurisdictional fact.' If, then, by looking at the evidence we can see that the court exceeded its power, we have a right to examine the evidence for that purpose."

To the same effect: Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35; Federal Construction Co. v. Graham, 33 Cal. App. Dec. 698.¹

As already pointed out, the evidence showing petitioner's inability to obey the order of the Commission stands without conflict.

The order convicting petitioner of contempt was therefore in excess of the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission, and must be annulled. It is so ordered.

Insurance — 31—Amendment penalizing secreting of insured property inapplicable to acts of secreting, committed before amendment's effective date.

Pen. Code, § 548, penalizing the destruction of insured property to defraud the insurer, was amended by St. 1921, p. 99, to penalize also the secreting and disposing of such property with such intent. Held that conviction of secreting and disposing could not be sustained, where the only act committed in the county of prosecution was the removal, before the amendment's effective date, of insured property from accused's dwelling in that county to F. county, and the property thereafter remained in F. county, and, after the destruction by fire of the dwelling, proofs of loss, including the removed property, were made in F. county.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of secreting and disposing of insured property with intent to defraud the insurer thereof. From the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial he prosecutes this appeal.

The indictment alleges that the crime was committed on or about July 19, 1921, in Madera county. The evidence shows that, prior to the 19th day of July, 1921, the defendant removed certain insured personal property from his residence in Madera county to the city of Fresno, in Fresno county, where it remained until December 28, 1921, when it was taken into custody by the officers of Madera county. The defendant's dwelling house, from which the property had been removed, together with the contents thereof, was destroyed by fire July 19, 1921. In his proofs of loss the defendant seems to have included the property which he had removed as stated. These proofs were made in Fresno.

The defendant was prosecuted under section 548 of the Penal Code. At the time of the alleged offense that section made it criminal to burn, injure, or destroy insured property with intent to defraud the insurer thereof. That section was amended in 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 99), effective July 29, 1921, making it a crime to burn, injure, destroy, secrete, abandon, or dispose of insured property with intent to defraud the insurer. From the foregoing statement it is apparent that no element of the crime charged was committed in Madera county after the amendment went into effect. At the hearing on appeal, the respondent did not contest this proposition, but submitted the matter without argument on behalf of the people. Of whatever crime the defendant may be guilty, it is plain that he did not commit the offense charged in Madera county.

The judgment and order are reversed.

W. T. Belieu and R. L. Clifton, both of Willows, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor in no-license territory in violation of the Wyllie Law and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The principal witnesses against the defendant were two detectives who were in the employ of an organization known as the State Law and Enforcement League. They were operating in Glenn county, at the request of the sheriff and district attorney thereof, for the purpose of securing evidence of violations of law. One of the detectives sought to purchase liquor from the defendant at a point on one of the streets, and defendant agreed to furnish the same. Thereupon the detective paid the defendant the price of the liquor to be furnished, and it was agreed that the liquor would be delivered on the opposite side of the street. The defendant then left, and the other detective shadowed him until the liquor was delivered at the appointed place. The defendant went directly to his home, where he remained from 20 to 30 minutes, and thence to the appointed meeting place and delivered the liquor. Both detectives testified as to the fact of delivery. An analysis of the liquor showed its alcoholic content to be 22 per cent. The defendant denied that he knew the detectives or sold or furnished the liquor.

[1] It is urged that the defendant was trapped into the commission of the offense. The defendant was in no wise induced to make the unlawful sale except by the mere request for the liquor and payment of the price thereof. This court has decided adversely to appellant's contention in People v. Barkdoll, 36 Cal. App. 25, 171 Pac. 440, and People v. Tomasovich, 206 Pac. 119.

[2] It is contended that the detectives were accomplices, and that therefore a conviction upon their uncorroborated testimony cannot be sustained. It is clear that they were not accomplices. People v. Bunkers, 2 Cal. App. 197, 84 Pac. 364, 370; People v. Keseling, 35 Cal. App. 501, 170 Pac. 627.

[3] It is next contended that the defendant was the mere agent of the detective, in securing the liquor. It appears from the evidence that the defendant took the liquor from his own home and delivered it to the purchaser. There is no intimation in the evidence that the defendant secured the liquor from a third person after he had agreed to furnish it and had been paid therefor. He denied that he furnished it at all. Not only is there an entire absence of proof of agency, but the only reasonable inference from the evidence is that the defendant procured the liquor from his own stock.

[4] The defendant requested instructions in accordance with the foregoing contentions here made, but the court refused them, and instructed the jury that "it is no defense for the defendant to show, if he has shown such, that the purchase was made at the instance or request of persons employed by the district attorney, sheriff, or other officials to find out illegal sellers of intoxicating liquor, if you believe from the evidence that the defendant was ready, able and willing to make the sale." In this there was no error.

[5] The court refused to instruct the jury that it is not a crime to purchase liquor in no-license territory. There was no evidence to which the proposed instruction is applicable.

The court fully and correctly instructed the jury on all questions of law applicable to the case, and the record is free from error.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Action of unlawful detainer by Henry Watkins against Dorothy A. McCartney and E. J. McCartney, her husband. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hearing denied; WILBUR, J., dissenting.

Howard Prowse, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Samuel J. Crawford, of Ocean Park, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action in unlawful detainer. Plaintiff had judgment, from which defendants appeal.

As alleged in the complaint, plaintiff, on September 1, 1920, upon an oral agreement for a monthly tenancy, let the premises in question to defendants at a rental of $35 a month, under which defendants took possession thereof. On January 11, 1921, plaintiff served upon defendants a notice that said lease would be terminated and defendants required to surrender and quit possession of the premises at the expiration of the month commencing February 1, 1921, and thereafter, on March 3d, served a three-day notice requiring them to vacate the premises.

By their answer defendants alleged that on October 2, 1920, plaintiff executed and delivered to defendant Dorothy A. McCartney a document reading as follows:

"2659 Ocean Front, Ocean Park, Calif.

"10/2/20.

"It is agreed that Dorothy A. McCartney may keep my property, No. 2711 Ocean Front, Ocean Park, at monthly rental of $35.00 per month, and forty dollars for July and August until a bona fide sale is made sixty days' notice.

"Received of Dorothy A. McCartney $35.00. rent in full to November 1st, 20.

"[Signed] Henry Watkins"

—under which defendant Dorothy A. McCartney entered into possession of the premises and at all times occupied the same, and further alleged that it was understood and agreed that said lease should not be terminated by plaintiff, except upon 60 days' notice thereof given to said lessee.

[1] The court found that plaintiff signed and delivered the above-quoted agreement, but that the same was not signed by defendants or either of them, from which, as a conclusion of law, it found that the tenancy was terminated by the written notice of less than 60 days so served upon defendants by plaintiff. In so doing we think the court erred. Since defendant Dorothy A. McCartney entered into possession under the terms of the instrument, her obligation was not affected by her failure to sign the same. Where a lease recites that the lessee is to pay a certain sum as rent for the premises, his acceptance of the lease makes him a direct obligor or promisor to pay the rent during his occupation thereof, although he has not signed or executed the instrument. Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 77; Chandler v. Hart, 161 Cal. 405, 119 Pac. 516, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1094; 1 Underhill on Landlord and Tenant, § 232.

[2] As we construe the instrument, it constituted a lease made by plaintiff to defendant Dorothy A. McCartney from month to month, subject, however, to termination, not by the giving of the statutory notice of 30 days, which plaintiff expressly waived, but, as provided in the agreement, to be terminated upon 60 days' notice thereof given to her; and, as stated, this provision for 60 days' notice was none the less effectual because of her failure to sign the document. Some effect must be given to the term "sixty days' notice," and we think it could only have reference to notice terminating the lease. Not only does this fact appear from the instrument itself, but it is made apparent from the circumstances under which the instrument was executed, to wit, the fact that she had previously occupied the premises under a like informal instrument that provided for 30 days' notice, and upon plaintiff refusing to sign an instrument providing for 90 days' notice to quit, the one in question was prepared, providing for 60 days' notice, which he executed. Under the terms of the writing, the term of the lease, while from month to month, could only be terminated by a notice of 60 days, which was not given.

Our decision renders it unnecessary to discuss other points made by appellants.

The judgment is reversed.

WRIGHT v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 3845.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 22, 1922.)

1. Justices of the peace ⇨ 140—Statute as to time of appeal not modified by statute as to notice of rendition of judgment.

Code Civ. Proc. § 974, providing that parties dissatisfied with the judgment rendered in a civil action in justice's court may appeal therefrom to the superior court at any time within 30 days after rendition of judgment, was not affected by section 893, providing that notice of rendition of judgment must be given parties in writing, signed by justice; the judgment being rendered at time it is entered in judgment docket.

2. Justices of the peace ⇨ 155(1)—Failure to file moratorium affidavit does not affect question of time of filing appeal.

The fact that no moratorium affidavit was filed in an action in the justice court in no way affects the question of whether the appeal to the superior court was prosecuted in time.

Application for writ of prohibition by Warren E. Wright against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County to prevent further proceedings on appeal from a justice's court. Writ granted.

Holcomb & Holcomb, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

David R. Faries and John R. Berryman, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition. Petitioner was plaintiff in an action pending in the justice court and procured judgment against defendant therein. More than 30 days after the justice had tried the cause, and had made the entry in his docket, "Judgment for plaintiff" for a certain amount and costs, defendant in the action filed his notice of appeal from the judgment. Respondent court denied a motion to dismiss the appeal. Petitioner, contending that the motion should have been granted, seeks now to prohibit respondent from proceeding further with the action. An alternative writ of prohibition was issued upon the filing of the petition, and the present question is whether the writ shall be made peremptory.

[1] Section 974, Code of Civil Procedure, as it stood when the justice made the above-mentioned entry in his docket and when the notice of appeal by the defendant from the judgment of the justice was filed, provided that "any party dissatisfied with a judgment rendered in a civil action in a police or justice's court, may appeal therefrom to the superior court of the county, at any time within thirty days after the rendition of the judgment," and it was decided in Thomson v. Superior Court, 161 Cal. 329, 119 Pac. 98, that a judgment is "rendered" in an action in a justice court when the justice makes entry in his docket of the fact that judgment has gone for one party or the other. Respondent contends, however, that section 893, Code of Civil Procedure, as it was amended after the decision in Thomson v. Superior Court, changed the law as before that amendment it had stood in section 974; in other words, that the amended section 893 operated to amend 974. The matter in section 893 which is supposed to have worked this change in the law is embraced in the sentence, "Notice of the rendition of judgment must be given to the parties to the action in writing signed by the justice;" the statement being followed by language directing how the notice is to be given. The contention of respondent is that, under the amended section 893, a judgment is not rendered by a justice until he has given the notice required by the sentence which we have quoted. This contention, surely, finds its refutation in the sentence itself. A justice is required by it to give notice "of the rendition of judgment"; that is, he is to give notice of a past and completed transaction. It is as if the Legislature had required him to give notice "that he has rendered judgment." We are satisfied that the notice of appeal was filed too late.

[2] Respondent alleges in his answer to the petition that no moratorium affidavit was filed in the action in the justice court, and contends in his brief, as if the contention could affect the question now before us, that the justice had no jurisdiction to render judgment without the filing of such an affidavit. The failure to file the affidavit could in no way affect the question whether the appeal to respondent court was prosecuted in time.

A peremptory writ of prohibition will issue as prayed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. Appellant was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, and the penalty of life imprisonment was imposed. Thereafter he moved for a new trial and for an arrest of judgment, both of which motions were denied. He appeals from the final judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Appellant attacks the judgment upon the ground that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence. The case against appellant rests upon the testimony of the two Chinese witnesses, Yee Young and Wong Kai. From the testimony of these witnesses it appears that three or four Chinese entered a gambling room where the deceased was playing dominoes, one of whom shot the deceased while standing behind him. This assailant then fled from the room. The deceased followed his assailant into the hallway, shooting at him as he ran, and then fell to the floor. Three other Chinese were wounded. The appellant, it was said, approached the deceased as he was lying upon the floor and emptied his revolver into his body. Yee Young testified that he thereupon followed the appellant out into Grant avenue and had him in sight until he pointed him out to the officer who made the arrest.

[2, 3] It is the contention on the part of the appellant that the shooting was the result of a tong war in which the deceased and the two Chinese witnesses who testified against the appellant were members of one tong and the appellant was a member of another tong. For this reason it is argued that the testimony of these two witnesses should not be believed, and particular attention is drawn to the fact that their testimony is so closely identical that it bears evidence of having been memorized by them for the purpose of the trial. But these are matters which, even in a case of this nature, must be left to the judgment of the trial jury and to the discretion of the trial judge, who had this same question before him in passing upon the motion for a new trial.

[4] It is further argued that appellant's motion for a new trial should have been granted upon the showing that Lum Yap Wan, one of the Chinese who had been wounded at the time, was not available at the time of the trial but had thereafter made his affidavit to the effect that he had witnessed the shooting of Go Foin; that two shots were fired into his body by a Chinese wearing an army overcoat who was not the appellant in this case; that thereafter Go Foin started to run after his assailant when he was attacked by another Chinese named Leong Tong, who shoved Go Foin over in the hallway and then fired at least two shots into his body; and that Chew Juey was not either of the men who participated in the shooting. Though the evidence which appellant proposed to present through this witness would have been sufficient to warrant the granting of a new trial if the trial court had made the order, it is merely cumulative and would not justify our saying that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the motion.

[5, 6] Criticism is made of the instruction of the trial court to the effect that, in weighing the testimony given by the witness Yee Young, the jury should disregard any of the testimony tending to show that he had been indicted by the grand jury for criminal conspiracy. The subject-matter of the instruction was the question of impeachment of witnesses. Section 2051 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a witness may not be impeached by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that it may be shown that he had been convicted of felony. The testimony relating to Yee Young's indictment was introduced for the purpose of showing that he was a member of a certain Chinese tong which had been having some trouble with the tong of which appellant was a member and that the witness had been charged with a conspiracy to commit a murder growing out of this tong war. The testimony was admitted without objection from the prosecution and was admissible for the purpose of showing the interest of the witness in the prosecution of the appellant. As a general rule it is not advisable for the trial court to single out a particular witness and to instruct the jury in any manner as to how it may weigh the testimony of that witness, but we do not believe that the instruction under consideration is so prejudicial to the interests of the appellant as to require a reversal of the judgment.

Other points raised do not require consideration.

Judgment affirmed.

WELLS v. DIAS et al. (Civ. 4213.)

1. Easements ⚡5—Adverse user, to give title, must be hostile, under claim of right, communicated to the owner of the land.

A right of way by prescription over land can only be created by user, which is neither expressly nor impliedly licensed and permissive, and such user must be adverse and hostile, and under a claim of right communicated to the owner of the land.

2. Easements ⚡36(1)—Twenty years' adverse user without objection held to raise presumption of claim of right.

Where evidence showed a road had been in existence 45 years, and had been used by plaintiff and his predecessors in interest for over 20 years, openly, continuously, and without hindrance from any source, it is presumed that the user was under a claim of right and adverse to the owner, and such presumption, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, is sufficient to establish a prescriptive right of way.

3. Easements ⚡61(9½)—Adverse user under claim of right held for court or jury.

In suit by landowner against another landowner to enjoin defendants from interfering with the use of a right of way over their land, the question as to whether previous use of the way was under claim of right, or as a mere matter of neighborly accommodation, was one for the court or jury to determine.

4. Easements ⚡10(1)—Use of way with public does not prevent presumption of grant arising.

In suit by landowner against another landowner to enjoin interference with the right of way over defendants' land, the fact that the public in general used the same way with plaintiff did not prevent the presumption of a grant arising from more than 10 years' adverse user by plaintiff.

5. Appeal and error ⚡1050(1)—Admission of evidence to show right of way by necessity held, if error, not prejudicial.

In suit by landowner against another landowner to enjoin interference with a right of way over defendants' land, in which plaintiff claimed the right of way by prescription, admitting evidence to show a right of way by necessity, which in no manner could have controlled any finding made in the case, or changed the result, was, if error, not prejudicial.

6. Easements ⚡36(3)—Presence of gate over way held not to affect finding of acquisition of way by prescription.

In action by landowner against another landowner to enjoin interference with a way over defendants' land, in which plaintiff claimed a right of way by prescription, the fact that, when defendants' land was inclosed, gates were placed across the way to prevent cattle from destroying crops, and that such gates did not interfere with plaintiff's use of the way, did not affect a finding that plaintiff had acquired a way by prescription.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Suit by C. P. Wells against M. A. Dias and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank Kauke, of Fresno, and H. R. Crozier, of Sanger, for appellants.

Thomas F. Lopez, of Fresno, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This action was brought to enjoin defendants from interfering with the use and enjoyment of an alleged right of way over the lands of defendants. Plaintiff claimed that the right of way has been used openly and adversely by him and his grantor and by others as a means of ingress and egress to his lands for wagons, teams, and vehicles, for more than 10 years prior to the filing of the complaint. Defendant denied that plaintiff had any such right of way or other interest in the lands, and by cross-complaint alleged that he was the sole owner thereof, and prayed that his title be quieted as against the plaintiff, whom he seeks to enjoin from further trespassing upon the property. Trial was had before the court sitting without a jury. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals.

From the record it appears that one Manuel Valenzuela, some 25 years ago, procured title to the land upon which the easement is claimed, partly by homesteading and partly by purchase. Valenzuela conveyed to one Merz, who in turn sold to defendant about 2 years prior to the filing of this complaint. Situated on the property in question is a road. This road is known as the Jacalitos Creek road, and it runs in a northerly and southerly direction through the lower foothills of the Coast Range mountains some distance out from the city of Coalinga in Fresno county. The road follows Jacalitos creek, which creek flows through and over the property of defendant, and enables plaintiff and others who live in the immediate neighborhood to reach Coalinga and the plains below, which lie east of the Coast Range mountains. Plaintiff's property and residence is located in a southerly direction from, and a short distance above, defendant's lands.

In July, 1920, defendant laid a pipe line across the road, making it more or less impassable, and prevented plaintiff from using the same. The present suit followed. The trial court found that for more than 20 years last past the road in question existed and still exists, and that it has been used during all of said time by plaintiff and his predecessors in interest for the purpose of going to and from their property. It further found that for more than 10 years plaintiff and his predecessors have used the road uninterruptedly, openly, notoriously, continuously, and adversely to the rights of defendant and his predecessors in interest, and with their full knowledge, and without asking or receiving permission from any one, and without objection, and that plaintiff by such use had acquired a right by prescription to the claimed easement. The sole question here presented is whether or not the evidence supports the finding that plaintiff acquired by prescription a right of way over and through the lands in question.

[1, 2] Such a right can only be created by user, which is neither expressly or impliedly licensed or permissive, and such user must be adverse and hostile and under a claim of right communicated to the owner of the land. Where, however, the user is continuous, or openly and notoriously adverse to the owner, it creates a presumptive knowledge in him that the person using the land is doing so under a claim of right. Here the evidence shows without conflict that the road in question has always been in existence, or at least so since 1877, and has been used by plaintiff and his predecessors in interest for over 20 years, openly, continuously, and without hindrance from any source. In such a case it is to be presumed that the use of the easement was under a claim of right and adverse to the owner, and such presumption, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, is sufficient to establish a prescriptive right of way. Yuba Consolidated Goldfields v. Hilton, 16 Cal. App. 228, 116 Pac. 712, 715.

[3] Appellant, while conceding the user, contends that the evidence merely shows that the road was used by plaintiff in common with the public in general by way of neighborly accommodation, and that plaintiff never communicated to defendant any claim of right to travel over the land. The question as to whether the use was under claim of right or as a mere matter of neighborly accommodation is one for the court or jury to determine as a fact in the light of the relations between the parties and all the surrounding circumstances. Humphreys v. Blasingame, 104 Cal. 40, 37 Pac. 804; Fleming v. Howard, 150 Cal. 28, 87 Pac. 908; Conaway v. Toogood, 172 Cal. 706, 158 Pac. 200. The findings upon this subject will not, therefore, be disturbed.

[4] Further claim is made that no presumption of grant of right of way could arise where there is evidence to show that the way was used in common with the public. We see no merit in this contention. The user on the part of plaintiff was in no manner impaired by the enjoyment of a like right in others. Whatever may have been the nature of their use, the claimed easement of plaintiff was not based thereon, nor dependent for its enjoyment upon this fact. The evidence upon this subject shows that the use enjoyed by plaintiff and his predecessors was had under such circumstances as would indicate to the owner of the land that such use was claimed by them as of right, and that it was not regarded by the parties as a mere privilege revocable at the pleasure of the owner of the soil, and it is sufficient to warrant and support the findings. Tarpey v. Veith, 22 Cal. App. 289, 292, 134 Pac. 367.

[5, 6] Complaint is made of the admission of evidence on the part of plaintiff tending to show a right of way by necessity rather than by prescription. Conceding the admission of this evidence to have been erroneous, it is without prejudice, as it in no manner could have controlled any finding or changed the result of the case. Humphreys v. Blasingame, 104 Cal. 40, 37 Pac. 804. Nor does the fact that the evidence shows that the road was barred by gates which were required to be opened and closed in passing over the land, affect the finding that plaintiff had acquired a prescriptive use. Bolger v. Foss, 65 Cal. 250, 3 Pac. 871; Jones on Easements, § 279. The evidence upon this subject merely showed that, when fences were first erected upon the property, gates were placed thereon to prevent cattle from destroying the crops, and that they in no manner interfered with plaintiff's enjoyment of the easement.

From what we have said, it follows that the judgment should be, and it is, hereby affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 5, 1922. Rehearing Denied May 31, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 3, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 1024(5)—On conflicting evidence as to entering satisfaction of judgment refusal to set it aside affirmed.

On appeal from an order denying a motion to set aside satisfaction of a judgment, evidence held to present a sufficient conflict to require the appellate court to support the order of the trial court denying the motion to set aside the satisfaction of judgment.

2. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 898(1)—That satisfaction is entered without consideration does not require court to set it aside on motion.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 675, relating to methods of satisfying a judgment, and providing that when a judgment is satisfied in fact otherwise than upon execution a party or attorney must give such acknowledgment or make such indorsement, where a party entered a satisfaction on a judgment without consideration, the court was not required on motion to set the satisfaction aside.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Morgan, Judge.

Action by John Dern against E. A. Dein. From an order denying plaintiff's motion to set aside satisfaction of a judgment for plaintiff, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied; WILBUR, J., dissenting.

Geo. D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goldman, Nye & Surr and Douglas A. Nye, all of San Francisco, and Morgan V. Spicer, of Berkeley, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court denying plaintiff's motion to vacate and set aside the satisfaction of judgment which had theretofore been duly executed and filed in the action. The appeal is presented upon a bill of exceptions, which contains merely the affidavits which were presented to the trial court at the hearing upon the motion, a copy of the original judgment in the action, and a copy of the satisfaction of that judgment. There is also added to the transcript a copy of the judgment roll made up after the trial of the original action in 1914, a copy of the minute order denying plaintiff's motion to vacate the satisfaction of said judgment, and a copy of the notice of appeal from said order. The record does not contain either the motion which was the basis of this order or the notice thereof, and we are unable to ascertain from the record the grounds upon which the motion was made. We are informed in the briefs that the motion was based upon the grounds that satisfaction was made without consideration, that it was untrue in point of fact and that it was made merely for the purpose of releasing a certain lien of the judgment to assist the respondent in procuring a renewal of a loan which he had upon a piece of property covered by the judgment lien. If these were the grounds and the only grounds upon which the motion was made, they all present questions of fact which the trial court was called upon to determine. From the affidavits which are included in the bill of exceptions it appears that to some extent at least there was a conflict between the parties as to these facts. In support of the judgment, of course, we are bound to conclude that the trial court resolved these questions of fact against the appellant.

[1] It is urged by appellant, however, that there is no conflict on the fact that the satisfaction was executed without consideration, and that no part of the judgment was paid at the time when the satisfaction was executed. The facts are that appellant, who is the uncle of respondent, had recovered a judgment on default, and that this judgment had become a lien upon a piece of property which the respondent owned. This property was subject to a prior lien evidenced by a deed of trust to a bank for a loan of money advanced to respondent. The time had come when this deed must either be renewed or foreclosed. If renewed it would become a second lien to the lien of appellant's judgment. When confronted with this situation the respondent sought his uncle, and persuaded him to file and record a satisfaction of the judgment in order that he might renew the lien due the bank. The satisfaction was executed by the appellant, and personally recorded by him upon the promise of respondent that notwithstanding the entry of the satisfaction of judgment he would make payments on the judgment when he was able to do so. It is not alleged that the satisfaction was procured by fraud, misrepresentation, or undue influence on the part of respondent. So far as appears, it was executed willingly, and the affidavits submitted by respondent allege that it was executed after appellant had been fully and fairly advised of its true legal effect. It also appears that some time after the satisfaction was executed the respondent paid the sum of $65 upon the judgment.

[2] In view of these facts, we cannot say that there is no conflict in the evidence presented; but, even if it were true that the satisfaction was entered without consideration, we do not understand that that fact alone requires the court on motion to set the satisfaction aside. The law does not invite litigation or encourage it to be continued, and a judgment creditor may terminate it by filing a satisfaction in the manner prescribed in section 675, Code of Civil Procedure.

Order affirmed.

BOGMUDA v. YOUNG, Superior Court Judge.
(Civ. 2495.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 27, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 24, 1922.)

1. Courts  12(5)—Jurisdictional fact of defendant's residence need not appear in records.

Proof that defendant resides in the judicial township of suit is jurisdictional, but it is not required that the fact of such residence shall appear in the complaint or judgment or any records in the case.

2. Certiorari  66—Presumption of sufficiency of evidence to support decision of superior court on jurisdictional question indulged.

Upon appeal from the decision of the justice's court upon the question of jurisdiction of the person, the superior court has jurisdiction of that question, and, upon application for certiorari to review the superior court, it must be presumed there was evidence to support its judgment, even if the sufficiency of the evidence could be questioned in such proceeding.

3. Justices of the peace §84(4), 161(3)—
Statutory grounds for dismissal for lack of jurisdiction not available after general appearance.

By entering general appearance in the justice's or superior court, defendant waives his right to question jurisdiction, under Code Civ. Proc. § 890, subd. 4, as amended in 1905, providing for a dismissal "when the action is brought in the wrong county, or township, or city."

4. Certiorari §28(2)—Does not lie to review decision of superior court on appeal from justice's court on jurisdictional question.

The decision of the superior court upon the question of jurisdiction of the person, brought up on appeal from the justice's court, given in regular pursuance of its authority, is final, and will not be reviewed by certiorari, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 832, providing that certain actions must be tried "in the township or city in which the defendant resides."

Petition by Pete Bogmuda for certiorari, against D. M. Young, as Judge of the Superior Court of the County of San Joaquin, State of California, respondent, to review the proceedings of the superior court, wherein F. D. Hart was plaintiff and petitioner was defendant on an appeal from justice's court, in an action for services rendered. Writ denied.

G. C. Allen and A. H. Carpenter, both of Stockton, for petitioner.

FINCH, P. J. Petitioner asks this court to review the proceedings in the superior court of San Joaquin county in a cause wherein F. D. Hart was plaintiff and petitioner was defendant.

It is alleged that Hart brought an action against petitioner in Stockton township, and in the complaint therein averred:

"That within two years last past said plaintiff rendered labor to said defendant, at the latter's special instance and request, in the agreed value of $325; that upon said amount the sum of $100 has been paid, leaving due the sum of $225, no part of which has been paid"; that summons was duly issued and served upon petitioner; "that thereafter, in obedience to said summons, and not voluntarily," the petitioner demurred to the complaint on the grounds "that the court has no jurisdiction either of the person of the defendant or the subject-matter of the action," and that the "complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action"; that the court overruled the demurrer, and the defendant answered, alleging "that the court has no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant or of the subject-matter of the action for the reason that the defendant is not, and never was, a resident of the said Stockton township, and the alleged contract to pay for the said pretended work and labor specified in said complaint, was not made in said Stockton township nor to be performed therein," denying the allegations of the complaint, and pleading a settlement and payment of the alleged indebtedness; that "at the trial of said cause in the justice's court the defendant called the attention of the justice to the fact that it had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action or of the person of the defendant, and objected to the justice's court determining any question but that of jurisdiction; the justice's court then and there overruled the defendant's objection * * * and rendered judgment against the defendant"; that the defendant appealed from such judgment "upon questions of both law and fact"; that in the superior court "the defendant * * * called the attention of said court to the fact that neither the justice's court nor the said superior court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action or of the person of the defendant, and then and there objected to the court determining any question but that of jurisdiction, but the defendant, as the judge of the said superior court, overruled the defendant's said objection and rendered judgment against said defendant"; that "neither the said justice's court nor the said superior court had jurisdiction in said case of the subject-matter of the action or of the person of the defendant, for the reason that it does not appear on the face of the complaint, or in the judgments entered therein, or in any of the records of said case, that either the said justice's court * * * or the said superior court * * * had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action * * * or jurisdiction of the person of the defendant."

[1, 2] Proof that a defendant resides in the judicial township in which he is sued is jurisdictional, but it is not required that the fact of such residence shall "appear on the face of the complaint, or in the judgment entered therein, or in any of the records" in the case. Jolley v. Foltz, 34 Cal. 321. See, also, In re Williams, 102 Cal. 70, 36 Pac. 407, 41 Am. St. Rep. 163. By his answer the defendant tendered the issue that his residence was not in Stockton township. By his appeal he asked the superior court to decide that issue. The court certainly had jurisdiction to determine the question thus raised. It does not appear from the petition that the court decided the question against petitioner's contention on insufficient evidence or without an opportunity to prove his place of residence. It must be presumed that there was evidence to support the judgment, even if the sufficiency of the evidence could be inquired into in this proceeding.

[3] Petitioner relies on the case of Holbrook v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 539, 39 Pac. 936, in support of his contention that the defense of want of jurisdiction can be raised by answer. At the time that case was decided section 890, subd. 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure provided for the dismissal of an action "when it is objected at the trial, and appears by the evidence, that the action is brought in the wrong county, or township, or city." In 1905 subdivision 4 was amended to provide for a dismissal "when the action is brought in the wrong county, or township, or city," and it is silent as to the manner in which the question may be raised. In Vance v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 191 Pac. 945, where the facts were similar to those here, the court said:

"By his general appearance in the justice's and superior court petitioner waived his right to raise the question of jurisdiction"—citing Olcese v. Justice's Court, 156 Cal. 82, 103 Pac. 317, and American Law Book Co. v. Superior Court, 164 Cal. 327.

[4] See, also, Roberts v. Police Court of City and County of San Francisco (Cal. Sup.) 195 Pac. 1053. The provision of section 832 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the effect that actions such as that here involved must be commenced and tried "in the township or city in which the defendant resides" relates to the jurisdiction over the person of the defendant. Ohio Southern R. Co. v. Morey, 47 Ohio St. 207, 24 N. E. 269, 7 L. R. A. 701. This proceeding is sought to review the action of the superior court, not that of the justice's court.

"This court has never recognized the right of a petitioner to a writ of certiorari to review the judgment of a justice's court after appeal taken and determined in the superior court." Olcese v. Justice's Court, supra.

"By its appeal to the superior court the petitioner submitted the question of want of jurisdiction of its person to the superior court and * * * the tribunal to which the appeal was thus prosecuted had the right to decide that question incorrectly as well as correctly." American Law Book Co. v. Superior Court, supra.

"If such tribunal has regularly pursued its authority, our inquiry stops." Matter of Hughes, 159 Cal. 360, 363, 113 Pac. 684, 686.

It does not appear from the petition herein that the superior court did not regularly pursue its authority.

The petition is denied.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 12, 1922.)

4. Fraudulent conveyances —57(1)—Deed of gift valid if grantor not indebted.

"A deed of gift is valid if the grantor was not indebted at the time he made it, or if he had other means outside of the property conveyed with which to pay his indebtedness.

2. Fraudulent conveyances —69(1)—With intent to defraud subsequent creditor is void as to such creditor.

A deed of gift, which is fraudulent in its inception and made with intent of grantor to defraud a future creditor, is as to such person void.

3. Fraudulent conveyances —69(1)—Conveyance by debtor knowing creditor dealt with him relying on ownership of property, annulled.

Where a debtor secretly and without knowledge of one with whom he contracts indebtedness transfers his property without consideration, knowing that the creditor in dealing with him relied upon his ownership, it constitutes actual fraud, and upon showing such facts the transfer may be annulled.

4. Fraudulent conveyances —263(1)—Creditor's not negating creditor's notice of debtor's gift of his property, before extending credit, held insufficient.

Where a deed of gift of realty from a father to his daughter was made on October 3d, in an action to set aside the deed as in fraud of creditor who provided necessities to the donor's wife, a complaint, not alleging that plaintiff was without knowledge of the transfer of October 3d, or that he was induced to furnish the goods in reliance on the fact and belief that the donor was still the owner of the property, and not alleging that the deed was not duly filed for record, etc., was insufficient, as it did not show that plaintiff was defrauded by the donor's act in giving the property to his daughter prior to the time the indebtedness was contracted.

5. Pleading —254 — After second amended complaint filed, no abuse of discretion in sustaining demurrer without leave to further plead.

Where the plaintiff failed after filing three complaints in an effort to state a cause of action, there was no abuse of discretion in sustaining the demurrer to the second amended complaint without leave to file a further complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action to annul certain debts on the ground of fraud, by Henry O. Goebel against Chenle Lee Gregg and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Rohe, Yakey & Devin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ticknor & Carter & Webster, of Pasadena, and S. L. Carpenter, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered for defendants following an order of court sustaining a general demurrer to the second amended complaint, without leave to further amend.

The purpose of the action was, upon the ground of fraud, to obtain a decree setting aside and annulling certain deeds of conveyance whereby defendant Boswell transferred to his daughter, Chenie Lee Gregg, certain real estate, which by her was conveyed to defendant Smith, and have the same adjudged to be subject to execution upon a judgment theretofore rendered in favor of plaintiff and against Boswell.

As appears from the complaint, the wife of defendant Boswell, owing to his cruel treatment of her, was, on the 12th day of October, 1918, compelled to leave the home which they jointly occupied, and commencing on said October 12, 1918, and continuing up to the time of her death, which occurred on January 26, 1920, plaintiff, at the special instance and request of Boswell, provided her with food, shelter, and other necessities of life, for which on May 25, 1920, he obtained a judgment against Boswell in the sum of $2,234.60. An execution issued thereon was returned nulla bona. It further appears that nine days before the making of the contract upon which the judgment was founded, to wit, on October 3, 1918, Boswell, without money consideration, conveyed the property in question to his daughter, who, on May 29, 1920, with her husband, and likewise without consideration, conveyed the same to defendant Smith. The material allegations upon which plaintiff relies in pleading the facts constituting the fraud are that the conveyance so made by Boswell, and that of the Greggs to Smith, was "made for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the creditors of the defendant Boswell, particularly the plaintiff, and preventing the plaintiff from recovering for the necessities of life" furnished by plaintiff to the wife of Boswell at the latter's request; that at the time of making said transfers and up to the time of filing the complaint, Boswell was and is insolvent, and the "transfers were made by the defendant Boswell in contemplation of such insolvency, and with the express intention of depriving the plaintiff of recovering from defendant Boswell on account of the agreement which he proposed making with the plaintiff on said 12th day of October, 1918."

[1-3] The chief question in the case is as to whether the transfer was void as to plaintiff, who was a subsequent creditor of Boswell. It is a general rule that a deed of gift is valid if the grantor was not indebted at the time he made it, or if he had other means outside of the property conveyed with which to pay his indebtedness. A man's property is his own, and he has a right to give it away if he so desires, and this right cannot be questioned by other than creditors existing at the time, and not then if he has other means with which to meet his obligations. To this rule, however, there is the well-recognized exception that a deed of gift which is fraudulent in its inception and made with intent to enable the grantor to defraud a future creditor, is as to such person void. Bush & Mallett Co. v. Helbing, 134 Cal. 676, 66 Pac. 967. This exception is based upon the fact that if the debtor secretly and without the knowledge of one with whom he contracts an indebtedness transfers his property without consideration, knowing that the creditor in dealing with him relies upon his ownership thereof, it constitutes actual fraud, and upon a showing of such facts such transfer may be annulled. On the contrary, if the deed of transfer so made is placed of record so as to constitute constructive notice, or the subsequent creditor has actual knowledge of the transfer, it cannot be said that in extending the credit he was deceived or in any way misled by the act of which he complains.

[4] Measured by the rule so stated, and disregarding objections upon the ground that the allegations hereinbefore quoted are mere conclusions, the complaint is barren of facts showing that plaintiff, when he made the contract with Boswell on October 12th, was without knowledge of the transfer so made on October 3d, or that he was induced so to do in reliance upon the fact or belief that Boswell was owner of the property. It is not alleged in the complaint that the transfer was secretly made, nor that the deed was not immediately upon its execution filed for record; nor is it alleged that plaintiff was without knowledge of the making thereof, nor that in making his contract he believed or had any reason to believe that Boswell was owner of the property. Indeed, from aught that appears to the contrary, the deed to defendant Chenie Lee Gregg was duly filed for record immediately upon its execution, of which fact and the fact of the transfer so made by Boswell, plaintiff was fully advised, and with actual knowledge thereof, and knowing that Boswell, as he had a right to do, had given the property to his daughter, deliberately made the contract out of which the indebtedness arose. Hence it cannot be said that he was defrauded by the act of Boswell in giving the property to his daughter prior to the time when the indebtedness was incurred. Schell v. Gamble, 153 Cal. 448, 95 Pac. 870; Marple v. Jackson, 184 Cal. 411, 193 Pac. 940; 12 R. C. L. p. 497.

[5] Having failed after filing three complaints in an effort to state a cause of action, it was no abuse of discretion on the part of the court to sustain the demurrer to the second amended complaint without leave to file a further complaint. Moreover, plaintiff did not apply to the court for leave to file a third amended complaint, or offer any amendment covering the particulars wherein the complaint was held insufficient (Burling v. Newlands, 112 Cal. 476, 44 Pac.

810), for the reason that presumably he could not do so.

The judgment is affirmed.

FOWLER v. LANE MORTGAGE CO.
(Civ. 3816.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 1, 1922.)

1. Execution — 272(2)—Possession of tenant is notice to purchaser of unrecorded lease.

A purchaser at a sale under execution, who knew that at the time the lands were occupied by a person other than the record owner, is charged with knowledge of facts sufficient to put him on inquiry which, if pursued, would have revealed that the person in possession was the tenant of the lessee under an unrecorded lease, the rent on which had been paid in advance, so that the purchaser is not entitled to recover the rents during the time for redemption from the lessee under Code Civ. Proc. § 700, which protects only purchasers in good faith; that is, under Civ. Code § 1214, those without notice, actual or constructive, of the rights of the lessee.

2. Execution — 272(1)—Purchaser with notice not entitled to rent paid debtor before lien attached to land.

Though the purchaser at sale under foreclosure of a recorded mortgage can recover from the lessee rent during the period for redemption, though such rent had been paid in advance because the lessee was charged with notice of the lien of the mortgage, the purchaser at a sale under execution has not such right, where the lease and advance payment were made before the judgment became a lien upon the land.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by George J. Fowler against the Lane Mortgage Company, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. A. Lane, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Burton E. Hales, of Redlands, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Basing his right so to do upon the provisions of section 707, Code of Civil Procedure, plaintiff as the purchaser of a tract of land at judicial sale, brought this action to recover from defendant as tenant for the use and occupation of the same during the period fixed for the redemption thereof. He had judgment, from which defendant has appealed.

The complaint contains two counts, in one of which it is alleged that defendant as tenant was in possession and control of the land; and in the other, that O. T. Sutton farmed the same under an agreement to pay defendant for the use thereof a part of the crop, the value of which so paid was $1,965.47.

It appears from the pleadings, stipulation of facts and meager evidence offered that on April 1, 1917, and at all times thereafter referred to, George L. Cooper was the owner of record of tract 58, township 13 south, range 15 east, S. B. M., in Imperial county, subject to a deed of trust whereby the same was conveyed to Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank to secure the payment of a loan made to him by Lane Mortgage Company: that on said date he executed a lease of said property to defendant, the term of which, as expressed therein, was to continue until such loan should be paid, and for which the lessee in good faith paid a full and adequate rental in advance for the entire term. The lease was not recorded. On January 22, 1918, George J. Fowler and his coplaintiffs, in an action based upon a demand that arose after the execution of the lease and brought in the superior court of San Bernardino county, obtained a money judgment against Cooper upon which an execution was issued to the sheriff of Imperial county under and by virtue of which he levied upon all interest of Cooper in the land in question, and on the 4th day of June, 1918, sold the same to plaintiff, George J. Fowler, to whom on said date he issued a certificate of purchase, a duplicate of which was filed for record on August 7, 1918. No redemption was made of the property within the year allowed therefor, during all of which time and prior thereto it was in the open and actual possession and occupancy of one O. T. Sutton as a subtenant of defendant to whom, between June 4 and August 1, 1919, he paid as rent for the use thereof, for the year immediately following date of sale to plaintiff, the sum of $1,965.47.

If plaintiff is entitled to recover the value of the use and occupation of the property, then, upon the allegations of the complaint, it is immaterial whether defendant was in the actual occupation thereof, or farmed it through its subtenant, from whom it received the rents and profits.

[1] Section 700, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that—

“Upon a sale of real property, the purchaser is substituted to and acquires all the right, title, interest, and claim of the judgment debtor thereto on the date of the levy of the execution thereon, where such judgment is not a lien upon such property.”

In this case the judgment was not a lien upon the property and, under the section quoted, the right, title, and interest of Cooper was such only as he had in the property upon the date of the levy, which rights were subject to the lease for which he had in advance received adequate payment. Defendant's lease, however, as found by the court, was for a term exceeding one year, and not recorded, by reason of which facts it was void as to plaintiff, whose certificate of purchase was recorded on August 7th, provided the purchase was made in good faith; that is, without notice, actual or constructive, of the rights of defendant under the unrecorded lease. Section 1214, Civ. Code. The court so found. Appellant challenges the finding for want of sufficient evidence to support it. Whether or not the contention is warranted depends upon the circumstances the existence of which as stipulated are:

"That Sutton was openly in the actual, exclusive possession as subtenant of defendant of all the land at and for more than one month prior to all times referred to in the amended complaint as and claiming as tenant under the lease from defendant referred to in the answer, and farming said land and paying the rent therefor to the defendant."

That an unrecorded deed is valid as between the parties and as against subsequent purchasers having notice thereof, and that the possession of the grantee of such unrecorded deed is notice of his title and claim to a subsequent purchaser, admits of no controversy. Beattie v. Crewdson, 124 Cal. 577, 57 Pac. 463. As clearly stated in Pell v. McElroy, 36 Cal. 268, and quoted with approval in Scheerer v. Cuddy, 85 Cal. 270, 24 Pac. 713:

"The fact of open, notorious, and exclusive possession and occupation of lands by a stranger to a vendor's title, as of record, at the time of a purchase from and conveyance by such a vendor out of possession, is sufficient to put such purchaser upon inquiry as to the legal and equitable rights of the party so in possession, and such vendee is presumed to have purchased and taken a conveyance from the vendor with full notice of all the legal and equitable rights in the premises of such party in possession and in subordination to these rights, and this presumption is only to be overcome or rebutted by clear and explicit proof on the part of such purchaser, or those claiming under him, of diligent, unavailing effort by the vendee to discover or obtain actual notice of any legal or equitable right * * * in behalf of the party in possession."

[2] We think the same principle is applicable to the possession of land under an unrecorded lease for a term of years. Peasley v. McFadden, 68 Cal. 611, 10 Pac. 179; Dutton v. Warschauer, 21 Cal. 609, 82 Am. Dec. 765. The admitted actual and open possession of the land by Sutton, as tenant of defendant, was sufficient to put plaintiff, in dealing with the property, upon inquiry as to the rights of his landlord, and he is chargeable with notice of all facts which he might have ascertained had he pursued the inquiry with proper diligence. O'Rourke v. O'Connor, 39 Cal. 442. There is neither pleading nor evidence tending to show an excuse for failure to make the inquiry, or that if made it would have been unavailing, and hence plaintiff is presumed to have had knowledge, at the time of the purchase, of the fact of defendant's leasehold interest in the property covering the period of redemption from the sale so made. Since prior to the levy of the execution defendant had paid Cooper for the use and occupation of the property, of which fact plaintiff, under the circumstances, must be deemed to have had notice, he could not be a purchaser in good faith. Upon no equitable principle could defendant's property be subjected to the payment of Cooper's debt. Webster v. Cook, 38 Cal. 423. Where a leasehold is acquired subsequent to the execution and record of a mortgage, the lessee, since chargeable with constructive notice thereof, takes the property subject to the same, and if a sale is had under a decree of foreclosure the purchaser, as provided by section 707, Code of Civil Procedure, is, as against the lessee, entitled to the rents during the period of redemption, even though paid in advance to the owner. This for the reason that the rights of the mortgagee, of which both the lessee and lessor have notice, could not be impaired by the subsequent acts of the parties. U. S. Mortg. Co. v. Willis, 41 Or. 481, 69 Pac. 266; Harris v. Foster, 97 Cal. 292, 32 Pac. 246, 33 Am. St. Rep. 187. Such facts, however, are not involved in this case.

Our conclusion renders it unnecessary to discuss other grounds upon which a reversal is urged.

The judgment is reversed.

DABNEY et al. v. KEY et al. (Civ. 4222.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 22, 1922.)

1. Pleading $\S$ 364(5)—Allegation payment was made through agent is probative fact properly stricken.

In an action for specific performance, an allegation in the complaint that the consideration paid for the execution of the contract was paid to defendants through an agent of plaintiffs was an allegation of a probative fact, not necessary to the sufficiency of the pleading, and was properly stricken out.

2. Pleading $\S$ 364(3)—Allegation held properly stricken as redundant.

In a complaint for specific performance of a contract to give an oil lease, which alleged that defendants refused to perform their agreement, and ever since have failed and refused to do so, an allegation, immediately following, that defendants repudiated their agreement and declared they were not bound by it and would not perform it, was clearly redundant, and it was not error to strike it out.

3. Specific performance $\S$ 32(3)—Agreement to execute oil lease which lessee could surrender will not be enforced.

An agreement by defendants to give plaintiffs an oil lease by the terms of which plaintiffs were required to drill a well on the premises and to make certain payments to defendant, but which gave plaintiffs the right to surrender the lease without liability for failure to drill the well, did not create a mutual obligation, so that the agreement of defendants to execute the lease will not be specifically enforced at the suit of the plaintiffs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action for specific performance by Joseph B. Dabney and others against Thomas B. Key and others. Judgment for defendants, when plaintiffs declined to amend after demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Robert M. Pease, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Adolph B. Rosenfield, of Long Beach, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendants to enforce a specific contract to make a lease of certain lands for the purpose of developing oil wells thereon. To the amended complaint the defendants interposed a demurrer and a motion to strike. The motion was granted in part and denied in part. On July 14, 1921, the demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiffs were given 10 days to amend. They did not amend, and on August 16 an order was made awarding judgment in favor of the defendants for their costs. The plaintiffs have appealed from the judgment and have brought up the judgment roll.

[1] The motion to strike contained eight different assignments. It was granted as to assignments 5 and 7 and was denied as to the others. The whole of the amended complaint clearly shows that it was the theory of the plaintiffs that if a lease were made the same would run to J. P. Dabney as lessee, and that the negotiations were carried on, at least in part, by Clifford R. Dabney acting as the agent for J. B. Dabney. Paragraph III alleged:

"That at the time of the execution of said agreement to lease said J. B. Dabney, by and through said Clifford R. Dabney, paid to the defendants, and they still retain the sum of twenty-five ($25) dollars as consideration for the said agreement to lease."

Acting on assignment No. 5 the court struck out the words, "by and through said Clifford R. Dabney." The expression was but a probative fact, not necessary to the sufficiency of the pleading, and was properly stricken out.

[2] In paragraph IV, among other things, the plaintiffs had pleaded:

"That the defendants then failed and refused to perform their said agreement to lease, and refused to execute to the plaintiffs, or either of them, any lease of said premises, and ever since have so failed and refused. [That defendants then repudiated their said agreement to lease, and declared to plaintiffs that the defendants were not bound by the same and would not perform.] That the plaintiffs and each of them duly performed all the conditions of said agreement to lease on the part of them or either of them to be performed, and that the plaintiffs and either of them since the time of said tender and offer always have and has been ready and willing to execute the said lease." (Brackets ours.)

Under assignment No. 7 the court struck out the sentence inclosed in brackets. The sentence was clearly redundant, and the court committed no error in striking it out. In the amended complaint the plaintiffs pleaded:

That the defendants are the owners of a certain tract of land in Los Angeles county. That on the 14th day of February, 1921, the defendants agreed in writing to execute a lease, "to contain the following terms and conditions: (1) Drilling to be started on or before six months from and after the date thereof; (2) rent to be $10 per acre per month payable monthly in advance during said term of six months unless drilling is started sooner, in which event, rent is to cease; (3) royalty to be the one-sixth part of all oil or gas obtained, saved and sold on or from said lands; (4) the said lease to be in other particulars the same as any usual and customary oil lease."

That plaintiffs paid $25 for the option. That on the 16th day of March, 1921, they tendered to the defendants a written lease which is set forth as an exhibit; that the defendants refused and now refuse to execute the lease so tendered and presented. They also plead:

"That as to the defendants the consideration for said lease (namely, the sum of $25 cash and of $10 per acre per month, rental therein specified and the royalties, to be paid by the lessee therein to the lessor, and the other terms and covenants of said lease), was and is just, reasonable and adequate."

They further allege that the defendants threaten to develop or cause to be developed said lands for oil and gas to the injury of the plaintiffs, etc. The respondents interposed a demurrer which, among other things, pleaded that the amended complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The respondents support the order sustaining the demurrer on several different grounds. Because of the view which we take of the case it will not be necessary to consider but one of those grounds.

[3] The respondents contend that the form of lease which was presented to the defendants and which the defendants declined to execute was not a mutual obligation; that in the lease as so drawn the plaintiffs did not bind themselves to drill, but on the other hand reserved the right to surrender the lease at such time as they might see fit, whereas, the same paper purported to bind the owners of the land "for the term of twenty years from date hereof and as long thereafter as oil, gas, asphaltum or kindred substances are produced in paying quantities thereon, unless sooner terminated as herein provided." The obligation resting on the appellants is quoted and set forth by the appellants in their brief as follows:

"4. The drilling requirements of this lease shall be as follows:

"4a. Within six (6) months from date of this lease, lessee is to commence drilling operations on said premises, and will diligently prosecute the same with reasonable diligence and without interruption for a period of more than thirty (30) consecutive days at any time, Sundays, and holidays excepted, unless such delays are excused as hereinafter provided, to a depth of 3,000 feet, unless oil is found in paying quantities at a lesser depth."

"4e. Lessee may surrender this lease before or after the commencement of drilling, without liability for failure to commence or continue operations; but upon such surrender lessee shall execute to lessors and record a quitclaim deed to said premises. Cancellation and termination of lease shall be the only remedy for failure to commence or continue operations."

In the case of Sturgis v. Galindo, 59 Cal. 28, 43 Am. Rep. 239, the Supreme Court was considering a case in specific performance. The instrument before the court purported to be a contract of sale of lands supposed to be valuable as a coal mine. The purported contract contained a surrender clause as follows:

If defendant's assignors "should at any time before the expiration of the time hereinbefore fixed for the completion of this contract, to wit, the 14th day of December, A. D. 1867, become satisfied that it was useless to further prospect said lands agreed to be conveyed for coal, then upon giving thirty days' notice to said party of the first part, in writing, of their intention to abandon said contract, then and thereafter this agreement shall be void, and of no binding force or effect between the said parties or either of them."

The trial court had entered a judgment specifically enforcing the contract. The Supreme Court reversed that judgment and in doing so said:

"It is, moreover, perfectly clear that a specific performance of the contract could not have been performed at the suit of Pacheco; for besides the difficulty of enforcing the performance of personal services, the agreement contained the express stipulation that if, at any time prior to the period fixed for the completion of the contract, Bromley and Jones should become satisfied that it was useless further to prospect the land, they should have the right, upon giving thirty days' notice to Pacheco of their intention so to do, to abandon the contract. 'It is a general principle,' says Mr. Fry at section 286 of his work on Specific Performance, 'that when, from personal incapacity, the nature of the contract, or any other cause, a contract is incapable of being enforced against one party, that party is equally incapable of enforcing it specifically against the other, though its execution in the latter way might, in itself, be free from difficulty attending its execution in the former.'"

It is not claimed by the appellants that the Sturgis Case has been overruled, but the appellants ask this court at this time to lay down a different rule so far as oil leases are concerned. In their brief they contend as follows:

"Anomalous as it may seem at first, this apparent one-sidedness is the only fair structure for such a contract. And, the oil lease being the basis of the California oil world, it follows that if this oil industry, if this tremendous young industry which has been the very life and salvation of our great Southwest these past three strenuous years, if this industry is to survive and is to continue to function and expand, it must be granted or confirmed the power to enforce and protect with all the vigor of our laws and judicial system these contracts which are its very foundation and strength and its only opportunity for service in fields as yet undiscovered."

However desirable some other rule might be as applicable to this specific line of cases it would seem that such an argument should be addressed to the Legislature and not to the courts.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

1. Divorce — 184(10)—Trial court's determination of issue of guilt of acts producing grievous mental suffering not disturbed except for abuse of discretion.

The trial court's finding upon the issue of defendant's guilt of acts producing grievous mental suffering will not be disturbed unless the evidence is so slight as to indicate abuse of discretion.

2. Divorce — 150(2) — Findings that allegations are untrue not too general to support judgment for defendant.

Findings in a divorce suit that plaintiff's allegations are untrue are not too general on allegations of specific instances of cruelty to support a judgment for defendant.

3. Divorce — 150(2)—Findings as to property rights unnecessary where divorce denied.

Where plaintiff wife was denied a divorce, no findings on the existence or character of the parties' property rights were necessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Lulu S. Davis against M. William Davis. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas R. White and William P. Hubbard, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Bert Schlesinger and Timothy Healy, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in an action for divorce brought by her on the ground of extreme cruelty.

Plaintiff, in support of her appeal, claims that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment, and that they are not justified by the evidence, which, she claims, is more than ample and sufficient to entitle her to a decree of divorce on the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty.

Complaint is also made that the trial court erred in refusing to permit plaintiff to introduce evidence as to the value and extent of property held by defendant, or to make a finding as to its community or separate character.

Plaintiff, by her complaint, alleges that she and defendant intermarried in the year 1907, and that there is issue of said marriage two minor children.

The extreme cruelty alleged is infliction upon plaintiff of grievous mental suffering due to the acts of defendant from time to time during the marriage relation, and particularly during the years 1918 and 1919. In this behalf it is in substance charged that defendant, without cause, complained of years of misery in consequence of his marital relation with plaintiff; that he threatened her with divorce proceedings, absented himself from home without plaintiff's consent, and frequently exhibited a violent display of temper, and without justification or excuse and in the presence of others abused, belittled and annoyed her. Other allegations are to the effect that defendant at different times struck plaintiff. The sum of $500 per month is alleged to be a reasonable amount for the support of herself and children, and $2,500 a reasonable attorney's fee. These sums are prayed for, together with the dissolution of the marriage.

Defendant by answer denied all the allegations of plaintiff's complaint. The record consists of 700 or more pages, and the evidence shows many acts of alleged cruelty on the part of defendant, most all of which were denied by him, and he on his own behalf introduced evidence to prove his kindness and solicitude for plaintiff during their married life. Defendant also introduced evidence of acts of cruelty on the part of plaintiff. The record also shows that subsequent to the acts complained of by plaintiff as causing her grievous mental suffering she requested defendant to return to her and resume their marital relations.

The trial court found plaintiff's allegations to be untrue and denied her a divorce, but granted her an allowance of the sum of $350 per month for the support of herself and minor children and $1,250 as attorney's fees.

[1] The case presents a sharp conflict of evidence, and is one clearly falling within the so-called "conflict of evidence" rule, and this court cannot disturb the finding of the trial court. Whether or not one has been guilty of acts producing grievous mental suffering upon an innocent party is a question of fact to be determined from all the circumstances, keeping in view the intelligence, refinement, and delicacy of sentiment of the complaining party, and no inflexible rule as to what probative facts shall exist in order to justify a finding of the ultimate fact of its existence can be laid down. This is a question for the trial court to determine from all the circumstances, and its conclusion will not be disturbed unless the evidence is so slight as to indicate an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court. No such abuse here appears. MacDonald v. Mac-

[2] The contention that the findings are so general upon the allegations of specific instances of cruelty alleged as to be insufficient to support the judgment is without merit. Had more specific findings been asked for or had, they would of necessity have been in plaintiff's favor. Gale v. Bradbury, 116 Cal. 39, 40, 47 Pac. 778.

[3] Equally untenable is the objection that the court committed error in failing to make findings upon the existence of the property rights of the parties or of its character. Plaintiff having been denied a divorce, this issue became immaterial, and a finding upon the question was therefore unnecessary. Smith v. Dubost, 148 Cal. 622, 624, 84 Pac. 38.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

MCCARTY v. WILSON. (Civ. 4217.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 19, 1922.)

Appeal and error ⇨ 1099(4)—Decision on prior appeal that contract of purchase was enforceable against defendant held law of the case.

In an action by an executor against one who purchased land from the deceased, a decision in a prior appeal that a contract between the deceased and the purchaser was enforceable regardless of an oral agreement that deceased would sell and deliver to defendant a good and sufficient title, free and clear of all incumbrances, and that the purchaser should pay a certain sum in cash, and should be given certain credit for the balance of the purchase price, is conclusive on subsequent appeal as to purchaser's claim that under the oral agreement attending the execution of the contract of sale the executor was not entitled to specific performance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by Alva R. McCarty, executor of the last will and testament of Anna R. McCarty, deceased, against Philip L. Wilson. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lloyd Miller and Philip Wilson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles L. Allison, of San Bernardino, and Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him for $33,023, together with interest from February 10, 1912. This amount represents the balance due upon the purchase price of land belonging to the estate of Anna E. McCarty, deceased, and which had been sold to defendant upon an order of court made and entered in the course of probate proceedings.

The record presented upon appeal is lengthy, and it would serve no useful purpose to discuss the facts in detail, because the matter has been considered twice by our Supreme Court. Upon the first trial of the cause, judgment was given for the defendant, and this judgment was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal. A hearing was granted by our Supreme Court, and said judgment in favor of defendant was reversed. Thereupon the defendant and present appellant petitioned the Supreme Court for a rehearing of said matter, and a supplemental opinion was filed in answer to this petition, which did not, however, change the effect of the opinion. McCarty v. Wilson, 184 Cal. 194, 193 Pac. 578. Thereafter a second trial was had, resulting in a judgment for the plaintiff from which this appeal is taken. The facts found by the trial court upon the present record present precisely the same questions of law as those passed upon by the Supreme Court upon the former appeal.

Appellant concedes that many of the matters relied upon by him for a defense in the first trial are settled against him by the opinion of the Supreme Court upon the former appeal. One point, however, he contends was not passed upon in the former appeal, and upon that point he relies for a reversal of the judgment. His position is stated by him as follows:

"The only question involved on this appeal is whether respondent under the circumstances attending the execution of the contract of sale is entitled to the aid of a court of equity."

Upon the former appeal the Supreme Court passed upon the order of sale made by the probate court and held it to be valid; it also passed upon the right of the executor, as such, to enforce a specific performance of the contract for the sale and purchase of the land.

The record contains a finding as follows:

"It is also orally understood and agreed by and between the said parties that the said plaintiff, as such executor, would sell and deliver to the defendant, a good and sufficient title to the said premises free and clear of all incumbrances, and that the defendant would buy the said premises from the said plaintiff and should pay to the said plaintiff the sum of $11,000 in cash, and should be extended certain credit for the balance of the purchase price."

It is upon this finding that appellant's contention upon this appeal is based. He maintains that, as the executor did not disclose to the probate court the terms of this oral agreement, he was guilty of a fraud upon the court and upon the defendant. He calls attention to the finding that the defendant relied upon this oral contract as a consideration for entering into the contract for the purchase of the land, and that defendant relied upon the promise of plaintiff that he would present to the probate court a true and correct return and account of the said sale, showing all the terms and conditions thereof, and would procure a confirmation thereof, and it was because of this reliance that the defendant failed to be present at the hearing when the order of sale was made and failed to make objection to the confirmation of such sale as a sale for cash. These various matters, he contends, raise such inequity in the conduct of the plaintiff that he should be denied relief by a court of equity.

This contract, made between the parties outside of court and not embodied in the order of court for a sale of the property, was considered by the Supreme Court in reaching its conclusion upon the former appeal. The opinion filed therein (184 Cal. at page 199 thereof, 193 Pac. 578) refers to the same, stating that, even though the court were to assume that such contract was with McCarty, as executor, instead of individually, nevertheless its provisions regarding good and sufficient title are not violated by the facts appearing in the record, and such provisions do not furnish a ground for a refusal on the part of the defendant to perform his contract to purchase the land. Other provisions of said agreement are discussed in said opinion of the Supreme Court, indicating that the same was fully considered, and its effect, if any, upon the rights of the parties hereto, under the facts in evidence, could not have been overlooked.

Appellant contends that the opinion of the Supreme Court does not indicate that that court had in mind, specifically, the objection now made by appellant; i. e., that this contract between the parties raised certain inequitable features in the case which would defeat specific performance, and therefore that question is open for discussion upon this appeal. We think the entire matter is foreclosed by the decision of the Supreme Court. That decision held that this contract relied upon by appellant, and the facts surrounding it, constitute no bar to a decree against defendant for specific performance. This defeats appellant's claim, regardless of the nature of the argument upon which he may proceed. This is a sufficient answer to the point made upon appeal, but, if it is any satisfaction to the appellant to know beyond a doubt that the Supreme Court of this state has considered the precise argument he now makes in support of his general contention, it may not be amiss for us to add that an examination of the record presented to the Supreme Court upon the former appeal reveals that the attorney who at that time represented the present appellant contended in an elaborate brief that this unfulfilled agreement between the parties raised an insurmountable obstacle to affording to plaintiff the remedy of specific performance of the contract for the sale and purchase of the land.

The judgment is affirmed.

McGUIRE v. ALUMINUM PRODUCTS CO.
OF THE PACIFIC COAST. (Civ. 4199.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 8, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1)—Finding supported by sufficient evidence not disturbed.

In an action by a factor for damages for breach of a contract to fill orders for goods solicited by him, held, there being sufficient evidence to support a finding of the amount of unfilled orders which was less than claimed by plaintiff, the finding could not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Factors ⇐66—In action by factor for breach of contract, proof of amounts paid as commissions warranted under plea of payment.

In an action by a factor for damages for breach of a contract to fill orders for goods solicited by him, held that under a plea of payment, proof and a finding as to the amounts paid plaintiff by defendant on commissions due him under the contract were warranted.

3. Factors ⇐66—Evidence sufficient to support finding of amount of commissions paid factor under contract.

In an action by a factor for damages for breach of a contract to fill orders for goods solicited by him, held the evidence was sufficient to support a finding of the amounts paid plaintiff by defendant as commissions due him under the contract.

4. Factors ⇐45—Cannot recover payments to salesmen or traveling or stationery expenses under contract to pay commission on sales.

Under a contract whereby a manufacturer agreed to pay a factor a commission of 25 per cent. on sales made by him, the factor may not recover sums paid by him to his salesmen or for his traveling expenses and stationery.

5. Factors ⇐45—Cannot recover expenses incurred in trying to persuade principal not to breach contract.

Under a contract whereby a manufacturer agreed to fill orders solicited by a factor and to pay him 25 per cent. on his sales, the factor cannot recover expenses incurred in trying to persuade the manufacturer not to breach the agreement to fill orders, as such expenses are not the natural and proximate result of such breach.

6. Factors ↪44—May not recover commission on goods returned through no fault of principal.

Under a contract agreeing to pay a factor a commission for goods sold, he was not entitled to a commission on goods sold which were returned to his principal, where their return was not caused by any act or omission of the latter.

Action by Elmer E. McGuire against the Aluminum Products Company of the Pacific Coast, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff for less than demanded, he appeals. Affirmed.

Charles L. Brown, of El Centro, and Albert E. Carter, of Oakland, for appellant.

Breed & Burpee, of Oakland, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This is an action to recover damages for breach of contract. In substance the complaint alleges that on the 5th day of March, 1919, plaintiff and defendants entered into an agreement in writing by which the Aluminum Products Company agreed to manufacture and ship certain articles of aluminum ware and cause the same to be transported for the purpose of filling orders to be solicited by plaintiff; that by the terms of said contract plaintiff was to receive a commission of 25 per cent. on sales effected through his personal efforts. It is recited that the parties entered upon the performance of their agreement, and that plaintiff thereafter secured orders in the sum of $17,871.01, which defendant, in violation of its contract, failed to fill, thereby depriving plaintiff of his commission, amounting to the sum of $4,467.50. As flowing from this alleged breach of contract plaintiff claims special damages in the sum of $3,809.22. In support of his claim for special damages plaintiff alleges:

(1) That he was in Chicago, engaged in the fulfillment of his contract when he discovered defendant's neglect and failure to perform its contract, and that in consequence he was required to return to Oakland, where the factory of defendant company is situate, where he was compelled to remain from June 20, 1919, to July 10, 1919, in an effort to induce defendant to make deliveries, and by reason thereof was required to expend for railroad fare, hotel bills, and other expense the sum of $756.10.

(2) That during this period plaintiff had a number of salesmen working for him in different parts of the country, selling goods under the contract; that in consequence of defendant's breach in not filling such orders, plaintiff was required to lose the time of four salesmen for the period of two weeks, thereby causing plaintiff to suffer a loss of $2,-442.24.

(3) That on September 15, 1919, because of defendant's breach, plaintiff was again required to go to Oakland and incur additional expense and suffer additional loss occasioned by the delay of defendant in making deliveries, in the sum of $240.

(4) That certain post cards, order blanks, booklets, etc., prepared by plaintiff and furnished to defendant, were not used, thereby damaging plaintiff in the further sum of $216.

(5) That on account of such breach of contract certain goods shipped were returned to the factory, and the commission thereon was by defendant charged back to plaintiff, and this item of damages is alleged to amount to the sum of $154.98.

Defendant denied the securing of the orders as alleged by plaintiff, and also denied all special damage, and set up payment on account of demands of plaintiff, in the sum of $1,818.30.

[1-4] After trial the court found against plaintiff on every item claimed as special damage, but found that defendant had failed to fill accepted orders in the sum of $8,662.95, upon which plaintiff was entitled to a commission of 25 per cent., or the sum of $2,165.73; that defendant had paid on account thereof, as alleged in its answer, the sum of $1,818.30, leaving a balance due to plaintiff in the sum of $347.42, for which sum plaintiff was given judgment. Plaintiff appeals from such judgment, and as grounds for reversal contends that the evidence does not support the finding that the unfilled orders were limited to the sum of $8,662.95, it being claimed that the evidence establishes plaintiff's allegation that the total amount of orders procured and not filled amounted to the sum of $17,870.01. The only evidence to support the issue of the total amount of orders taken and not filled is found in the testimony of plaintiff himself. A bill of particulars was demanded by defendant, which was ordered furnished by the court. In conformity therewith a statement was produced by plaintiff of the amount of his alleged sales, but there was testimony showing that many of the items contained therein were erroneous. Upon this subject there was a conflict of testimony. There was, however, sufficient evidence to support the finding of the trial court as to the amount of orders procured, and under the well-established rule this determination cannot be disturbed on appeal. Appellant further claims that there is no pleading to justify or evidence to support the finding as to the portion of the amount found by the trial court to have been paid to him on account. The record does not support this contention. Defendant, by amended answer, pleaded payment, and there is testimony to show that plaintiff was paid all the commissions to which the court found him to be entitled. Upon the question of special damage the finding of the court as to the first four claims above enumerated is as follows:

"The court makes no finding thereon for the reason that such averments, and each of them, are immaterial and surplus averments in said complaint and any finding thereon would be a finding upon an immaterial issue, and for the further reason that no evidence was introduced at the trial in support of such averments."

[5] These alleged claims for special damages are all based upon the one breach of the contract. The contract, however, nowhere provides that defendant was to pay any sums by way of commissions or expenses, in excess of the 25 per cent. on the price list. This was the sole compensation which plaintiff was to receive. Whatever arrangements he made with his salesmen or whatever sums he expended for his traveling expenses and stationery was a matter that concerned him alone. Under such circumstances expenses incurred in an endeavor to persuade a defendant to perform his contract are not the natural and proximate result of the act complained of. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the trial court rightfully concluded that these items were duplicated claims, as the commission provided for covered them.

[6] Upon the fifth item of special damage, which is based upon the alleged fact that certain goods were delivered, then shipped back to the factory and the commission thereon originally credited was charged back against plaintiff's account, the court found upon sufficient evidence that the return of the goods was not caused by any act or omission upon the part of the defendant, for which reason plaintiff was entitled to no commission thereon.

No other questions are presented.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

TITLE INS. & TRUST CO. v. PFENNING-HAUSEN et al. (Civ. 3707.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 12, 1922.)

1. Mortgages ⚡549 — Notice of foreclosure sale to tenant of mortgaged property is necessary to render him liable for rent to purchaser at sale.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 707, by which purchaser on a judicial sale of mortgaged property is entitled to the rents and profits thereof until redemption, and Civ. Code, § 1111, providing that no tenant who, before notice of the grant, has paid rent to grantor, shall suffer damage thereby, notice of the sale must have been had by the tenant of the mortgaged property to render him liable to such purchaser for the rent.

2. Evidence, ⚡89—Presumption that sheriff recorded certificate of judicial sale is overcome by proof that tenants were without notice of sale.

The presumption under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15, that the sheriff on selling real estate at a judicial sale has not only issued a certificate of sale to the purchaser, but has filed a duplicate thereof for record in the county recorder's office as required by section 700a, so as to constitute constructive notice to tenants of the property of the transfer of the title, is disputable, and is overcome by evidence that such tenants were without notice of the sale, in which case they are justified under Civ. Code, § 1111, in paying the rent to their lessor for the remainder of the term.

3. Mortgages ⚡548—Recordation of deed is constructive notice to tenants of purchaser's acquisition of title.

The filing of a sheriff's deed to property for record is constructive notice to tenants of sale of land under mortgage foreclosure, and the acquisition of title by the purchaser so that they are liable to such purchaser for use and occupation for the remainder of their term.

4. Appeal and error ⚡931(1)—Findings construed most strongly in support of judgment.

Findings must be construed most strongly in support of the judgment.

5. Appeal and error ⚡417(2)—Inclusion of party for whom plaintiff bid in the property at foreclosure sale as appellant in notice of appeal held erroneous as against defendants in action for rent.

On appeal from a judgment for defendants in an action for rent by the purchasers at a foreclosure sale, one not a party to the action for whom the court found that plaintiff bid in the property and held it for his use and benefit was improperly included as appellant in the notice of appeal; plaintiff being the real party in interest entitled to maintain the action so far as defendants were concerned.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff upon the judgment roll from a judgment entered in favor of defendants.

As appears from the complaint, the cause of action stated therein was to recover for the use and occupation of certain lands of which plaintiff alleged it was at all times mentioned the owner and which defendants, with its consent, held and occupied for a period of two years from and after January 1, 1917.

Appellants' contention is that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment. The material facts appearing therefrom are that on January 13, 1917, at a sale on mortgage foreclosure proceedings, the plaintiff bought in and became the owner and holder of a certificate of sale to the land in question, upon the surrender of which certificate it, on January 21, 1918, received a deed to the property, and ever since said date plaintiff had been the owner of the property; that Rogers Development Company was, prior to the sale upon foreclosure of the mortgage thereon, in which proceedings the title thereto was acquired by plaintiff, the owner thereof, and on October 1, 1916, leased the same to defendants for the term of one year for one-fourth of the crop produced thereon, and thereafter, without demand for possession or notice to quit, defendants continued in possession for the year, which expired on October 1, 1918, the effect of which, as provided in section 1161, Code of Civil Procedure, was to renew the lease upon the same terms; "that on October 1, 1917, defendants not having received or been given any notice of the claim or claims, if any, of said Title Insurance & Trust Company to the rent or any portion thereof, * * * for the year ending October 1, 1917," thereupon paid the same to Rogers Development Company; that in payment of the rent due for the year ending October 1, 1918, they set aside one-fourth of the crop grown upon the land and left the same thereon as rental of said premises, of which fact they notified one Thomas F. Joyce, who was the duly authorized agent of plaintiff.

From these facts the court, as a matter of law, concluded that defendants were not indebted to plaintiff in any sum whatsoever.

That defendants had the use and occupation of the land from the time of the issuance of the certificate of sale of the mortgaged property, to wit, from January 13, 1917, to October 1, 1918, clearly appears. It likewise appears that for the use thereof for the year expiring October 1, 1917, defendants paid the rental, not to plaintiff as holder of the certificate of purchase in the foreclosure proceedings, but to Rogers Development Company, who up to the time of the sale was the owner of the property.

[1] The right on the part of the purchaser upon a judicial sale of mortgaged property to receive the rents and profits thereof, or the value of the use and occupation, based upon the provisions of section 707, Code of Civil Procedure, has been repeatedly sustained. Page v. Rogers, 31 Cal. 294; Walk- er v. McCusker, 71 Cal. 595, 12 Pac. 723; Clarke and Cain v. Cobb, 121 Cal. 595, 54 Pac. 74. The provisions of the section, however, must be read in connection with section 1111, Civil Code, which provides that grants of rents are good and effective without attornment of the tenants, but no tenant who, before notice of the grant, shall have paid rent to the grantor, must suffer any damage thereby. In the cases cited it was made to appear that the tenant had either actual or constructive notice of the sale under which he was required to pay the rental of the property to the purchaser holding the certificate.

[2] Indeed, appellant in its argument seems to concede that notice is necessary, but insists that since, under section 700a, Code of Civil Procedure, it is made the duty of the sheriff when selling real estate at a judicial sale not only to issue to the purchaser a certificate of sale, but to file a duplicate thereof for record in the office of the county recorder, we must indulge in the presumption that such official duty was regularly and duly performed (subdivision 15, § 1963, Code Civ. Proc.); in other words, that the certificate of sale was filed for record, which if done, such act constituted constructive notice at least to defendants of the transfer of title. Since, however, the presumption invoked by appellant is a disputable one, it is deemed to have been overcome by the evidence upon which the court based the finding hereinabove quoted, to the effect that defendants were without notice of the sale and purchase by plaintiff. Hence, since at the time of the payment of the rent to Rogers Development Company defendants had no notice of the sale under foreclosure, or of the fact that plaintiff was the purchaser of the property in such proceedings, they were, as provided in section 1111, Civil Code, justified in paying the rent to their lessor in discharge of any liability for the use and occupation of the property for the year ending October 1, 1917.

[3] As stated, the deed of the property to plaintiff was filed for record on January 21, 1918, of which fact and the acquisition of title to the property by plaintiff defendants must be deemed to have had constructive notice and were liable to plaintiff for the use and occupation of the property thence on to October 1, 1918, when they surrendered possession.

[4] It appears from the findings that they recognized plaintiff as entitled to the rent for the entire year and delivered to plaintiff upon the premises one-fourth of the crop grown and harvested during said year, of which fact plaintiff was repeatedly notified, and made no objection to the tender. Applying the rule that findings must be construed most strongly in support of the judgment, we think they are sufficient to support the same.

[5] For some reason not appearing by the record, Thomas F. Joyce was included as appellant in the notice of appeal. He was not a party to the action, and although the court finds that plaintiff bid in the property at the foreclosure sale for his use and benefit and at all times held it for his use and benefit, such fact, if true, was no concern of defendants. As to them, plaintiff was the real party in interest and was entitled to maintain the action. Walker v. McCusker, 71 Cal. 595, 12 Pac. 723; Cortelyou v. Jones, 132 Cal. 131, 64 Pac. 119.

The judgment is affirmed.

KOBLOCK v. LARSON et al. (Civ. 4208; S. F. 9955.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 27, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 26, 1922.)

1. Vendor and purchaser — 37(1)—Purchaser may rely upon false representations although he has means of knowledge.

A purchaser of real estate may rely on false representations although he has means of knowledge, and is under no duty in such a case to employ his means of knowledge.

2. Vendor and purchaser — 37(1)—Independent investigation of real estate not made by purchaser where under control of vendor.

An independent investigation by a purchaser of real estate, such as to preclude his reliance on vendor's statements, was not made where an inexperienced purchaser visited the land, accompanied by vendor, in whom he had full confidence, and at all times controlled by his suggestions.

3. Appeal and error — 1071(1)—Failure to make specific finding held not prejudicial.

Where vendor claims that purchaser investigated the land, a finding that purchaser had no knowledge would ordinarily include the element of want of investigation, and this general finding is not prejudicial where a correct specific finding would be adverse to the objecting party.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

4. Judgment — 194—Specific performance — 49(2), 51—Judgment supported notwithstanding failure to find on all issues; remedy denied if contract was inequitable as to defendant, or consideration was inadequate.

Plaintiff, to enforce specific performance of a sale of land, must show that the contract as to defendant was just and reasonable, and upon adequate consideration, and a finding against plaintiff upon this issue is sufficient to sustain judgment for defendants notwithstanding failure to find on other issues.

F. A. Meyer, of Petaluma (E. J. Dole, of Petaluma, of counsel), for appellant.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, and F. J. Burke, of Petaluma, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This is an action brought to enforce specific performance of a contract relating to certain real property. The action was the result of a real estate transaction involving some 66 acres of land situated near Windsor in the county of Sonoma, which appellant, as an agent of the owners, sold to respondent Larson. The facts are substantially without conflict, and are in substance as follows:

One James E. Dowd and his wife, Sarah, were the owners of the land, and in January, 1920, appellant procured an option entitling him to either purchase or sell the same. This option was never exercised by him, and was canceled, but Dowd and his wife verbally authorized plaintiff to buy or sell the ranch for $16,500 net to the owners. Respondents Horovitz and Noreen were real estate brokers who associated themselves with appellant for the sale of the property, and they procured a purchaser for the same in respondent Larson. According to the agreement of sale Larson was to pay the sum of $22,000 for the property. This sum was made up by a cash payment of $9,800, a note for $8,000 secured by a mortgage and the balance of the consideration was to be paid by a conveyance to appellant of the land in dispute, which consisted of a house and lot in Petaluma valued at $4,200. After the transfer of the land was made to Larson, in accordance with the terms of the agreement of sale, he refused to execute a deed of the Petaluma property to appellant, but conveyed the same to respondents Horovitz and Noreen, the associates of appellant. Thereupon this action was brought, and Horovitz and Noreen are joined as parties defendant. All respondents joined in common cause against appellant. They appeared by answer and cross-complaint alleging fraudulent representations on the part of plaintiff with reference to the sale of the property. These alleged fraudulent representations were to the effect that plaintiff owned the land, and had paid $19,000 therefor, and that it was worth $25,000; that the trees and vines growing thereon were in a good and healthy condition and that the land produced an income of $6,000 a year. Defendants sought damages under their cross-complaint to the extent of $5,500, together with a prayer that it be decreed that respondents Horovitz and Noreen were entitled to an undivided one-third interest in the house and lot in Petaluma. Appellant, answering the cross-complaint, denied that plaintiff or his associates had made any false representations, and alleged that respondent Larson purchased the property after full, fair, and complete examination of the same.

The trial court found in substance that the representations as to ownership, income, and productiveness of the lands were false; that the land was not suitable for raising fruit trees or grape vines, and that the vines or trees growing thereon were not sound and healthy as represented, but, on the contrary, were unsound, decayed, and unhealthy, and were dying out, and that trees would not grow on the land on account of the poor quality of the soil. The court further found that the property was reasonably worth the sum of $16,500, and no more. Transfer of the Petaluma property was refused, and ownership thereof was decreed to be in defendant Larson, in addition to which a money judgment for the sum of $1,300 was entered in his favor. Appellant appeals from the judgment, and contends that the trial court failed to find on a material issue, which, it is claimed, justifies a reversal of the judgment. The issue referred to is that defendant Larson made an independent investigation of the property, and had the means of ascertaining the truth of the character of the land, and that he completed the purchase after such investigation had been made by him.

[1] In response to this issue the findings of the trial court are to the effect that Larson had no knowledge or any means of ascertaining the truth or falsity of the representations, but that he had full and implicit confidence in defendants, and relied upon their statements, and was induced thereby to make the purchase and transfer. The principle is well established that a purchaser is justified in relying upon false representations, and his rights are not destroyed because means of knowledge are open to him, and no duty in law is devolved upon him in such a case to employ such means of knowledge. Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 Pac. 1011; Ruhl v. Mott, 120 Cal. 668, 53 Pac. 304; Gratz v. Schuler, 25 Cal. App. 117, 120, 142 Pac. 899.

[2] Appellant concedes this to be the rule, but he claims that the principle has no application where an independent investigation is made by a purchaser, and he contends that, as the pleadings raised this issue and there is evidence upon the subject, the findings are incomplete, and do not conclude the issue. It would seem that a finding that one has no knowledge of the subject includes the elements of want of investigation and lack of consequent information following upon such investigation. This reasoning seems to be conceded by appellant, but it is argued that it cannot avail respondents in the face of positive evidence that an investigation was made. It is true that the record discloses that Larson did at different times attempt to make an investigation, but it further shows that upon all these occasions he was accompanied by the agents, and was controlled entirely by their suggestions, and that such investigations were, in consequence, unsuccessful. True, he was requested by them to dig upon the land to ascertain the depth of the soil, and in so doing discovered hardpan, but the evidence further shows that this meant nothing to him, as he was inexperienced in and knew nothing about farm lands, or what the presence of hardpan might indicate. The evidence upon this subject fully supports the finding that Larson relied implicitly and solely upon the representations of the agents, whom he considered and believed to be his friends. Under such circumstances the court was justified in finding that Larson had no knowledge or means of ascertaining the truth or falsity of the representations.

[3] Even if we concede the findings to be subject to the criticism here made, still we cannot see how this can avail plaintiff, for, in view of the conclusion reached by the trial court, a direct and specific finding, if made, would of necessity have been adverse to him. As before stated, the evidence shows conclusively that no real investigation was ever made by Larson, but that he depended entirely upon the representations of plaintiff and his associates. Under such circumstances, failure to find specifically on this subject is not ground for reversal. Estate of Connors, 110 Cal. 408, 42 Pac. 906; Senter v. Senter, 70 Cal. 619, 628, 11 Pac. 782; Haight v. Costanich, 184 Cal. 426, 194 Pac. 26.

We are therefore of the opinion that the findings are sufficient to support the judgment. For the reasons given it is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [4] The action in this case was for specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate. In such an action it is necessary for the plaintiff to show that, as to the defendant, the contract was just and reasonable, and that the defendant received an adequate consideration. The pleadings put in issue the question whether or not the contract was just and reasonable and the consideration adequate as to the defendant Larson. The findings, omitting all consideration of the finding on the question whether or not the defendant Larson made an independent investigation of the property or had the means of ascertaining the truth as to the character of the land, show beyond question that the consideration received by Larson was not adequate, and that as to him the contract was not just and reasonable. The judgment, therefore, should have been in favor of Larson, as it was, and the District Court properly affirmed it, regardless of the question whether the finding covered all other issues or not.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

Bradner W. Lee, Bradner W. Lee, Jr., and Kenyon F. Lee, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an appeal from an order restraining the defendant. The order was issued pending the hearing of a divorce case. What cause of action is pleaded in the divorce case does not appear. The appellant has brought up the order, his notice of appeal therefrom, and the bill of exceptions. The order appealed from might more properly be termed five several orders all contained in one paper. We have inserted our own numbering, but otherwise the charging part of the orders is as follows:

"(1) It is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said defendant, until the further order of this court, be, and he is hereby, ordered to forthwith vacate the residence of plaintiff, known and designated by number and street as No. 2114 South Crenshaw boulevard, Los Angeles, Cal.

"(2) It is further hereby ordered that defendant refrain from either directly or indirectly disturbing, speaking to, or writing to, or in any other manner communicating with, plaintiff until the further order of this court.

"(3) And it is further hereby ordered that defendant may lock the room in said premises wherein his personal belongings are contained, and retain the key to said room.

"(4) And it is further hereby ordered that said defendant shall forthwith deliver to counsel for plaintiff the key to the front door of said premises, and any other keys that will give defendant ingress to said premises, or any part or portion thereof.

"(5) It is further hereby ordered that C. A. Rees, as receiver, appointed by this court in action No. BS3955, in interlocutory decree entered therein be, and he is hereby, required to pay to the defendant herein the sum of $100 per month upon the 1st day of each and every month until the further order of this court, and charge the same to said defendant in said action, relating back to and commencing with the 1st day of September, 1921."

[1] The appellant concedes that the second order was within the power of the trial court. Therefore it is eliminated from attack. The third order appears on its face to be a permission granted to the defendant, and was not adverse to him. The fifth order may also be said to be a permission granted to the defendant, and not an order adverse to him. Therefore we will address ourselves to orders 1 and 4. Those two orders are, in legal effect, a direction that the defendant forthwith deliver the outside door keys to the plaintiff, and thereafter to remain away from the residence of the plaintiff until the further order of the court. From the bill of exceptions it appears that the residence mentioned is the residence of both parties; indeed, that it is the home- stead of said parties; that the plaintiff and defendant are husband and wife; that both of them are 74 years of age or thereabouts; and that an unmarried daughter and at least one son are members of the same household. It also appears that the plaintiff was, on the 14th day of September, 1921, confined to her bed; that she had suffered from two strokes of paralysis, and was in a nervous condition; that she occupied a room upstairs in a roomy house, and defendant's room is downstairs. In his affidavit the defendant claimed that his properties were being withheld from him by his wife, and that he had commenced an action against her to recover the same, and had progressed to a point where a receiver had been appointed and the receiver had obtained possession of certain of the properties, but the defendant had not obtained physical possession thereof. The daughter, Adelaide, acted as secretary for her mother.

In the affidavit of the daughter it is stated:

"That on the 14th day of September, 1921, said defendant stated in the hearing of plaintiff that, if he did not receive from her the sum of $1,000 immediately, he would sell the household furniture and furnishings of plaintiff; that defendant accused one of his sons of stealing his (defendant's) shoes; that the conduct and statements of defendant caused plaintiff to become extremely nervous and ill, and caused plaintiff to cry; * * * that defendant called in the police; * * * that defendant conducted himself in a loud, angry, and belligerent manner; that plaintiff heard the altercation between defendant and his said son, and the conversation between the police officers and the defendant and said Dr. Wilson; that the conduct of said defendant resulted in plaintiff crying, and caused her to become extremely nervous and ill; that affiant fears that, if said defendant is not removed from said residence, his conduct may result in the death of the plaintiff herein, affiant's mother."

Some of the foregoing facts are corroborated in the affidavit of Dr. L. E. Wilson. The doctor also states:

"That it is absolutely necessary that the plaintiff herein be kept quiet and undisturbed, and that the presence of the defendant in the house with plaintiff excites her to such a degree that it is highly dangerous."

There is no statement in the evidence that the defendant has threatened physical injury, or that he has been guilty of physical injury to the plaintiff. Under these circumstances it may not be said that the trial court was acting within a sound discretion in making the order excluding the defendant from his residence pending the hearing of the divorce case. In so ruling we are not to be understood as holding that the order is proper or can be made under other circumstances.

[2] Provisional remedies in divorce cases are the matter of statutory regulation. Grannis v. Superior Court, 146 Cal. 245, 256, 79 Pac. 891, 106 Am. St. Rep. 23; Civ. Code, §§ 136-148. Counsel have not called to our attention and we find no statute in California authorizing the making of such an order. In Iowa the Supreme Court recently held in Moir v. Moir, 182 Iowa, 370, 165 N. W. 1001, that an injunction would not be issued in a divorce case to prevent a wife from killing her husband, the court saying:

"According to the plaintiff, one who has made it clear that she has murderous intentions, and has given probable cause to believe that she will carry them out, will be adequately restrained by an injunctive order. This means that, while the punishment for murder will be no deterrent, the danger of comparatively very mild punishment for contempt of court will insure safety from murderous attack. Another differentiation from the usual is that the husband will suffer great impairment in health and may even suffer death because the wife uses profane and abusive epithets. The claim first adverted to will receive no serious consideration here. There is no imminent danger of murder on the part of one who will desist because a restraining order issues. It might be added that such order is not supposed to be usually available to restrain the commission of a crime."

In Chapman v. Chapman, 25 N. J. Eq. 394, the wife alleged the adultery of her husband. By an interlocutory motion she asked that he be excluded, pending the litigation, from the house, which she alleged was her own property. The court said:

"The question here is, whether this court will exclude the defendant from the house in which he and his wife reside with their family, and where as yet he has a right to dwell, merely because his wife has filed her bill for divorce on the ground of adultery. To do so would, to say the least of it, be to prejudge him. Certainly, the proposition that a husband against whom his wife files a bill for divorce on the ground of adultery, is, in case she claims to be the owner of the house in which they dwell, to be banished from his home until it shall have been determined by the result of the litigation whether his wife's charges are well or ill founded, is novel and extraordinary. It cannot be maintained. The prayer of the petition is denied, and the petition dismissed."

[3] The respondent objects to the bill of exceptions being used by appellant because it does not contain an exception. It does not expressly contain an exception, but the statute writes into such a bill certain exceptions. Code Civ. Proc. § 647.

The respondent objects to a consideration of the appellant's main point to the effect that orders 1 and 4 were improperly made. In making this objection respondent claims that the appellant is resting his case on the proposition that certain findings are not supported by the evidence. But, as we understand the appellant, he is not making such a claim, nor is he claiming that the trial court should have made findings in ruling on a mere motion. Waller v. Weston, 125 Cal. 201, 204, 57 Pac. 892. We understand him to be claiming that the evidence received did not warrant injunctive relief either mandatory or prohibitory in so far as orders 1 and 4 are concerned.

For the reasons herein set forth, orders hereinabove numbered 1 and 4 are reversed.

PEOPLE v. ROMERO. (Cr. 863.)(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 29, 1922.)1. Criminal law §377—Accused cannot introduce evidence of good reputation for veracity.

It was not error for the court to restrict the testimony of witnesses as to the character of accused in a prosecution for homicide with reference to the reputation of accused for truth, honesty, and integrity.

2. Criminal law §1170½(5)—Cross-examination as to matter otherwise testified to without objection by same witness is not prejudicial.

Error, if any, in permitting cross-examination of a witness for defendant as to whether the mother of witness did not state defendant took a knife was not prejudicial to accused where substantially the identical question was asked in another part of the cross-examination, and an answer permitted by the defendant without objection.

3. Criminal law §1110(6)—Court can correct record as to matters within own knowledge without calling witnesses.

The omission from the transcript of testimony of some language of the witness was a matter entirely within the court's own knowledge, the evidence having been received in its presence, and it was therefore not necessary to call any witnesses to testify concerning it before an order incorporating the omitted language in the record was made.

4. Criminal law §1110(2)—Court can correct stenographic transcript of testimony.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 273, the notes of the shorthand reporter and his transcript made from them are only prima facie evidence of the testimony, and it is the duty of the judge to make the record contain the language used by the witness by allowing an amendment of the record to supply omitted testimony.

5. Criminal law §683(1)—Shirt worn by accused held admissible in rebuttal of testimony he was wounded.

In a prosecution for homicide, where accused testified that he was wounded in several places, and bled profusely, it was proper rebuttal for a witness for the state to produce the shirt worn by accused when he was arrested shortly after the homicide to show there was no blood on it.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment upon a verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The evidence substantially establishes the following, among other facts: On a Saturday night and Sunday morning a dance was given at the house of Emilio Duran, at Lankershim. The members of the party consumed a considerable amount of intoxicating liquor, and on Sunday morning, as the dancers were leaving, a dispute arose between one Reza and one Dalgado. During the difficulty, which appears to have been more or less of a free-for-all fight, Emilio Duran received a knife wound from which he shortly afterward died. The defendant was observed by witnesses brandishing a knife at the door of the Duran home, at which time he made the statement that he would permit no one to leave the house. This was shortly preceding the time that the deceased was stabbed. It was testified also that the defendant stabbed Juan Duran, the father of the deceased, and another party named Escarziga.

[1] It is not contended that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict, but the appeal is based upon several alleged errors, first of which is that the court restricted the testimony of character witnesses, refusing to permit them to state the defendant's reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity. This ruling by the court was a proper one. People v. Cowgill, 93 Cal. 596, 29 Pac. 228, and People v. Fair, 43 Cal. 137.

[2] Maria Salisado was called as a witness on behalf of the defendant. On cross-examination she was asked whether or not upon a certain occasion subsequent to the killing, her mother did not tell her that Jose Romero took a large knife with which he used to kill hogs to the dance. This was objected to upon cross-examination, and the objection was overruled. The witness answered the question. It cannot be said that the court's ruling upon this was prejudicial, even though erroneous, because almost the identical question was asked in another part of the cross-examination, and an answer permitted by the defendant without objection. This question was as follows:

"Did not your mother state, in your presence, on the 23d of August, 1921, the time which I have mentioned, that Jose Romero took the knife which he had in the house and used to kill hogs, to the dance with him that night?"

[3, 4] It is urged that the court erred in allowing an amendment of the record of the daily transcript of testimony to supply some language which the reporter had omitted. The matter was one entirely within the court's own knowledge, the evidence having been received in its presence, and it was not necessary to call any witnesses to testify concerning the matter before the order was made. The notes of the shorthand reporter and his transcript made from them are only prima facie evidence of the testimony. Section 273, Code Civ. Proc. It is the duty of the judge to make the record contain the language used. This was directly decided in People v. Cox, 76 Cal. 281, 18 Pac. 332, concerning the instructions and the same principle applies to the testimony.

[5] Objection is made to several rulings of the court on the taking of the testimony of the witness Krause. As to those pertaining to questions on direct examination, the objections urged upon appeal were not stated when the questions were asked and the court's ruling made. The same witness was called by the prosecution in rebuttal, and was shown a shirt. This he testified was the one which defendant was wearing when he was arrested soon after the homicide. To this evidence objection was made that it was not proper as rebuttal. The defendant had testified that during the fight he had been wounded in several places, and had bled a great deal. The shirt was offered to rebut this testimony. For that purpose it was competent and relevant. The fact, if it were one, that there were no bloodstains on it would be a matter to be weighed by the jury in determining whether or not the defendant's statements about having been injured were true. However, if it had such stains, this would, of course, corroborate his testimony.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 22, 1922.)

1. Costs $\S$ 112(2)—Demand for security from nonresident plaintiff sufficient, though not filed and though after demurrer and answer.

Demand for security for costs from a nonresident plaintiff is sufficient, though not filed in the action and though made after demurrer and answer, there being no requirement to the contrary in Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 1036, 1037.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1024(3)—Finding on question of fact of nonresidence of plaintiff for purpose of security for costs not disturbed.

The finding by the trial court on the question of fact of nonresidence of plaintiff for purpose of security of costs cannot be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Wm. H. Dehy, Judge.

Action by Sarah J. Wall against J. George Hunter and others. From judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. B. Chapin, Lee R. Taylor, and James L. King, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. Aird Adair, of Riverside, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment dismissing her action as to the defendant John J. Wall, upon the ground that she had failed to comply with a demand for security for costs in the action, she being a nonresident of the state. The action was commenced on August 19, 1919, by plaintiff against three defendants, Hunter, Wall, and Winder, charging them with alienating the affections of her husband and in procuring him to make a will disinheriting her. Summons was served upon the defendant Wall while he was in attendance upon the superior court in Riverside county during the progress of plaintiff's contest of the will of her husband. On May 5, 1920, the defendant, Wall, served and filed his special appearance in this action and at the same time gave notice of motion to quash the service of summons, upon the ground that he was a resident of the state of Nevada and was served while in attendance upon the court as a suitor and party interested in said proceedings and as a witness thereat. On the same day the defendant Wall served and filed a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, upon the sole ground that the trial court had no jurisdiction of the defendant. The motion to quash was granted and the demurrer sustained. The plaintiff thereupon sued out a writ of certiorari to review these orders, and, on July 19, 1920, the District Court of Appeal of the Second district, Division 2, ruled that, by the filing of the demurrer to the complaint, the defendant, Wall, had submitted his person to the jurisdiction of the court and that it was error to grant the motion and sustain his demurrer. It was held, however, that, as plaintiff had an adequate remedy by appeal, certiorari would not lie, and accordingly the writ was discharged. Thereafter the matter was again brought before the superior court, and, on January 13, 1921, the court made an order setting aside its previous ruling and overruled the demurrer and granted this defendant 20 days in which to answer the complaint. On January 22, 1921, this defendant served on the plaintiff a demand for security for costs, in accordance with the provisions of section 1036, Code of Civil Procedure, based upon the ground that she was a nonresident of the state. As the plaintiff failed to comply with the demand in the 30 days allowed by section 1037, this defendant, on February 25, 1921, served and filed his notice of motion to dismiss the action. This motion was granted some four months later, on June 29, 1921, and judgment followed dismissing the action as to defendant, Wall. In this judgment the trial court found as a matter of fact that the plaintiff had failed and neglected to file an undertaking within the time allowed by the statute and that none had been filed at the time of the judgment, and that the plaintiff was in fact a nonresident of the state at the time of the institution of the action. It is from this judgment that the appeal is prosecuted.

The points urged by appellant are (1) that the defendant, Wall, having answered the complaint by filing a general demurrer and afterwards an answer thereto, waived his right to make a demand for security for costs; (2) that the court erred in dismissing the action because the plaintiff was in fact a resident of the state of California; and (3) that the court erred in dismissing the action because the demand for costs was not "filed" in the action.

[1, 2] As to points 1 and 3, it is sufficient to refer to the statute, sections 1036 and 1037, Code of Civil Procedure. These sections do not require that the demand for costs be filed or that it be made and served upon the plaintiff before demurrer or answer. As to the second point urged, it is sufficient to say that the question whether the plaintiff was in fact a nonresident of the state was the very question which the trial court was called upon to decide and, having found that she was a nonresident, the judgment cannot be disturbed.

Judgment affirmed.

MARTIN v. GOING. (Civ. 3768.)

1. Assignments §134—On denial of assignment in action on labor claims, burden on assignee to show assignment in writing.

Where, in an action by the assignee of labor claims, the answer denied the allegations made in the complaint as to the assignments, the effect of such denial was to place the burden upon plaintiff to show assignments made in accordance with the requirements of Civ. Code, § 955, providing that no assignment of wages should be valid unless made in writing by the person by whom the wages were earned.

2. Master and servant §83—Penalty wages stopped by action.

Under St. 1919, p. 294 (Deering's Gen. Laws Supp. 1921, Act No. 2142b), "penalty wages" stopped running upon the commencement of an action to collect.

3. Assignments §80—Penalty wages not preserved after assignment of claim.

An assignment of a labor claim does not carry with it and preserve in favor of the assignee the right to penalty accruing subsequent to the date of assignment, under St. 1919, p. 294 (Deering's Gen. Laws Supp. 1921, Act No. 2142b).

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by J. C. Martin against J. S. Going. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Nowell & Moran, of Tulare, and Lamberson & Lamberson, of Visalia, for appellant.

A. P. Harris and Burns & Watkins, all of Fresno, for respondent.

JAMES, J. The appeal in this case was taken from a judgment for the sum of $485.30 entered against appellant.

Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that he had acquired by assignment three claims for farm labor performed by individuals upon the ranch of appellant. He alleged that one Martin performed labor from July 11 to August 5, 1920, at the reasonable value of $81.40; that one Clark performed labor from July 4 to August 5, 1920, at the value of $68; and one Long performed labor from the 31st of May to August 5, 1920, at the reasonable value of $115.40. These claims totaled the sum of $264.80. The difference between this amount and the amount for which judgment was awarded is made up of sums which the court assessed as penalties because of the failure of appellant to pay the wages on demand. Preliminarily it is worth while to state that, upon the face of the record, a fair inference is indicated that the plaintiff here acquired these claims for the purpose of making collection of them. The transaction in that light would be a perfectly legitimate and legal one, but it is somewhat remarkable that, as these claims in their several original amounts, and including any penalty that might be imposed were each within the jurisdiction of the justice's court, they were lumped together so that the alleged assignee's demand brought the amount within the jurisdiction of the superior court. Instead of trying the actions in the justice's court, where a speedy trial could be had, and a prompt disposition of the matters be made in the superior court in the event of an appeal thereto, the claimants have chosen to put the controversy in a position where it has necessarily been attended by largely increased expenses for printing and other costs, and added delay before final determination is reached. However, the controversy has been brought here, and the questions presented will be fully considered.

[1] Among other contentions made appellant insists that no right is shown in the plaintiff to recover because no valid assignment was proved to have been executed by the three original claimants. In this connection section 955 of the Civil Code is cited, which expressly provides that—

"No assignment of, or order for, wages or salary shall be valid unless made in writing by the person by whom the said wages or salary are earned. * * *

The defendant in his answer specifically denied the allegations made in the complaint as to the assignments, and the effect of such denial was to place the burden upon the plaintiff to show, by legal evidence, assignments made in accordance with the requirements of the Code provision. That such a denial in the answer was sufficient to put in issue the sufficiency of the assignments is established by the cases of Wakefield v. Greenwood, 29 Cal. 597, and Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, at page 535, 21 Pac. 984, 4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162. These decisions also hold that, where the issue of the statute of frauds is made, plaintiff must prove a sufficient contract, and it is declared that this can "be done only by the production of proof of the execution and contents of the written agreement, or some note or memorandum thereof executed according to the provisions of the statute of frauds." See, also, Jonas v. Field, 83 Ala. 445, 3 South. 893; Brown on Statute of Frauds (5th Ed.) § 535; Gard v. Ramos, 23 Cal. App. 303, 138 Pac. 108. Respondent replies to this contention with the argument that, as the assignors were permitted without objection to answer general questions in the affirmative as to whether they had assigned their claims to the plaintiff, it is now too late to question the sufficiency of the proof. Defendant was entitled to rest upon his answer raising the issue, and to require that the plaintiff establish the assignments by legal evidence, and that, as the authorities cited hold, could only be done by the production of a writing properly executed, or at least proof that one had been so made. Respondent's argument would be sound were the situation one where witnesses had testified without objection that written assignments had been made; in that case the opposite party could not be afterwards heard to complain because the writings had not been produced. The mere statement of the witnesses that each had assigned his claim, without stating the manner in which that assignment was made, fell short of establishing the fact in the required manner.

While the conclusion expressed on the contention just discussed is determinative of this appeal, in view of the fact that further proceedings may be had it will be advisable to consider other objections which have been urged.

Appellant argues that the evidence was insufficient to show that any contractual relation existed between the defendant and the alleged assignors of the plaintiff. This contention must be considered in the light of the evidence which is most favorable to plaintiff's case.

It appears that two men, Bunch and Barnes, on the 1st of April, 1920, entered into a contract with the defendant, who was the owner of a ranch, whereby they agreed to crop the ground and receive one-half of the proceeds as compensation. Under that contract they were to pay all expenses except for "power." Barnes and Bunch did not work harmoniously, and on the 4th day of May, Barnes having retired from the contract with the consent of the owner of the ranch, Bunch arranged with the defendant to proceed with the growing and harvesting of the crop of hay. Bunch testified that the original agreement was entirely abrogated and that the defendant agreed from then on to pay all expenses incident to the growing and harvesting of the crop, and that for his services Bunch was to have one-half of that crop less the cost of producing the whole. He stated that he was under the direction of the defendant as to the manner in which the crop was to be grown and that he performed his part of the agreement and remained on the ranch until the hay was harvested, baled and stacked; he testified that he gave written orders on the defendant for the payment of claims of laborers, which were honored up to the time that the three assignors of the plaintiff who had been employed by Bunch on defendant's ranch, asked to be paid. It appeared by his testimony that he had received no part of the hay, and that the matter of adjusting his own claim remained open. Without making any further statement of the evidence, it has already appeared that there was some substantial evidence upon which the trial court might properly conclude that, after the making of the agreement between Bunch and the defendant, and after Barnes left the ranch, Bunch became the agent of the defendant in the matter of hiring men to care for and harvest the hay crop. The testimony of the defendant, from which it would appear that Bunch did not act as his agent, but that he (the defendant) advanced to Bunch as a loan various sums of money, created a conflict which it was the trial court's duty to resolve, and as to which this court has no concern.

[2, 3] Another contention made by appellant is that the court erred in allowing recovery for additional sums as penalties for nonpayment of the alleged wages. In the Statutes of 1919, p. 294 (Deering's General Laws, 1921 Supplement, p. 1552), it is provided that, as to an employee not working under a written contract for a definite period, his wages shall become due and payable not later than 72 hours after termination of the employment, and that (section 5), where an employer willfully fails to pay such wages, "as a penalty for such nonpayment the wages or compensation of such employees shall continue from the due date thereof at the same rate until paid, or until an action therefor shall be commenced; provided, that in no case shall such wages continue for more than thirty days. * * *"

To this point appellant's argument consists mainly of the assertion that the penalty could not be collected because appellant was not shown to have employed plaintiff's alleged assignors. That question is necessarily determined by what has been last stated in the foregoing. However, attention should be called to the fact that, while the court allowed as a penalty on each claim a sum equal to 30 days' wages, it appeared that the original complaint herein was filed on August 24, 1920, and all of the amounts alleged to be owing were alleged to have accrued on August 5, 1920. Furthermore, the court, referring to the assignment, found only that such assignment had been made "prior to the commencement of the action." These facts suggest two questions, which may be thus answered: (1) Under the terms of the statute the "penalty wages" would stop running upon the commencement of an action to collect the same, where the action is brought by an original claimant. But 19 days elapsed between the cessation of labor and the commencement of the action; hence in no event could there be a thirty-day penalty allowed. (2) An assignment of a labor claim cannot carry with it and preserve in favor of the assignee the right to a penalty accruing subsequent to the date of the assignment. For aught that appears in the findings of the court, the assignment may have been made on any day subsequent to the cessation of work. For the various reasons expressed it is clear that the judgment cannot be sustained.

The judgment is reversed.

SANDOVAL v. SALAZAR. (Civ. 4219.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 22, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 20, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error §933(1)—Order denying motion for new trial presumed correct.

Where the record showed that a notice of intention to move for a new trial was served and filed, but did not show that the motion was ever made, or, if made, what evidence was introduced to support it, an order denying the motion is presumed to be correct.

2. Reference §103(1)—Statutory modes of attacking referee's report and subsequent judgment referred to.

The only statutory modes of attack on the report of the referee and a judgment entered pursuant to such a report is that provided under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 663-663a, or 656-660.

3. Appeal and error §1044—Stipulation for reference not indorsed, filed until after entry of judgment, held not to warrant reversal.

The fact that a referee was appointed by the court on a stipulation of the attorneys which was not indorsed, filed by the clerk until after the referee had made his report and the court had entered judgment, did not warrant a reversal of the judgment.

4. Reference §2, 99(1)—Statute relating to trial by referees held constitutional.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 638-645, relating to trials by referees, is not violative of Const. art. 6, § 14, as the referee's report may be accepted or rejected by the trial court which renders the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by A. Sandoval against L. M. Salazar. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Chatterson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Schmidt & Riggins, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff brought an action in conversion against the defendant, he obtained a judgment, and thereafter he moved for a new trial and the motion was denied, and he also made a motion to vacate the judgment and that motion was denied. After the judgment was entered and before the motion for a new trial was ruled on the trial court made an order that a certain stipulation and the report of a referee should be filed as of May 18, 1921, one week before the judgment was ordered. The defendant served a paper purporting to be a notice of appeal from each and all of said determinations, including the judgment and each of said orders. The appeal was taken under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appellant has brought up the clerk's transcript, but has not brought up a transcript of the reporter's notes or any paper purporting to be a bill of exceptions. On the 5th day of January, 1921, Carroll Allen, Esq., as attorney for plaintiff, and Frank P. Jenal, Esq., as attorney for defendant, entered into a stipulation:

"Whereas the issues of fact raised by the complaint and answer in this case requires the examination of long accounts on both sides; and whereas, the parties hereto desire a reference made to enable the court to determine said action as provided for in sections 638 and 639 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California: Now, therefore, it is hereby stipulated that an order may be entered herein appointing W. J. Palethorpe as referee to hear and report upon the facts involving such accounting so raised by the complaint and answer herein."

On that date there was indorsed on the foot of said stipulation the following:

"So ordered. John W. Shenk, Judge. January 5, 1921."

The paper was filed May 18, 1921. On June 27, 1921, an order was made as follows:

"It appearing to the court that the stipulation for the order of reference herein and the order of reference based thereon, together with a report and findings of the referee were filed with the clerk of this court on May 18, 1921, and that by an oversight the same bear no filing date or mark of said clerk, and that the same have not been formally filed: It is hereby ordered that the clerk is, be, and is hereby directed to file said stipulation, order of reference and said report and findings of the referee as of date May 18, 1921."

A report of a referee is set forth in the transcript, and is marked filed May 18, 1921. On May 3, 1921, the same attorneys entered into a stipulation filed on that day, which provided, among other things:

"That each of said parties waives his right to appeal from the findings of the said referee and the judgment entered herein."

The judgment entered May 25, 1921, contains the following recitals:

"The issues of fact in this case having been referred to W. J. Palethorpe and said referee having heard evidence thereon and having filed his report herein, and it having been stipulated by the parties to this action that the same should be accepted as final, and findings having been waived by stipulation and said matter coming on regularly to be heard this day upon motion of Carroll Allen, Esq., attorney for plaintiff," etc.

[1, 2] The appellant vigorously attacks the above stipulations. In making his attacks he has not followed any rule of practice that authorizes him to have a hearing in this court. Secondly, even though he had done so as a matter of substantive law his attack is without merit. Addressing ourselves to the former proposition first, it is clear that by reason of a recital in the judgment this court must assume that the judgment was based, at least in part, on a report of W. J. Palethorpe as referee but whether such reference was made by any stipulation or by the above stipulation does not appear. The record before us shows that a notice of intention to move for a new trial was served and filed, but the record does not show, excepting by inference, that the motion was ever made, or, if made, on what grounds it was made or what evidence was introduced in support of the motion. The only additional material contained in the record regarding that motion is that an order was made July 7, 1921, denying a motion for a new trial. We must presume that the motion was improperly made or improperly supported, and that the order denying the same was properly made. The nunc pro tunc order above set forth is regular on its face, and there is nothing in the record before us to show that the recitals contained in it are not true and correct, and we must presume that they are what they purport to be. On July 1, 1921, the defendant gave notice that he would move the court to vacate the order of June 27, 1921. The transcript contains the defendant's affidavit made on the 30th day of June, 1921. Assuming for the purposes of argument that said affidavit was used to support the motion noticed for hearing, there is nothing in the affidavit showing or tending to show that the recitals contained in the nunc pro tunc order are not true and correct. The same notice and affidavit purport to make an attack on the report of the referee and on the judgment. Such practice is not authorized in this state. The appellant did not make his attack under sections 473, 663-663a, or 656-660 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No other modes of attack are provided by our statutes.

[3] Assuming that the judgment was based on the report of W. J. Palethorpe as referee; that the referee was appointed by the trial court on a stipulation of the attorneys; that the stipulation of the attorneys was not indorsed filed by the clerk until the referee had made his report and until the trial court had entered its judgment; and that the judgment of the trial court was entered before the report of the referee had been indorsed by the clerk with the filing mark—said facts, taken singly or collectively, are of such a nature as not to warrant a reversal of the judgment by this court. Coonan v. Loewenthal, 129 Cal. 197, 200, 61 Pac. 940.

[4] Assuming that sections 638-645, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure provide that a referee may render a judgment, the appellant contends that such provisions of the statute are unconstitutional as being in violation of section 14, article 6, of the state Constitution. The vice in this contention rests in the assumption on which it is based. A referee is appointed to make a report. The report may be accepted or rejected. In any event the trial court renders the judgment.

No error is made to appear by the record presented to this court. The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. NAVARETTE. (Cr. 611.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California. June 2, 1922.)Homicide ⚡234(1)—Evidence held sufficient to show defendant fired the shot which killed deceased.

In a prosecution for the murder of a railroad brakeman while he was attempting to eject several Mexicans from a car in which they were riding, evidence held sufficient to sustain the jury's finding that it was defendant who fired the shot which killed the brakeman.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Ygnasio Navarette was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

P. H. Johnson and M. A. Thomas, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant appeals from the judgment of conviction of the crime of murder of the second degree and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The defendant and four other Mexicans and three white men were riding at night, without authority or permission, in an open freight car, known as a gondola car, attached to a Southern Pacific train. A brakeman ordered the Mexicans to leave the train, saying the white men might remain. The train was moving at a speed of about six miles an hour in a southerly direction. The white men and one of the Mexicans were at the west side of the car and the other Mexicans at the front. At the time of the shooting the brakeman was standing in the center of the car. Two of the white men testified that when the brakeman ordered the Mexicans to leave, those in the front of the car moved towards the rear past the brakeman, but that the one on the west side with the white men did not change his position; that the brakeman then fired a shot over the head of the Mexican who had refused to move, whereupon one of the Mexicans who were moving towards the rear shot the brakeman from a distance of four to six feet away, and that at the time the brakeman was facing the rear end of the car. The bullet entered the right side three inches above the hip bone and ranged slightly backward to the left side, causing death. Alexander Verdugo, one of the Mexicans, testified that the Mexicans were in the front of the car at the time of the shooting; that the brakeman shot twice over the head of the Mexican who was at the west side of the car, and that thereupon the defendant shot the brakeman; that he saw the defendant fire the shot which killed the brakeman; that the witness and the defendant immediately jumped off the car and left together; that as they were walking away the defendant said he had shot the brakeman and hoped he would die; that the defendant said: "I wish I had some Mexican to give the gun to," and then threw the gun away. The defendant testified that he did not shoot the brakeman and did not know who shot him.

The only ground urged for a reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to show that the defendant fired the fatal shot. The evidence is so clearly sufficient that any further discussion of the matter would be superfluous.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

ESPONDA v. KELLY et al. (Civ. 4230.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 22, 1922.)

1. Animals ⚡22—Substitution of bailee held a "novation."

There is a novation within Civ. Code, § 1531, whereby one becomes a substitute for bailee of cattle for pasturage where he receives the animals from the original bailee, and in consideration thereof agrees with him to return them to the bailor upon the latter's demand in consideration of bailor's cancellation of original bailee's obligation and bailor's acceptance of the substituted bailee's promise to redeliver in lieu of such obligation of the original bailee.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Novation.]

2. Adverse possession ⚡64—Limitations do not run in favor of substitute bailee holding property in recognition of bailor's right.

Where a person holds property as substitute bailee by novation, his assertion of an adverse claim of which bailor has notice may set in motion the statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 3, and section 339, subd. 1), but so long as he holds in recognition of bailor's right the statute will not run; and the rule is not altered merely because bailor assigns the property after the substitution.

Action by Mary Esponda against J. J. Kelly and Ione Kelly. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. B. Beazley, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Dorris & Henderson and Kaye & Siemon, all of Bakersfield, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Action for damages for conversion. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendants appeal. The case comes before this court on the judgment roll alone; no transcript of evidence or bill of exceptions having been filed. The facts as found by the trial court are that at all times prior to September 5, 1917, plaintiff's husband, Bernardo Esponda, was the owner of and entitled to the possession of certain personal property, to wit, nine head of cattle, which was the community property of plaintiff and her husband; that on that date he assigned to plaintiff as her separate property all of his right, title, and interest therein, together with all rights, claims, and demands growing out of his previous ownership thereof; that on or about September 22, 1914, plaintiff's assignor placed said cattle, which were then calves of approximately one year of age, in the care, custody, and keeping of one Ansolabehere as a bailee for hire for the purpose of pasturing them, and Ansolabehere then and there agreed to return the cattle to plaintiff's assignor upon demand. Five days later "defendant J. J. Kelly took and received the said cattle from the possession of the said Ansolabehere, and in consideration thereof the said J. J. Kelly then and there promised, undertook, and agreed to and with the said Ansolabehere to return and redeliver said cattle to the said Bernardo Esponda upon demand of said Bernardo Esponda in consideration of the cancellation by said Bernardo Esponda of the obligation of said Ansolabehere to redeliver said cattle on demand and the acceptance by said Esponda of the promise and agreement of the defendant J. J. Kelly in lieu of and as a substitute for such obligation of said Ansolabehere; and thereafter, on or about January 1, 1915, said Esponda approved and ratified the agreement so made by the defendant J. J. Kelly with the said Ansolabehere and accepted the same as a substitute for and released the said Ansolabehere from and canceled the obligation of said Ansolabehere to redeliver said cattle to said Esponda on demand"; that thereafter, and on or about September 27, 1917, after receiving the assignment referred to, plaintiff made demand upon defendant J. J. Kelly for the return of said property, but the said defendant then and there failed, refused, and neglected, and at all times since has continued to fail, refuse, and neglect to return or redeliver said property or any part thereof to the plaintiff or to the plaintiff's husband, and said Kelly thereupon converted said property and the whole thereof to his own use and benefit. Defendants pleaded that the action was barred by the provisions of section 338, subd. 3, and section 339, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, prescribing respectively three and two years as the period of limitation.

[1, 2] The only point made by appellant is that demand for the return of the property was not made within time; that the time within which it should have been made was coincident with the period provided in the statute of limitations for barring the action. There is no merit in this contention. J. J. Kelly's possession of the property was with the consent of plaintiff's assignor and under an express agreement to return it upon demand. The facts shown constitute a novation (Civ. Code, § 1531; Molera v. Cooper, 173 Cal. 259, 160 Pac. 231) by which he was substituted for the original bailee. Any assertion of an adverse claim by appellant J. J. Kelly of which respondent or her assignor had either actual or constructive notice may have set the statute in motion, but so long as he held the property as bailee for respondent or her assignor and recognized that relation the statute would not run in his favor. Estate of Rathgeb, 125 Cal. 302, 57 Pac. 1010. The refusal to comply with respondent's demand amounted to a conversion of the property and a cause of action then arose.

Judgment affirmed.

et al. (Civ. 3894.)

1. Judgment $\S$ 155—Notice of motion to open default need not allege particular facts to be relied on.

Notice of motion to open default under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, need not set forth a statement of the particular facts on which defendants will rely, but it is enough to allege that motion will be made on the ground that judgment had been entered through the mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect of defendants, and each of them, and on the affidavits and verified answer of defendants.

2. Judgment $\S$ 159—Affidavits for opening default held to authorize conclusion of excusable neglect.

Affidavits of M., secretary, and O., president, of defendant corporation, for opening default against the three—that of M. stating that immediately after service of summons and complaint he took them to an attorney and requested him to represent him, and that it was understood that he would represent all defendants, and that of O. that when summons and complaint were served it was agreed that M. should consult the corporation's attorney, and request him to conduct the defense, and that he was informed by M. that he had so consulted the attorney and that he had agreed to conduct the defense—entitled the court to conclude that a case of excusable neglect was made out.

3. Judgment ☞160—Affidavit of merits for opening default sufficient.

The affidavit of merits for opening default that affiant had stated all the facts of the case to his attorney, and had been advised by him that he had a good and meritorious defense, is sufficient in form and substance.

4. Judgment ☞160—Affidavit of merits for opening default aided by answer.

Affidavit of merits for opening default is aided by verified answer tendered at the hearing and raising material issues.

5. Appeal and error ☞957(1)—Judgment ☞139—Opening default judgment interfered with only for abuse of discretion.

Motions to vacate defaults and default judgments are peculiarly addressed to the trial judge's discretion, and in view of the policy of the law to allow trial on the merits, orders of vacation will be interfered with only where a clear and unmistakable abuse of that discretion is shown.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Aileen Alvarado against the Sunset Supper Club and others. From an order granting motion to set aside default judgment against certain defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. M. Gordon, of San Diego, for appellant.

Leonard Wright, of San Diego, for respondents.

JAMES, J. This action was brought to recover from defendants an amount of money as damages. Defendants Sunset Supper Club (a corporation), Tony Matowich, and George Morris failed to answer within the time fixed by law after service of summons, and their default was duly entered and judgment taken on May 18, 1921. On the 13th of June, 1921, after notice to the plaintiff, said defendants presented to the superior court their motion to set aside the default and the judgment entered thereon and to be allowed to file an answer. The court made an order granting the motion, conditioned upon said defendants paying to the plaintiff the sum of $33.30 costs, which costs were paid. The plaintiff has appealed from the order.

[1-4] In support of the appeal it is argued by counsel for the plaintiff that the showing made by the defendants was insufficient to authorize the trial court to grant the motion. It is contended that the notice of motion was insufficient in its statement of grounds, that the facts shown by the affidavits did not establish that the neglect on the part of the defendants in failing to appear and answer was excusable, and that no sufficient affidavit of merits was presented. The notice of motion did state that it would be made upon the grounds that the default judgment had been entered through the "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect of these defendants, and each of them," and that the motion would be made upon the affidavits of the individual defendants and upon the verified answer of said defendants, including the Sunset Supper Club. The notice of motion contained all of the statements requisite under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, and it was neither necessary nor proper that there should be set forth therein a statement of the particular facts upon which the defendants would rely. By the affidavits of the defendants facts were shown which entitled the court to conclude that a case of excusable neglect was made out. These affidavits showed that defendant Tony Matowich, immediately after service thereof, took a copy of the summons and complaint to an attorney, and requested said attorney to represent him; he set forth in the affidavit that it was understood that said attorney would represent all defendants. It appeared by Matowich's affidavit that he was secretary of the defendant corporation. In the affidavit of defendant Morris it was stated that said defendant was president of defendant corporation; that when the summons and complaint were served it was agreed that Matowich should consult the attorney of defendant corporation and request him to conduct the defense of the action, and that said defendant was informed by Matowich that he had so consulted the attorney, and that the latter had agreed to attend to the defense of the action. These two affidavits were made on behalf of the individual defendants and also on behalf of the corporation. Each one contained the statement that the affiant had "stated all the facts of said case to his said attorney, and has been advised by him that he has a good and meritorious defense to the plaintiff's cause of action." The affidavit of merits was sufficient in form and substance; moreover, it was aided by a verified answer, which was tendered at the hearing of the motion, and which raised material issues. Savage v. Smith, 170 Cal. 472, 150 Pac. 353.

[5] The attorney to whom Matowich had taken the summonses in the first instance testified orally on the hearing of the motion that Matowich came to his office with one of the defendants Topuzes, and that he was requested to secure a dismissal of the action as to Topuzes, but he did not understand that he had been employed to represent the other defendants, although he testified that it was "entirely possible that Matowich may have believed so." He testified further: "They are Greek; they speak rather imperfect English, and may not have fully understood all that occurred." This attorney was at that time representing defendant Matowich in another proceeding, and had also, at a prior time, been the attorney for defendant corporation. It has been declared over and over again in the appellate decisions of this state that it is the policy of the law to allow causes to be tried upon their merits; that motions to vacate defaults and default judgments are peculiarly addressed to the discretion of the trial judge, and that only in cases where a clear and unmistakable abuse of that discretion is shown will an appellate court interfere with such orders. Berri v. Rogero, 168 Cal. 736, 740, 145 Pac. 95; Savage v. Smith, supra; Lynch v. De Boom, 26 Cal. App. 311, 146 Pac. 908; Morton v. Shannon, 26 Cal. App. 689, 147 Pac. 1179; *McMunn v. Principal and agent §78(1)—Parties held not entitled to accounting where accounts were loosely kept.

Where plaintiff and defendant operated a jewelry and repair shop with defendant as manager, plaintiff furnishing the stock and agreeing to pay defendant a part of the profits from sales as salary, and plaintiff and defendant at different times operated the store alone and made sales which were not entered in the books, neither party was entitled to an accounting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasley, Judge.

Action by Marcus Blanchard against Samuel M. Haig, in which defendant interposed a counterclaim. Relief was denied both parties, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. A. Blanchard, of San Jose, for appellant.

W. H. Johnson, of San Jose, from respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This action was one brought to recover certain sums of money and other personal property of the value of $1,789.67, which it is alleged defendant received as agent of the plaintiff. Defendant, by answer, denied plaintiff's allegations, and by way of counterclaim alleged that plaintiff was indebted to him in the sum of $858.75.

Relief was refused both parties, and plaintiff appeals.

It appears from the record that on or about November 1, 1917, the parties hereto entered into an agreement whereby they undertook to operate a jewelry and repair shop with defendant as manager. Plaintiff agreed to furnish the stock in trade and the store where the business was to be conducted, and to pay defendant for his services one-half of all the profits derived from sales. The trial court found, among other facts, that the total cost of merchandise purchased by plaintiff and furnished to defendant as manager for the purposes of sale amounted to the sum of $5,603.64. It further found that the total cost price of certain goods sold amounted to $1,584.36, and that an inventory of the merchandise on hand at the close of defendant's employment showed goods to the value of $2,229.61. Other findings are to the effect that the books kept by defendant did not show all of the sales made, and that both plaintiff and defendant sold merchandise not accounted for, and that in fact the books kept by the parties were inaccurate, for which reason the court found it was impossible to ascertain the amount of goods sold, the prices obtained therefor, or in any manner to arrive at a true account thereof, and accordingly judgment was denied both parties.

Appellant contends that the conclusion of the trial court that plaintiff was not entitled to recover from defendant is against law and contrary to the facts and findings, for the reason that the effect of the findings is that defendant converted to his own use merchandise or cash to the extent of at least $1,789.67. We see no force in this contention. It appeared in evidence that both plaintiff and defendant at different times operated the store alone. It also was shown, by the testimony of defendant, that he was instructed by plaintiff not to make entries of all sales for the reason that he did not desire to pay an income tax to the government, as he was not responsible for the war. True, plaintiff denied that he made any such request, but, however this may be, both plaintiff and defendant admit the making of sales which were not entered in the books. Under these circumstances the trial court could have come to no other conclusion than it did in finding that it was impossible to determine the true amount of goods sold, and what sum, if any, plaintiff was entitled to recover.

It is true that the trial court did find that the plaintiff sold $1,500 worth of merchandise, but other findings show that this amount did not indicate the full amount of sales. The findings are therefore not conflicting. So far as the record shows, both parties were in a position to bring about the claimed shortage of merchandise, and either or both of the parties may have been responsible for it. The evidence throws no light upon this subject. Under such circumstances relief was properly denied both parties.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by Mary C. McCormick against the Woodmen of the World. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. T. Moses, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Heidelberg & Murasky, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This action was brought to recover upon a benefit certificate issued by defendant company. Plaintiff is the wife and sole beneficiary of one Fasty M. McCormick, a member of defendant society, an unincorporated fraternal organization.

The action was commenced on the 20th day of November, 1920, and is one of the so-called "disappearance" cases. It appears from the record that Fasty McCormick became a member of the society on the 31st day of December, 1911. At that time the benefit certificate here sued upon was issued to him. He expressly and in writing accepted the same subject to the conditions and terms therein specified. Among these conditions was one which provided that the absence or disappearance of a member holding the certificate from his last-known place of residence for any length of time should not be sufficient evidence of his death, and that no right should accrue under such a certificate to a beneficiary or beneficiaries, nor any benefits be paid until proof had been made of the death of said member, while in good standing. Another condition provided that the beneficiary was entitled to the sum of $1,500 if the insured died within one year from the date thereof, $2,250 if death occurred within two years, and $3,000 if death occurred two years thereafter.

McCormick disappeared on the 2d day of July, 1913, and has not been seen nor heard of for more than seven years, though diligent search was made to ascertain his whereabouts, and plaintiff claims that he is dead. Judgment was rendered in her favor for $3,000, the full amount of the certificate, and defendant appeals. Appellant contended below, and does here, that the disappearance clause in the certificate bars recovery, and also that respondent is not entitled to the full amount of the policy, but is only entitled in any event to partial recovery.

[1] The record contains no direct proof that McCormick is dead, and in fact no such claim is made; plaintiff relying solely on the circumstance that the insured has been absent and neither seen nor heard from for more than seven years, and is therefore presumed to be dead. Subdivision 26, § 1963, Code Civ. Proc. It is conceded, as indeed it must be, that if the disappearance clause in the contract is valid and binding, it is conclusive against plaintiff, and no recovery can be had thereon. Respondent claims in support of the judgment, however, that the clause is against public policy and is violative of the laws of the state and contrary to the terms of the policy itself. The attempt of beneficial societies to adopt a by-law or contract relating to disappearance cases, and to control the rule of evidence with respect to the presumption of death, has been fully considered and discussed by the courts of various jurisdictions. There is considerable variance in the views of those courts upon the question. In some of the cases the assailed provision was in the by-laws at the time the contract of insurance was made; in others it appeared in after-enacted by-laws. It would be a matter of supererogation to review the authorities in detail, for we are of the opinion that the appellate courts of this state have arrayed themselves on the side of those jurisdictions which hold similar provisions to be unreasonable and against public policy. In the case of Bennett v. Modern Woodmen of America (Cal. App.) 199 Pac. 343, where a disappearance clause was considered, it was said:

"But it is a rule of common law and of the statutory enactment of this state that a person not heard from in seven years is presumed to be dead (Code Civ. Proc. 1963, subd. 26), and appellant's by-law is not only unreasonable and violative of statutory enactment, but is against the weight of public policy. It has been repeatedly so held. Reynolds v. North America Union, 204 Ill. App. 316, 327; Samberg v. Knights of Modern Macabees, 158 Mich. 568, 123 N. W. 25, 133 Am. St. Rep. 396; National Union v. Sawyer, 42 App. D. C. 475; Supreme Lodge, Knights of Pythias, v. Wilson (Tex. Civ. App.) 204 S. W. 891, 894. Its enforcement would not only have the effect to render nugatory a salutary statute, but the further result of making it practically impossible to make proofs of death in cases within the recognized experience of man, and thereby work a substantial injustice to the beneficiary. Sovereign Camp, W. O. W., v. Robinson (Tex. Civ. App.) 187 S. W. 215, 219; Reynolds v. North American Union, supra. In Olson v. Modern Woodmen of America, 182 Ia. 1018, 164 N. W. 346, L. R. A. 1918F, 1164, this same appellant invoked the defense of this same by-law. The court refused to countenance the plea, holding that its application would impose on a beneficiary the burden of paying all dues and assessments during the whole period of expectancy of the assured, thereby making the certificate practically worthless."

A transfer was denied by the Supreme Court in this case.

Counsel for appellant seeks to distinguish this authority from the instant case and claims that no question there arose as to the validity of the original contract between the member and the society, the terms upon which he was admitted to membership, and that the case involved an after-enacted by-law. We cannot distinguish this case in principle from the Bennett Case. The reasons assigned for holding the by-law in that case invalid are not less apparent or persuasive because of the fact that it was not part of the original contract of the insurer.

[2] The law implies that in every contract of insurance upon human life the insurer will pay the indemnity upon proof by competent evidence judicially tested and weighed by the law of the land, and such contracts ought to be immune from material impairment of this right. A stipulation in a contract that certain evidence only shall be admissible in case of litigation subsequently arising under such contract cannot be allowed to control the action of the court in the admission of or in the effect to be given to the evidence.

[3] Courts will not permit the course of justice upon trials before them to be stipulated and controlled in such a manner as to defeat the ends to be subserved by such trials. Parties to a contract cannot agree to oust courts of jurisdiction over such contracts. Such acts transcend their power. Utter v. Travelers' Insurance Co., 65 Mich. 545, 32 N. W. 812, 8 Am. St. Rep. 913; Travelers' Insurance Co. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 661, 8 Sup. Ct. 1360, 32 L. Ed. 308.

As shown in the Bennett Case, such a stipulation in a contract is unreasonable and against public policy, as it nullifies the contract of insurance in the event of the disappearance of the insured. It is further objectionable, as above indicated, as being an attempt to contract as to the effect of evidence, and to thus control the action of the court in the determination of what shall be considered sufficient evidence to prove a given fact. Its enforcement would therefore deprive a court of its ordinary functions. Deceased had the right to have his insurance paid upon the occasion of his death. If such a clause in a contract of insurance is enforceable in controlling the involved rule of evidence, it would be impossible for a beneficiary to prove the death of the insured under these circumstances, even though the fact of death would be presumed to exist under established legal principles. Such an agreement clearly impairs the vested right of the insured to have the amount of his policy paid to his beneficiary upon his death. Olson v. Modern Woodmen of America, 182 Iowa, 1018, 164 N. W. 346, L. R. A. 1918F, 1164; National Union v. Sawyer, 42 App. D. C. 479; Samberg v. Knights of Modern Macabees, 158 Mich. 568, 123 N. W. 25, 133 Am. St. Rep. 396; Supreme Lodge, K. of P., v. Wilson (Tex. Civ. App.) 204 S. W. 891.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that the doctrine announced in the Bennett Case to the effect that such a clause is void as against public policy is controlling here. We see no merit in the further contention that plaintiff is only entitled to a partial recovery. The presumption being that the insured was dead at the expiration of seven years from his disappearance would make him a member for a period approximating nine years, and it appears that during this time plaintiff paid and defendant accepted all dues and assessments which became payable by reason of the benefit certificate. Plaintiff was therefore entitled to the maximum value of the policy.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 18, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 17, 1922.)

1. Ejectment ☞111(6)—Finding held sufficient as disposing of claim that court failed to rule on an allegation of ouster.

In ejectment the claim of plaintiff that the court failed to make any finding upon his allegation that defendant entered and ousted him from his premises and has ever since unlawfully withheld possession was disposed of by the court's finding that defendant was not nor at any time had been in the possession of any real property belonging to plaintiff.

2. Ejectment ☞111(3)—Where complaint described land by government survey, court's failure to locate land by metes and bounds not error.

Where in ejectment plaintiff's complaint described the lands according to government survey, he could not complain where court failed to define or locate the land in its findings with reference to physical monuments.

3. Appeal and error ☞1071(1)—Findings of ownership of land and object of action not raised by pleadings not prejudicial.

In an action in ejectment, where the answer contained no allegation of ownership of land, held, that plaintiff was not prejudiced by findings that defendant was owner of the land, and that the only controversy involved was the determination of the ownership of a certain strip of land.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

See, also, 199 Pac. 857.

C. E. Burch, of San Diego, E. J. Henning, of Washington, D. C., and W. H. Wylie, of San Diego, for appellant.

Heskett & Sample, of San Diego, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This action is one in ejectment. By finding No. 1 the court found the plaintiff to be the owner of the property claimed by him and described in his complaint. It is to be noted that this description is only a legal one and does not locate the property of the plaintiff by metes and bounds or any physical objects upon the ground. It is as follows:

"The southeast quarter (S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$) of the southwest quarter (S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$); of the southwest quarter (S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$); also the north half (N. $\frac{1}{2}$) of the southwest quarter (S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$) of the southwest quarter (S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$); also the northwest quarter (N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$) of the southwest quarter (S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$); also west half (W. $\frac{1}{2}$) of the southwest quarter (S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$) of the northwest quarter (N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$); also the south half (S. $\frac{1}{2}$) of the southwest quarter (S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$) of the northwest quarter (N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$) of the northwest quarter (N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$) of section twenty-two (22), township fifteen (15) south, range four (4) east of the San Bernardino meridian, San Diego County, California."

In finding No. 4 the court further found:

"And the court finds that the defendant herein is not now, and has not been at any time, in the possession of any of the real property owned by the plaintiff, or of which plaintiff is entitled to possession, and that as a consequence thereof the plaintiff has sustained no injury or damage whatever from the defendant."

If the finding last quoted is justified by the evidence, the appellant cannot be entitled to the judgment prayed for (for restitution of the property and damages), and this finding, as all others, must be accepted as true, for the appeal is taken upon the judgment roll alone.

[1] The appellant claims that the court failed to make any finding upon the issue presented by the following allegation of the complaint:

"The defendant entered into and upon said premises and ousted the plaintiff therefrom. That the defendant has ever since unlawfully withheld from the plaintiff the possession thereof to plaintiff's damage," etc.

We think it clear that the part of finding No. 4 above quoted disposes of this issue and against the contention of appellant.

[2] Appellant further criticizes the findings and judgment of the court because it is said that no attempt has been made to define or locate the land described in the complaint upon the ground with reference to physical monuments. In this regard the findings fully cover the issues presented by appellant's complaint. The judgment being predicated upon the findings, they properly keep within their scope in describing the appellant's property. Having made no allegation that his property is bounded by particular physical objects or lines between monuments, appellant cannot complain of a lack of a finding concerning such a matter.

[3] Lastly, appellant complains because the court found that the respondent is the owner of certain property. The answer contains no allegation to that effect. Conceding, without deciding, that such a finding is without the issues presented by the pleadings, it cannot have prejudiced plaintiff. The same is true of another finding, to which objection is made, in which the court asserts that the only controversy involved is the determination of the ownership of a certain strip of land.

Findings Nos. 1 and 4 preclude the plaintiff from recovering. They are not contradicted by the other findings. In view of them all, the judgment was properly rendered against the plaintiff and appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

MOSES v. PACIFIC BLDG. CO. (Civ. 3892.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1. California. June 5, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 842(1) — Mechanics' liens $\S$ 290(4) — Whether materials were so applied to building as to become part thereof is a question of fact for the trial court.

Whether the materials furnished by plaintiff at the request of a lessee had been so attached to the building as to become a part thereof was a question of fact for the trial court, which was determined adversely to plaintiff by finding that plaintiff's only contract was for temporary installation of materials, not to become a part of the building.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 907(3) — On appeal on judgment roll, evidence is presumed to justify findings.

Where the record on appeal consists of the judgment roll, the appellate court is bound to assume that the evidence justifies the findings.

3. Mechanics' liens $\S$ 78 — Owner, without knowledge particular work was being done, need not disclaim responsibility.

Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1192, permitting the enforcement of a mechanic's lien if the work was of a lienable character and if the owner had knowledge of the work which was ordered by the lessee, unless the owner gives notice disclaiming responsibility, does not apply where the owner consented that the lessee should install certain equipment and machinery, but did not have actual notice of the furnishing of the materials or the performance of the labor in question.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action to foreclose a lien for labor and materials by R. P. Moses, against the Pacific Building Company, a corporation, in which Nettie C. Moses, as administratrix, was substituted as plaintiff after the death of the original plaintiff. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Luce, Sloane & Lee, of San Diego, for appellant.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward, of San Diego, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This action was commenced by R. P. Moses for the foreclosure of a lien claimed by him for labor and materials furnished and used in the making of certain improvements and alterations in a building of the defendant. He appealed from the judgment entered in favor of the defendant. Pending the appeal, R. P. Moses died, and the administratrix of his estate was substituted as plaintiff and appellant.

The record on appeal consists of the judgment roll. From the findings we ascertain the following facts: The defendant, as owner of a storeroom building located on the lots described in the complaint, leased those premises to the San Diego Manufacturing Association, which afterwards became the Inorganic Products Company, a corporation. Thereafter the products company, "with the knowledge and consent of the said defendant," caused to be installed in the building "certain equipment and machinery for the manufacture of paint." On or about the 24th day of May, 1920, the San Diego Manufacturing Association entered into a contract with the plaintiff whereby the plaintiff agreed to furnish certain materials and to do and perform labor in installing in said building electric wiring, conduits, switches, and switchboards. The labor performed and materials furnished by the plaintiff were of the value of $871.90, which sum the products company agreed to pay.

The court found:

"That all of the said materials which were furnished by said plaintiff and all of the labor performed by him were furnished and performed in putting into said building certain electrical wiring, conduits, and equipment, none of which ever became a part of said building or a fixture, or constituted or formed any improvement or alteration of or in said building, or any addition thereto; but that all of the said wiring, conduits and equipment were installed by the said plaintiff in the following manner: Said conduits were fastened to the studding and rafters of said buildings by metal clamps and eightpenny wire nails, and as a part of said equipment switchboards were fastened to the studding of said building by nailing one-inch boards across said studding and fastening the switch boxes on to said boards by screws and nails; that no nails were used of a smaller size than eightpenny wire nails, and some twentypenny wire nails were used in attaching said conduits and switchboards; that said conduits ran along and upon the studding and rafters of said building, which building was an open framework building, the outside walls of which were corrugated iron, and which had no inside walls other than the studding, sills, and rafters, and that said building had originally been used by the defendant as a storehouse and a place within which to manufacture doors and windows, etc., for the houses and buildings being erected by said defendant, and that said building was leased to the San Diego Manufacturing Association, for the purpose of manufacturing paint therein, and that said lease provided that the lessee might make such alterations and improvements as might be necessary for the carrying on of their said manufacturing business; that the electric wires and conduits placed in said building by the said plaintiff were by the plaintiff connected to certain motors installed by the lessee to operate the machinery for manufacturing paint, and also connected to the lighting system of said building, plaintiff installing droplights in the office room and main portion of said buildings, but that said conduits, electric wiring, and switchboards were not so installed as to become permanently attached to said building or to become any part thereof, or to become fixtures therein; that all of the materials and equipment which the said plaintiff placed in said building were placed therein temporarily for a lessee of the said building, and that there was no understanding by said plaintiff or any lessee of said building, or the persons with whom plaintiff made the contract referred to in said complaint and for whom said plaintiff placed or installed certain electrical wiring and equipment in said building, that any of the said wiring, wires, conduits, switchboards, equipment, or other materials placed in said building by said plaintiff should become a fixture or be or become permanently attached to said building, or form a part thereof, or constitute or form any improvement or alteration in or of said building or any addition thereto, or repair thereof, or constitute or form any improvement or alteration in or of said building or any addition thereto or repair thereof, and that the said plaintiff never made any repairs in, of, or to the said building; that when plaintiff made his said contract with said manufacturing association and at all times thereafter he knew that said association did not own said real property, and it only had a lease thereof, and that its only interest therein was a leasehold, and he did said work and furnished said materials for said association with said knowledge."

The court further found:

"That said plaintiff completed furnishing the materials and performing the labor which he did furnish and perform as aforesaid, on or about the 10th day of June, 1920, and that he performed all the conditions of his contract, but that said contract was not a contract for the furnishing of any materials or the performance of any labor in or about the making of any improvements or alterations of or in, or any additions to or repairs of the building referred to in said complaint, to wit, the building standing on said lots and belonging to said defendant; and that said plaintiff never had any contract with the said San Diego Manufacturing Association or San Diego Manufacturing Company, or said San Diego Inorganic Products Company, for the furnishing of any materials or the performance of any labor in or upon any improvements or alterations or for the making of any improvements or alterations in or additions to or repairs of said building; but that the only contract which plaintiff had with any of the said concerns, associations, or companies was for the temporary installation and placing in said building, and so as not to become a fixture or a part of said building, or any improvement or alteration or repair thereof, or addition thereto, certain materials, to wit, certain electrical wiring, switchboards, and equipment."

The court further found:

"That said defendant, Pacific Building Company, on the 4th day of March, 1920, leased the front 100 feet of said land and building to the said San Diego Manufacturing Association, an unincorporated association, for the term of one year from the 4th day of February, 1920, but that on or about the time of making said lease, said defendant was informed by said lessee that it would use said building for the manufacture of paints, and would install therein certain machinery and appliances for said manufacturing purposes, but that the defendant did not have actual notice of the furnishing of the materials or the performance of the labor in placing and installing the wires, conduits, switchboards, and other equipment in said building hereinbefore found by the court to have been put therein by plaintiff, and that the said defendant did not post any notice in or about said building that it would not be liable for the installing of said electrical equipment or of the performance of said labor."

The first question of fact upon which the plaintiff's right to a lien depends is the question whether or not the work and materials furnished by the plaintiff contributed to the "construction, alteration, addition to or repair" of the building. If they did so contribute, the lienable quality of the work is established. Code Civ. Proc. § 1183. The findings affirm that none of the labor performed and materials furnished by the plaintiff and put into the building ever became a part of the said building or fixtures, or constituted or formed any improvement or alteration of or in said building, or any addition thereto, and that conduits, electric wiring, and switchboards were not so installed as to become permanently attached to said building, or to become fixtures therein. According to the finding describing the method of installation of said wiring, conduits, and equipment, the conduits were fastened to the studding and rafters of the building by metal clamps and nails, and the switchboards were fastened to the studding of the building by nailing boards across the studding and fastening the switch boxes to the boards by screws and nails. It may be that the physical facts thus described were such that these materials should be regarded as fixtures attached to and which became a part of the building if such had been the intention of the contracting parties. Pac. Sash & Door Co. v. Bumiller, 162 Cal. 664, 667, 124 Pac. 230, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 296; Cal. P. C. Co. v. Wentworth Hotel Co., 16 Cal. App. 692, 711, 712, 118 Pac. 103, 113; Blanck v. Commonwealth Amusement Corp., 19 Cal. App. 720, 725, 127 Pac. 805.

[1, 2] But the court found the facts to be that the plaintiff never made any repairs in, of, or to the building, and that the materials furnished did not become a part of any improvement or alteration in the building, or any addition thereto; also that there was no understanding by the plaintiff or the lessee that any of said materials should become permanently attached to the building. In effect, the court determined that the plaintiff never intended to attach the equipment permanently to the building, but only intended to install the same temporarily for the use of the lessee, with whom his contract was made, and that the only contract of the plaintiff with the lessee was for the temporary installation of materials, not to become a part of the building. Whether materials are so applied to a building as to become a part thereof is a question of fact "to be determined by the court upon the evidence before it." Bianchi v. Hughes, 124 Cal. 24, 56 Pac. 610. In the case at bar, since we are bound to assume that the evidence justifies the findings, we conclude that the materials installed by the plaintiff did not constitute any alteration or addition to the building, or repair thereof.

[3] The defendant owner having failed to give notice disclaiming responsibility for the work, as provided by section 1192, Code of Civil Procedure, the plaintiff would be entitled to enforce his claim of lien, if the work had been of a lienable character, and if the defendant had "knowledge of such construction, alteration or repair or work or labor." In the first finding the court said that the products company, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant, caused to be installed in the building "certain equipment and machinery for the manufacture of paint." There is no identification of this equipment and machinery with the work done by the plaintiff. On the contrary, the court, in its seventh finding, said that the defendant did not have actual notice of the furnishing of the materials or the performance of the labor in question.

Construing the finding as one intended to mean that the defendant was without knowledge of the fact that the work was being done, the provisions of section 1192 do not apply to the established circumstances of the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

On the Merits after Grant of Rehearing.

WORKS, J. Defendant Colkins executed her four certain promissory notes to one Brunken, the payment of all of the paper having been guaranteed by defendant, Daniels. Brunken transferred the notes to plaintiff, two of them by indorsement in due course, two by delivery without indorsement, and plaintiff brought the present suit against both Daniels and Colkins on all four of the instruments. Defendant Colkins interposed defense as to all of the notes on the grounds that they had been obtained by the payee by means of fraud and deceit, that they had been given without consideration, and that, if there was a consideration, it had failed. The trial court found against defendant Colkins on each of these issues and rendered judgment against both defendants on the two notes which had been transferred to plaintiff by indorsement. Judgment on the other notes, the title to which had been passed to plaintiff by delivery only, went against defendant Daniels alone. That defendant alone appeals.

[2] The opening brief of appellant is short, fragmentary, and unsatisfactory, no closing brief having been filed by him. After conceding that judgment against both defendants was proper on the two notes which were transferred by indorsement, and after stating the findings of the trial court on the issues presented by the answer of respondent Colkins, the writer of the brief proceeds:

"But, after finding against every one of defendant Colkins' special defenses, the court nevertheless rendered judgment in favor of defendant Colkins as maker of the notes and against defendant Daniels as guarantor. The court finds that defendant Colkins has no defense to the payment of the notes, and then excuses her from payment, placing the entire burden on the guarantor. The only possible judgment under the findings is one holding defendant Colkins for payment of all four notes. The present judgment is not supported by the findings, and therefore must be set aside."

This language is somewhat cryptic, but we gather from it, and from the whole tenor of the brief, that the only point made by appellant is that judgment on the two notes which respondent Kubista took without indorsement should have gone against both defendants. It is to be observed that no claim is made in the brief that Kubista was not entitled to judgment against appellant, if, at least, the maker of the notes were caught in the net with him. His position appears to be that the judgment against him is a righteous judgment, but that the trial court erred in not rendering judgment against the maker of the two unindorsed notes also. We cannot see what difference it makes to appellant whether or not the maker of the notes was included in the judgment. Undoubtedly, if the judgment had gone against both maker and guarantor the liability of the latter to pay would have been as great as it now is, for in that event he could have been required to pay the entire debt, as he is compellable to do under the judgment now standing against him. It appears to us that appellant has shown no reason why either the judgment against him or the judgment in favor of his codefendant should be disturbed.

Judgment affirmed.

CLUNIN v. FIRST FEDERAL TRUST CO.
(S. F. 9560.)(Supreme Court of California. July 10, 1922.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 3, 1922.)1. Limitation of actions — 66(12) — Where money payable on demand, statute begins at date of execution.

Where a promise to pay money is payable on demand, the statute of limitations begins to run at the date of its execution.

2. Limitation of actions — 148(3) — Notation on check stubs not communicated to creditor held not acknowledgment of debt to toll statute.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 360, providing that no acknowledgment or promise is sufficient evidence of a new contract to toll limitations unless it is in writing, signed by the party to be charged, where remittances for interest on notes were made by checks, some before and some after the notes were barred, notations on the check stubs showing purposes for which the checks were executed, never having been communicated to the creditor, did not constitute an acknowledgment or promise sufficient to toll the statute.

3. Limitation of actions — 163(4) — Part payment not an exception to rule requiring written acknowledgment of debt to toll statute.

A promise implied from the fact of part payment cannot be made an exception to the rule, under Code Civ. Proc. § 360, excluding all acknowledgments and promises not in writing.

4. Limitation of actions — 146(3) — Written acknowledgment of debt to toll statute must refer and admit existence of debt which debtor willing to pay.

No writing is sufficient as an acknowledgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 360, unless it contains some reference to a debt, which, either of itself or with the aid of evidence of extrinsic facts in explanation, permissible under section 1860, amounts to an admission that there is a debt existing to the creditor to whom the writing is sent which the debtor is liable to pay and willing to pay; hence checks covering interest on notes, but not referring to any debt nor containing language subject to explanation as referring to a debt, were not sufficient acknowledgment of the debt evidenced by the notes to toll limitations.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Mary Clunin against the First Federal Trust Company, executor of the estate of Jeremiah Lynch, deceased. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles A. Shurtleff, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Cushing & Cushing, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, C. J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment. The action was upon a promissory note for $3,000 executed by Jeremiah Lynch to the plaintiff on April 20, 1909, payable on demand.

By demurrer to the complaint, and also by way of answer, the defendant interposed the defense that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. The court found in favor of the defendant on this defense, and rendered judgment accordingly.

[1] Where a promise to pay money is payable on demand the statute of limitations begins to run thereon at the date of its execution. O'Neil v. Magner, 81 Cal. 631, 22 Pac. 876, 15 Am. St. Rep. 88; Jones v. Nicholl, 82 Cal. 32, 22 Pac. 878. The period of limitation is four years (Code Civ. Proc. § 337), and consequently, unless the time is extended in some manner, an action on the note became barred after April 20, 1913. This action was not begun until May 31, 1918.

[2] Section 360 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that—

"No acknowledgment or promise is sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, by which to take the case out of the operation of this title, unless the same is contained in some writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby."

On behalf of the plaintiff it is claimed that the case is taken out of the operation of the statute of limitations by certain writings executed by Jeremiah Lynch and proven at the trial. These writings consist of checks signed by Jeremiah Lynch, payable to the order of plaintiff, together with the memoranda made by Lynch on the stubs to which said checks were attached at the time they were made, showing the amount of the check and the purposes for which it was executed. Some of these checks and memoranda were made prior to the expiration of the period of limitation after the date of the note, and some of them were made after the expiration of that period. As they are all of the same character, it will not be necessary to state more than one of them. The first check is as follows:

"San Francisco, 15th April, 1912.

"The Bank of California, National Association, San Francisco: Pay to the order of Mrs. M. Clunin $196, one hundred and ninety-six dollars.
Jeremiah Lynch."

The stub opposite this check was as follows:

"No. 1076
Date 15th April 1912
To Mrs. M. Clunin
Quart. Annuity to 1 Apl 150
Int. on 3000# at 6% three months 45
Sundry 1"

Similar checks, for which similar stubs were entered in the check book, were introduced in evidence bearing date as late as April 14, 1917. Consequently, if these transactions operated as an acknowledgment or promise sufficient to take the case out of the operation of the statute of limitations within the meaning of section 360, Code of Civil Procedure, the action was not barred. These checks were transmitted to the plaintiff by said Jeremiah Lynch. It does not appear that they were accompanied by any letter or other writing referring to the purpose for which the checks were executed. The stubs to which the checks were originally attached were separated from the checks before they were sent to Mrs. Clunin, and were not in any manner communicated to her by the deceased.

So far as the stubs are concerned, it is well established in this state that they do not constitute an acknowledgment or a promise sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations, since they were never communicated to the creditor, Mrs. Clunin. In Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 355, 30 Pac. 609, it being on the second appeal in that case, the court said on this subject:

"It is very certain that an actual promise can only be made to the creditor, and it follows that the acknowledgment from which the promise is to be inferred must be made to the creditor."

This proposition is thoroughly established by the authorities and we have no decision to the contrary.

It is earnestly insisted by counsel for the appellant that the execution of the checks and the sending of them to Mrs. Clunin constituted a sufficient acknowledgment or promise to toll the statute. It will be observed that the checks of themselves make no reference to the existence of any debt, and contain no promise of any sort to pay money or in discharge of a debt of any character. They all include in the amount stated a sum which the stubs show was intended to pay quarterly interest on a $3,000 debt, but that fact nowhere appears upon the check itself; none of them was for that exact sum; they all include sums for other purposes.

The law is well established in this state by numerous decisions that the acknowledgment or promise referred to in section 360 must be in writing, and that the writing, whether in the form of a promise or not, must contain some reference to an existing debt owing to the creditor, which the debtor is willing to pay. It must, of itself acknowledge the debt. The first decisions upon the subject, those in Fairbanks v. Dawson, 9 Cal. 89, and Barron v. Kennedy, 17 Cal. 574, showed some uncertainty with respect to the character of the writing by which the acknowledgment should be shown and concerning the effect of the statute then in force, which was substantially the same in language as section 360, but in later cases the law has been crystallized into a clear statement of the rule. In McCormick v. Brown, 36 Cal. 185, 95 Am. Dec. 170, where the court was considering the effect of a letter as an acknowledgment of a debt, it was said:

"The acknowledgment referred to in the statute is not such as may be deduced by inference from a promise or an offer to pay a part of the debt, or to pay the whole debt in a particular manner, or at a specified time, or upon specified conditions. The acknowledgment, say the cases, must be a direct, distinct, unqualified, and unconditional admission of the debt which the party is liable and willing to pay."

In Biddel v. Brizzolara, 56 Cal. 380, the court was considering a plea of the statute of limitations upon a promissory note secured by mortgage on real estate and the effect of an agreement executed by the maker of the note and a third person, wherein it was recited that the third person "assumes a mortgage now on said property held by Philip Biddel, principal and interest amounting to $6,090." The court said:

"The 'acknowledgment' must be a direct and unqualified admission of an existing debt which the party is willing to pay."

And in connection with the quotation it gives a passage from Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. 362, 7 L. Ed. 174, containing the following:

"Such acknowledgment ought to contain an unqualified and direct admission of a previous, subsisting debt, which the party is liable and willing to pay."

In Pierce v. Merrill, 128 Cal. 476, 61 Pac. 68, 79 Am. St. Rep. 63, the last sentence of the above quotation from McCormick v. Brown is quoted and followed. The same idea has been stated in slightly different language as follows:

"The acknowledgment must be a direct, unqualified, and unconditional admission of a debt which a party is liable and is willing to pay." Curtis v. Sacramento, 70 Cal. 414, 11 Pac. 748.

"The distinct and unqualified admission of an existing debt contained in a writing signed by the party to be charged, and without intimation of an intent to refuse payment thereof, suffices to establish the debt to which the contract relates as a continuing contract, and to interrupt the running of the statute of limitations against the same." S. P. Co. v. Prosser, 122 Cal. 415, 52 Pac. 837, 55 Pac. 145.

"The acknowledgment of a debt in contemplation of this statute must be a distinct, unqualified, unconditional recognition of an obligation for which the person making such admission is liable." Powell v. Petch, 166 Cal. 331, 136 Pac. 56.

[3] There are expressions in some of the opinions of this court which have apparently been misunderstood, and we deem it proper here to give some explanation and qualification thereof. The remarks in Barron v. Ken- nedy, 17 Cal. 574, seem to say that a part payment alone is sufficient to take the debt out of the statute, if it is not accompanied by some declaration qualifying the implied admission of the existence of the debt. In that immediate connection the necessity of a writing is not mentioned, except to say that it should be proven by a writing, but, as was explained in Heinlin v. Castro, 22 Cal. 100, the decision in the Kennedy Case was predicated upon the letters accompanying the transmission of the money and which showed that it was to be applied on a debt due to the plaintiff. This view of the case is further emphasized by the decision in Peña v. Vance, 21 Cal. 149. In that case the court was asked to reconsider the doctrine of the earlier cases, and upon this point the opinion says:

"On examination of the matter a second time, we are satisfied that the statute intended to exclude all acknowledgments and promises not in writing, and that a promise implied from the fact of part payment cannot with any propriety be made an exception."

In Concannon v. Smith, 134 Cal. 14, 66 Pac. 40, the letter held to be a sufficient acknowledgment under the statute, although it distinctly referred to an existing debt, did not describe the debt with any certainty, and it was held that the fact that there was but one debt in existence to which it could refer could be proven as an extrinsic fact to explain the uncertainty in the writing. This, of course, is expressly allowed by section 1860, Code of Civil Procedure, in any case of ambiguity in a writing.

Several decisions contain language apparently indicating that an acknowledgment made by an act or by conduct, although not in writing, may be sufficient to take the case out of the operation of the statute. The context, however, in each case shows that the act or conduct which the court was referring to was a writing which contained an acknowledgment of the debt sufficient to come within the rule stated in the foregoing decisions. Such expressions are found in Fairbanks v. Dawson, supra, Tuggle v. Minor, 76 Cal. 101, 18 Pac. 131, and in Minifie v. Rowley (Cal. Sup.) 202 Pac. on page 675.

[4] It is clear from all these decisions that no writing is sufficient as an acknowledgment under section 360, unless it contains some reference to a debt, which, either of itself or with the aid of permissible evidence of extrinsic facts in explanation, amounts to an admission that there is a debt existing to the creditor to whom the writing is sent which the debtor is liable to pay and willing to pay. The checks introduced in evidence do not come up to this standard since they contain no reference whatever to any debt, or any language which can be said to be uncertain in its meaning and subject to explanation by the aid of extrinsic circumstances so as to be made to refer to a debt.

Our conclusion is that the court below was correct in holding that the action is barred by the statute of limitations.

The judgment is affirmed.

BALL et al. v. CALIFORNIA CONSERVING CO. (S. F. 9994.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 13, 1922.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 10, 1922.)

1. Brokers — 60—Broker held not entitled to commission on sale subject to buyer's approval of goods where not given, and contract canceled by agreement.

Where the memorandum of sale negotiated by a broker expressly provided that the goods must meet with the buyer's approval, and the buyer thereafter sent to the seller a sample as to the quality of goods he demanded, which the seller refused to furnish, whereupon the contract was canceled by agreement of the parties, the broker was not entitled to his commission.

2. Brokers — 64(2)—Broker held to have contracted with reference to provision of sale contract allowing pro rata delivery.

Where the memorandum of a sale contract negotiated by a broker stated the terms were to be according to the regular California vegetable contract, and such regular contract included a term that, in case of damage to crop, or for any cause whatsoever, the seller was unable to make full delivery, the buyer would accept pro rata delivery upon all goods packed short, the broker must be held to have contracted with reference to that provision of the contract.

3. Brokers — 69—Held entitled under contract to commission only on goods delivered.

A broker who negotiated a contract for the sale of goods which provided that, in the case of inability to make full delivery for crop failure or other cause, the buyer agreed to accept pro rata delivery of the quantities specified, the broker was entitled to a commission for the sale only of the quantity of goods actually delivered where that was 22 per cent. of the quantity contracted for.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by F. M. Ball and another, as trustees of F. M. Ball & Co., a dissolved corporation, against the California Conserving Company, a corporation, to recover a broker's commission. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Goldman & Altman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

E. J. Torregano, Vincent Surr, and Goldman, Nye & Surr, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. Defendant appeals from a judgment recovered against it in an action instituted by F. M. Ball & Co., a corporation, for commissions for negotiating three sales of what is commercially known as "tomato paste." The complaint contained two counts covering each sale, one predicated upon the agreed compensation and the other upon the reasonable value of the services. The answer, by its failure to deny the same, admitted the allegations of the complaint touching the incorporation of the respective parties to the action, but denied the remaining allegations of each count. The findings were that the allegations of the complaint were true, and, based thereon and upon the conclusion of law, the trial court rendered judgment for plaintiff in the amount prayed for, with interest from the date of sales declared upon in the several counts of the complaint.

Three separate transactions were involved: The first was a sale of tomato paste to A. Russo & Co. of Chicago, upon which the court found and adjudged that plaintiff was entitled as a commission to $687.50, with interest thereon from October, 1917, the date of the alleged sale, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. The remaining two sales were sales of paste to the Natwill Company of New York, upon which the court found and adjudged that plaintiff was entitled to recover as commissions the sum of $452, with like interest respectively on $212 thereof from February 2, 1918, and on $240 thereof from March 22, 1918, the dates, respectively, of such sales. At the time the several orders were secured by plaintiff a sales memorandum was prepared in writing in each case, stating the amount and price of the goods sold. Each was accepted by the defendant. These documents were identical in form except as to the name of the purchaser, the date of the memorandum, the amount and time of shipment of goods. The price of the goods was the same in each case. These memoranda were in abbreviated form as to some of their provisions, among which was a clause reading: "Terms: reg. Cal. veg. contract." These memoranda each contained the following provision: "2½ per cent. brokerage to Ball-Lockhart." These memoranda also contained the following clause: "Subject this year's delivery meeting buyer's approval." Subsequent to the making and execution of these memoranda in abbreviated form a more amplified contract of sale was entered into during the early part of the year 1918 between the defendant, as seller, and each of the purchasers, which, though executed by the defendant and the latter, was not presented to the plaintiff for either its approval or signature. The record seems to indicate that these later documents followed generally the form of the regular California vegetable contract used by sellers and purchasers of vegetable products. In each of these amplified contracts there was this provision:

"Quality of tomato paste to be superior to last year's crop sold to us by Pacific Vinegar and Pickle Works."

There was also, under the subhead of "terms and conditions," the further provision reading as follows:

"In case of damage to crop, or for any cause or causes whatsoever, the seller is unable to make full delivery of any of the varieties of goods named, the buyer agrees to accept pro rata delivery upon all goods packed short."

These later contracts contained no reference to the broker or its commission, and, as we have seen, were not presented to it, or signed by it. (The Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works above referred to was the predecessor of the defendant.)

[1] Directing our attention first to the sale to Russo & Co., it appears that on March 29, 1918, after the execution of the amplified contract with it, Russo & Co. wrote the defendant as follows:

"Under separate mail we are sending you a sample of six cans of California tomato paste. The tomato paste received from you last year does not come up to this high grade standard. We wish to state that we must have quality same as sample which we have sent you."

To this letter the defendant, on April 3, 1918, replied:

"The article which we supplied to the trade last year gave universal satisfaction, and it will be made in the same way and of the same standard and grade this year. We take it from your letter that this being the case you will want to cancel your contract with us. If our understanding is correct we then ask you to definitely advise us one way or the other by return mail please."

Russo & Co., on the 8th of the same month, answered:

"If acceptable to you we cancel our contract #94 covering 1,800 cases 200/6 oz. tins of tomato paste. You will, therefore, acknowledge receipt of our cancellation by return mail."

Russo & Co., not content to transmit a reply to this letter through the usual course of mail, on April 16, 1918, wired defendant:

"Please wire at our expense cancellation of our contract"

—to which request defendant replied by wire:

"We accept your cancellation of tomato paste contract."

Appellant herein contends that, as to the Russo & Co. sale, the goods offered by the seller did not meet with the buyer's approval, and hence that, the condition in the contract of sale in that respect not having been fulfilled, and the contract for that reason having been canceled, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover any commissions upon such sale.

We see no answer to this contention. The memorandum of sale upon which the plaintiff relies for a recovery contains the express provision that the goods must meet the buyer's approval. This provision renders it an executory contract of sale upon a condition subsequent, without the fulfillment of which there could have been no completed sale under said contract. The right of the broker to recover commissions must be held to have depended upon a completed sale; and, this not having been consummated, it follows that the right of the plaintiff to recover his commissions under the contract with Russo & Co. must fail.

[2] As to the right of the plaintiff to recover its commissions upon the sales of the Natwill Company, another question is presented. The memorandum of sale in each of said contracts, as we have seen, contains the abbreviated clause reading as follows: "Terms: reg. Cal. veg. contract." This abbreviated clause is conceded, when amplified, to mean: "Terms: Regular California vegetable contract," and this clause thus amplified, when contained in the preliminary agreement between the seller and the buyer, upon which the plaintiff relies for its right to its commissions, must be interpreted as meaning that the parties to said preliminary agreement were contracting with reference to and under the provision of the usual amplified contract for vegetable products in general use among the sellers and buyers of such products at the time, and hence it will be assumed that, when the buyer and seller executed the enlarged contract a few weeks later, such enlarged contract was the regular California vegetable contract which was in the contemplation of all of the parties to the preliminary memorandum of agreement upon which the plaintiff herein relies for the recovery of its commissions. If this assumption is correct, it would necessarily follow that the provisions of the later and enlarged contract are to be read into the preliminary agreement between the parties; and, this being so, it must be held, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that the plaintiff at the time of the execution of the said contract was aware of the conditions embraced in the regular California vegetable contract, and hence was aware of the fact that such enlarged contract contained the provision that—

Being thus aware of this condition in the enlarged contract the plaintiff must be held to have itself contracted with reference to it, and hence to have agreed that the amount of its commissions should depend upon the amount of the deliveries of the seller's product, which, as shown by the undisputed evidence herein, was but 22.2 per cent. of the amount of goods provided for in the preliminary contract between the parties.

[3] The foregoing conditions as to the amount of goods to be delivered and accepted, upon which the plaintiff's percentage of commissions was to be computed, appearing upon the face of these contracts, it was necessary for the plaintiff to show that there had been a full delivery of all of the goods provided for in the memorandum of agreement upon which it relies before it would be entitled to the full commissions which it claims. Not having shown this, but, on the contrary, the undisputed evidence being that the seller's pack and delivery was but 22.2 per cent. of the anticipated amount provided for in the preliminary memorandum, it follows that the plaintiff's commissions must be computed upon the actual amount of goods delivered under said contracts.

It follows from the foregoing that, as to the Russo & Co. contract, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover any commissions, and that, as to the two contracts with the Natwill Company, the amount of commissions recoverable by the plaintiff must be computed upon the basis of the actual deliveries made under said contracts, and that the trial court was in error in awarding the plaintiff judgment for commissions in an amount in excess of that indicated by the views above set forth.

In re ROSS' ESTATE. (S. F. 9573.)

Appeal and error ⇐1218—Remittitur not recalled later than 30 days after judgment, in absence of fraud or mistake.

In the absence of fraud, and where the Supreme Court renders its judgment advisedly on the case as presented by the parties, it cannot, after expiration of the 30 days allowed by the Constitution, after which the judgment is final, recall the remittitur to reconsider the facts and reasons on which the judgment was given.

In Bank.

On motion to recall remittitur. Denied. For former opinion, see 202 Pac. 641.

George D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellants.

Thomas G. Crothers, Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and I. M. Golden, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, C. J. The respondents move to recall the remittitur, on the ground that it "does not conform to the final judgment of the court, upon the ground that the judgment appealed from was in all substantial particulars affirmed."

The appeal was taken from a decree of partial distribution of the estate of Catherine Ross, deceased. That decree was that the property distributed was a part of the community property of John Ross, deceased, and the deceased, Catherine Ross, during their marriage, that, upon his death, it was distributed to her and that, upon her death, thereafter one-half of such community property descended to the relatives of John Ross, deceased, and the other half to the children of Elizabeth H. Donohue as the next of kin of Catherine Ross. Catherine Ross had two sisters, who died prior to her death, namely, Elizabeth H. Donohue and Bridget H. Quinn, both of whom left descendants who are now living. The decree gave no part of the property to the descendants of Bridget H. Quinn, and some of them appealed therefrom. It was upon the decision of this appeal that the remittitur was issued. The decision of this court was that, as descendants of Bridget H. Quinn, the appellants were entitled to a share in the one-half of the community property included in the distribution to the Donohue children. To that extent the decree was reversed. The briefs show that the heirs of John Ross and the children of Mrs. Donohue filed a joint brief in opposition to the claims of the appellants. Nothing was said to the effect that the John Ross heirs had no interest in the controversy between the descendants of the two sisters of Catherine Ross over the one-half of her property, nor with respect to the John Ross heirs being exempt from costs of appeal. This court, upon this condition of the matter, made a general order reversing the case in favor of the appellants. As the respondents made common cause against the appellants the court saw no reason for making a distinction between them on the matter of costs. The error, if any, was due to the oversight of the parties and not that of the court or of the clerk.

In the absence of fraud, and where this court renders its judgment advisedly upon the case as presented by the parties, this court has no power after the expiration of the 30 days allowed by the Constitution and after which our judgment is final, to recall the remittitur for the purpose of reconsidering the facts and reasons upon which the judgment was given. Oakland v. Pacific, etc., Co., 172 Cal. 332-337, 156 Pac. 468, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 259; Estate of Levinson, 108 Cal. 459, 41 Pac. 483; 42 Pac. 479; Granger v. Sheriff, 140 Cal. 195, 73 Pac. 816; *Herrlich v. This judgment was given on December 2, 1921, and became final on January 1, 1922. In that interval, if the heirs of John Ross had applied therefor, the court might have altered its judgment as to costs. This motion was instituted on March 1, 1922. It was then too late for the court to aid in the matter, even if it were so disposed. The motion is denied.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 5, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐671(3)—Where appeal is on judgment roll alone, only sufficiency of findings to support the judgment will be considered.

Where an appeal is taken on the judgment roll alone, only sufficiency of the findings to support the judgment will be considered.

2. Principal and surety ⇐99—Surety for rent for certain months not released by acceptance of amount less than rent for previous months.

Where defendant was surety for the payment of rent for certain months, the fact that a landlord's agent accepted a less amount than that specified for certain months previous to those for whose rent defendant was a surety did not amount to an alteration of the principal obligation, so as to release defendant, in pursuance of Civ. Code, § 2819, nor did it operate as a release on the ground that the landlord thereby waived certain remedies in unlawful detainer to which he might have resorted.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by P. P. Callaghan against George L. Olsen and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant A. Davidson appeals. Affirmed.

Herbert Choynski and James Raleigh Kelly, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Stanislaus A. Riley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PREWETT, Justice pro tem. Action on a guaranty. The respondent leased to defendant Olsen certain real property for a period of 12 months at an agreed monthly rental of $400. At the same time, and as a part of the same transaction, the appellant executed to the respondent a certain written guaranty, wherein he did—

"covenant, promise and agree to and with the party of the second part (the respondent) that the said George L. Olsen shall well and truly pay the rents reserved for the last three months, to wit, for the three months commencing December 1, 1915, and ending February 29, 1916, to perform and execute all covenants therein contained on his part and that in his failure to do so in any particular we will forthwith pay * * * the said rents that may be or become due under said lease for the last three months thereof, to wit, for the months commencing December 1, 1915, and ending February 29, 1916, and all damages that may happen or accrue by reason of such failure not exceeding the aggregate sum of $1,200."

[1] The defendant Olsen failed to pay the rent for the last three months of the term, and the respondent thereupon brought this action against both parties to recover the same. The trial court rendered judgment as prayed for, and the appellant appeals upon the judgment roll alone. This eliminates all points save the sufficiency of the findings to support the judgment.

The appellant directs our attention to the following finding made by the trial court:

"That for several months during the tenancy of said defendant Olsen, said defendant paid to the agent of the plaintiff and the said agent received and accepted in payment of the rent for said months a sum less than the stipulated rate of rental under said lease; that none of said months is embraced within the period from December 1, 1915, to and including February 29, 1916 (being the period for which the rental herein sued for accrued and became due). That there is no evidence showing that the plaintiff had actual knowledge of the payment and acceptance of said reduced sums. That there was no written agreement between defendant Olsen and plaintiff either in person or by agent for any reduction of said rent or for the modification of any term of said lease; that there was not at any time any written authorization from plaintiff to reduce said rent or to modify any term of said lease."

[2] It is insisted that the acceptance by the respondent of a smaller sum than the agreed rate of rental was an alteration of the principal obligation in a material respect, and that the effect thereof was to release the guarantor. No fault can be found with the soundness of the rule upon which this contention is based (Civ. Code, § 2819), but it has no application to the present case. The appellant does not question the rule that future rentals are not reduced by the acceptance of less than the stipulated sums for a portion of the leased term. In fact, the question is scarcely open for discussion, in view of the many California authorities bearing upon it. In Sinnige v. Oswald, 170 Cal. 55, 148 Pac. 203, for a period of nine months the landlord accepted less sums than the stipulated rental, and receipted in full for the said months. The surety in that case, as here, raised the point that these payments of less sums and their acceptance by the landlord operated, by changing the terms of the lease, to release the surety. The Supreme Court, in commenting upon this claim, uses the following language.

"They are not sufficient to establish a change in the written contract so as to affect the amount of future installments of rent where no such change of terms has been made in writing."

From James Eva Estate v. Mecca Co., 40 Cal. App. 515, 181 Pac. 415, we quote:

"The final contention of appellant is that the guarantor was discharged from liability for the reason that the principal obligation of the lessee was changed and altered in a material respect without the consent of the guarantor. The change in the principal obligation relied upon is the fact that the lessor made a rebate, for certain months, from the amount of rent specified in the lease," etc.

To this claim the court replied, in effect, that concessions of the kind in question are not sufficient to establish a change in the written contract so as to affect the amount of future installments of rent. From a number of cases affirming the same doctrine, we will notice but one other. In Dodge v. Chapman, 42 Cal. App. 614, 183 Pac. 966, the court gives a very extended and valuable analysis of the point. In one place it says:

"The agreement, then, to receive for a limited time a reduced monthly rental was not in writing, and was supported by no consideration. As an agreement in modification of the lease, it therefore was without * * * effect. * * * Conceding that the obligation to pay the stipulated monthly rental was satisfied by these payments, yet the contract was not altered any more than it would have been if the full amount had been paid. It was no concern of the sureties how these payments were made. The landlord could have taken his pay in 'chips and whetstones' if he saw fit."

While the appellant could scarcely question, and perhaps does not question, the force of these authorities, he insists that an agreement by a surety to pay the last installments of a term is affected by the acceptance of less than the stipulated sums. He argues that the landlord thereby waives certain remedies in unlawful detainer to which he might have resorted. But, at most, he no more waives them than he does when he accepts payment at the full stipulated figure. In either case the transaction as to the past month is closed, and with it every remedy to which he might have resorted. Indeed, it is difficult to discover how the landlord waived anything save the concession which he made in accepting a less sum than the agreed amount. We have seen that such a concession does not operate to release either the principal or surety.

The only remaining point urged by appellant is the alleged failure of the court to find whether or not there was an agreement between respondent and defendant Olsen for a modification of the terms of the lease. Counsel, however, have overlooked finding 21, wherein the court expressly finds that no such alteration was ever made.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

1. Contracts — 354—Finding against plaintiff in language of complaint is sufficient.

Where the complaint was on the common counts, and alleged defendants were indebted to plaintiff for services rendered to defendants by plaintiff's assignor, for which services defendants promised in writing to pay, a finding of the trial court in the exact language that those allegations of the complaint were not true is sufficient to support a judgment for defendants.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

2. Contracts — 332(2)—Complaint on common counts held to state cause of action on written contract.

A complaint alleging that defendants were indebted to plaintiff in a stated sum for services rendered to defendants by plaintiff's assignor, for which defendants promised in writing to pay, though in the form of a common count for services rendered, in effect stated a cause of action on the written contract.

3. Brokers — 40—Authority to sell lease held not to give commission for sale of subsequent renewal.

Exclusive authority to brokers to sell a lease does not give them authority to sell a renewal of the lease thereafter obtained by their principal, so that they are not entitled to their commission after the renewal lease was sold to one who had refused to purchase through them the original lease, because it would expire too soon, even though the owner had not taken the steps necessary to terminate the exclusive agency.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by W. A. Maynes against J. B. Galliano to recover for services rendered. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dunn, White & Aiken, of Oakland, for appellant.

Snook & Brown, of Oakland (George M. Naus, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant in an action upon a common count for services rendered. The complaint alleged:

"That the defendants above named are indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of one thousand ($1,000.00) dollars for services rendered to the defendants by Lubeck's Investment Company, a corporation, within two years last past, for which services the said defendants promised in writing to pay the said Lubeck's Investment Company the said sum of one thousand dollars."

The trial court found, in the exact language quoted, that these allegations of the complaint were not true. The facts appearing at the trial were that defendant and plaintiff's assignor entered into a written contract, whereby the assignor was given the exclusive right to sell certain property belonging to the defendant for the period of one day, or until written notice of revocation was received. By the terms of the contract the defendant agreed to pay plaintiff's assignor all over the sum of $4,500 for which the property was sold, but, in any event, a minimum compensation of $500, if—

"before the termination of this agreement a deposit or notice of sale or of intended sale, or agreement, or bill of sale, lease, conveyance, or mortgage, is made of or on said property, or any part thereof, or if the whole or any part of the consideration is paid, or is deposited in escrow, or if, at any time before or after such termination, a sale or transfer of said property or any part thereof is made to any one to whose attention same was brought by said agent during the life of this contract, or if such a person accepts a position with me or enters my employ in respect to the above property or any part thereof, or if any such person to whose attention same was brought as aforesaid by said agent, in any manner or mode, secures any interest in or lien or claim upon, or takes possession of, the said property or any part thereof, directly or indirectly, or by virtue of one or more transfers within two months after the termination of this contract. Notice of withdrawal must be given by registered mail or by writing receipted for by said agent."

The contract was dated July 15, 1919. It appears that in December of that year the purchaser read an advertisement for the sale of the property published by the plaintiff's assignor, and in response thereto called upon the local agent of plaintiff's assignor and made inquiries regarding the sale of the property. It appears that this agent gave to the purchaser some information which he had regarding this property and similar properties which he had listed for sale. The purchaser informed the agent that he was not interested in this property, because the term of the lease was too short and he was not satisfied with the location. Defendant had no knowledge that even such an inquiry had been made until the middle of May, 1920, when the property had been sold through the efforts of another broker. It appears that when the contract was made the defendant's lease ran only until July, 1920; that on December 24, 1919, he obtained a new lease for a term of five years, beginning July 1, 1920. It does not appear that plaintiff's assignor had knowledge of the new lease, but, in any event, he made no effort to interest the subsequent purchaser in the property after this condition was changed. It is in the testimony that plaintiff's assignor took some "prospects" to view the property, but did not take the one who subsequently purchased it. On March 10, 1920, the defendant informed the agent that his property was off the market, and requested the agent not to come around any more, because the property was not for sale. Defendant testified that in reply to this the agent said: "All right; * * * we won't come again." Nothing further was heard from plaintiff's assignor regarding the property or the contract. Defendant, assuming from the statement of the agent that the contract was abandoned, again offered it for sale through another agent, by whom the sale was made on May 18th of that year. Plaintiff attacks the judgment upon the grounds that the exclusive right to sell conferred upon his assignor could not by the terms of the contract be terminated, except upon 10 days' notice in writing, and no such notice was given, and insists that, because the contract was not terminated in the manner provided therein, plaintiff was entitled to judgment.

[1] The finding of the trial court in the terms of the complaint is sufficient to support the judgment. Appellant having elected to sue upon a common count, and not upon the contract, it was essential, of course, to prove rendition of the services and a promise to pay for them. In finding that the respondent is not indebted to appellant in any sum for services rendered, the trial court must be presumed to have found that no services were rendered. If this is so, the appellant, of course, is not entitled to judgment. In reaching this conclusion, the trial court had before it the testimony relating to the advertising of the property for sale in December, 1919, the inquiries made by the purchaser at that time and his refusal to further consider the property, and the fact that after a new lease had been obtained, and the property was presented to him through an independent source, he for the first time became interested. In reaching the conclusion that no services were rendered, the court no doubt found that the advertising in the newspaper had no connection with the subsequent sale. The contract was manifestly drawn with great cunning, to enable the agent to insist upon payment without turning a hand for the benefit of the owner. We are not prepared to say what should have been the result if the suit had been on the contract. But in this action on a common count for services rendered we cannot say that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the trial court. Judgment affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [2] The petition for a rehearing of this cause in the Supreme Court is denied. We are of the opinion that the fact that the complaint was in the form of a common count for services rendered, instead of a special declaration on the contract introduced in evidence, is immaterial to the decision, and we do not approve the opinion of the District Court of Appeal so far as it leaves that question open. The only support of the common count was the contract introduced in evidence, and in effect the complaint stated a cause of action on that contract.

[3] We regard the essential fact upon which the judgment should be affirmed to be that the contract of agency to sell the interest of the defendant in the property related exclusively to a lease which expired on July 1, 1920. The purchaser from the defendant positively refused to buy that lease, and the efforts of the plaintiff did not bring about a sale thereof. Consequently the plaintiff's services produced no benefit to the defendant. The purchaser refused to negotiate until after defendant had procured an additional lease beginning July 1, 1920, and running five years, and it was the procurement of that lease which induced the sale and not the efforts of the plaintiff.

BURKS v. BRONSON et al. (Civ. 3865.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 16, 1922.)

1. Judgment ⇨203—Court cannot render another judgment after rendering judgment of nonsuit.

Where the court in an action for specific performance rendered a judgment of nonsuit, such judgment was final, and the court had no jurisdiction to later render a judgment dismissing the complaint.

2. Appeal and error ⇨882(2)—Rule that party cannot assign as error a ruling which he requested does not apply where trial court lacked jurisdiction.

The rule that a party cannot assign as error a ruling which he invited the trial court to make does not apply where the trial court lacked jurisdiction to make the ruling.

3. Appeal and error ⇨790(3)—Appeal will be dismissed where controverted question has been determined by another order in same action.

An appeal will be dismissed where the question in controversy has been determined by another order in the same action or by another action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by Dana Burks against L. B. Bronson and another. From a judgment dismissing the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Claud B. Andrews, of Los Angeles, and Charles D. Swanner, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

Clyde Bishop, of Santa Ana, and Goodwin & Morgrage, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. This action is one for specific performance of a contract for the sale of a lot. The defendants and respondents ask that the appeal be dismissed and base their contention in this regard upon the following facts:

Upon the date of the trial, to wit, February 23, 1921, and when the plaintiff had closed his case, a motion for a nonsuit was made by the defendants, was ordered granted by the court; on the same day this order was entered on the minutes and noted in the register of actions by the clerk. From this judgment no appeal has been taken. On March 22, 1921, the trial court entered a second judgment, this being one to dismiss the action. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed, and it is this appeal which we are now asked to dismiss.

[1] The judgment of nonsuit was a final judgment. Clark v. Superior Court, 37 Cal. App. 732, 174 Pac. 681. This being so, the court was without jurisdiction to make any other judgment. Darlington v. Butler, 3 Cal. App. 448, 86 Pac. 194.

[2] From the dilemma of this situation the appellants seek to be relieved by invoking the rule that a party cannot successfully assign as error a ruling which he has himself invited the trial court to make. Several decisions are cited in support of this proposition. In none of the cases referred to was the error committed of such a character as to render the action of the court void because of want of jurisdiction. Lack of jurisdiction is not waived under the rule relied upon by appellant. 4 Corpus Juris, 586.

[3] It will be observed, further, that in the instant case a second reason exists for dismissal of the appeal aside from the fact that the judgment of dismissal is void. Suppose we were to hold that since respondent invited the trial court to commit the error of entering a second judgment he should not be heard to assert its invalidity. It yet remains a fact, as shown by the record on appeal, that a judgment of nonsuit was regularly entered. A reversal of the judgment of dismissal would not affect the force or finality of the judgment of nonsuit. It would therefore be a useless thing for this court to pass upon the merit of the appeal or to order a reversal of the judgment of dismissal. The questions presented would be entirely moot. Under such circumstances the appeal should be dismissed. Mendocino County v. Peters, 2 Cal. App. 34, 82 Pac. 1124. It is a settled principle that an appeal will be dismissed where the question in controversy has been determined either by another action or by another order in the same action. Amorisia v. Rando (Sup.) 88 N. Y. Supp. 356.

The appeal is dismissed.

HARBOUGH v. ENLARGED BAXTER CREEK IRR. DIST. (Civ. 2364.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 16, 1922.)

Waters and water courses ⇨225—In suit to restrain inclusion of land, complaint which failed to allege under what law irrigation district was organized held insufficient.

A complaint, in an action to restrain an irrigation district from including plaintiff's land in an enlargement thereof, which failed to allege under what law the irrigation district was organized, whether plaintiff's land was a part of the original district or subsequently included therein in the enlargement thereof, whether the enlargement was affected by the reorganization of the district or by a change of its boundaries, and whether plaintiff's objection to the inclusion of his land was made in the manner prescribed by law or whether he was granted a hearing and his objection overruled contrary to the facts proved at the hearing, was insufficient to authorize a temporary injunction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Application for injunction by P. E. Harbough against the Enlarged Baxter Creek Irrigation District. From an order denying an application for temporary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. A. Kelley, of Susanville, for appellant.
Pardee, Hardy & Pardee, of Susanville, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff applied to the trial court for a temporary injunction, basing his application on the complaint alone. This appeal is from the order denying the application. The allegations of the complaint are as follows:

"That said defendants are a corporation duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California.

"That for several years last past plaintiff has been and now is the owner of the following described lands, situate, lying and being in said county and state, and more particularly described as follows, to wit: S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, section 13, township 29 north of range 13 east M. D. B. and M.

"That said defendants have enlarged or are attempting to enlarge said irrigation district and have incorporated and embraced all of said lands of plaintiff therein, but that plaintiff objected to any and all of his said lands being incorporated or included in said district and now objects to any or all of his said lands being included in said district upon the following grounds and reasons: That all of his lands are so situated and lie in such a shape that he would not receive any benefits in irrigation or otherwise from the proposed enlargement of said irrigation district; that plaintiff has never voted at any election for said proposed bonds and has from the commencement objected to his lands or any part thereof being included or incorporated into said irrigation district, but the defendants, disregarding his objections and requests, have included all of plaintiff's lands within said district.

"That said defendants have voted bonds covering all of said lands of plaintiff, and, unless enjoined and restrained, will sell all of said bonds covering all of the lands of plaintiff and thereby cast a cloud upon plaintiff's title to all of his said lands and will cause a multiplicity of lawsuits to divest and clear the title to said lands and thereby will cause irreparable injury to plaintiff by reason of the sale of such bonded indebtedness."

It seems clear that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to authorize an injunction. Without attempting to point out all the defects of the complaint, it may be said that it does not appear under what law the district was organized, whether the plaintiff's land was a part of the original district or subsequently included therein in the alleged enlargement thereof, whether the enlargement was effected by a reorganization of the district or by a change of its boundaries, whether plaintiff's objection to the inclusion of his land was made in the manner provided by law, or whether he was granted a hearing and his objection overruled contrary to the facts proved at the hearing. The granting of a temporary injunction is usually within the sound discretion of the court, and it certainly cannot be said in this case that the trial court abused its discretion.

The court sustained defendant's demurrer to the complaint and granted plaintiff 15 days within which to amend. Plaintiff attempted to appeal from the order sustaining the demurrer. Since the order is not appealable, the appeal therefrom is dismissed.

The order denying the application for a temporary injunction is affirmed.

JENSEN v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(Civ. 4171.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 18, 1922.)

Master and servant §367—Brick mason held contractor's "employee" within Compensation Act, and not independent contractor.

A brick mason, employed by a building contractor furnishing all the materials to build fireplaces of a specified size, who furnished his own tools and engaged the men working with him and charged only union scale of wages and the usual foreman's fee, held an "employee" within the Workmen's Compensation Act, and not an independent contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé.]

Application of Antone Jensen against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California and another for certiorari to review an order awarding compensation for injuries under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831). Award affirmed.

Ralph C. McComish and Fry & Jenkins, all of San Jose, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

C. W. Davison, of San Jose, for respondent Scott.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes before us upon a writ of review. We are asked to annul an award of the Industrial Accident Commission granting to G. E. Scott, the applicant before said Commission, $2,666.24 for injury to his eye, sustained while he was plastering a chimney, together with an allowance for medical expenses, etc.

The only question before us is as to the status of Scott and the relation between him and petitioner with respect to the work out of which the injury grew. The Industrial Accident Commission has concluded that Scott was an employee of Jensen, our petitioner. Petitioner, however, contends that Scott was either an independent contractor, or an employee of Dr. Tooker, the owner of the house in Los Gatos upon which the work was being done. Dr. Tooker was before the Industrial Accident Commission, contending that Scott was an employee of Jensen and that no liability of any kind arose on the part of said Tooker. This view was accepted by the Commission, which held Dr. Tooker free from liability and awarded Scott compensation as an employee of Jensen.

The record shows that Dr. Tooker requested Jensen to furnish him with an estimate of the cost of the alterations and repairs which he desired to have made to his home; that Jensen submitted an estimate of the cost, which was apparently satisfactory to Dr. Tooker, and thereupon Dr. Tooker directed Jensen to proceed with the work upon the basis that Dr. Tooker would pay Jensen the cost of labor and material, plus 10 per cent. Dr. Tooker testified that he had no direct relation to Scott and had nothing whatever to do with his employment, or the direction of his work. This testimony is corroborated by Scott.

Jensen was a contractor and builder. He testified that, in the course of the work, it became necessary to build two fireplaces and chimneys. Jensen, not being a brick mason, employed Scott to do this work. He had no specific agreement as to the terms of payment for this bricklaying work, but he furnished Scott with all materials for the work. Mr. Jensen testified:

"I just gave him the size of the fireplaces, what was needed, and then he built the chimneys accordingly. I know I left that entirely to Mr. Scott. I knew he knew what was to be done. I gave him the size of the fireplaces that I wanted, and he built the chimneys accordingly."

Mr. Scott furnished his own personal tools, as he stated was the custom with all bricklayers, and Mr. Jensen furnished all materials, the mixing block, and "hod to take the stuff in." Jensen had requested Scott to engage the men necessary to do this work, and accordingly Scott did so and acted as superintendent of the operations on the brickwork, as well as working manually himself. He stated that it was customary for a foreman to collect from the contractor the wages of his men and to pay the men directly. Accordingly, Scott charged Jensen for his services and the services of the men working with him as follows: $12 a day for Scott as foreman; $11 a day for one journeyman bricklayer; $8.50 a day for two helpers; and $1 a day per man paid to another person for transporting all of the men to and from San Jose each day.

Scott charged no percentage and received no other compensation for his work than the union scale of wages, which was $11 a day, plus the usual charge of $1 a day for the duties performed by him as foreman. He stated that in the absence of an express agreement between himself and Jensen as to compensation, he assumed that the wages would be the union scale of wages. This was also what was in the mind of Mr. Jensen, evidently, because he made no objection to Scott's charges based upon said union scale of wages for himself and the men working with him.

While Scott was engaged in plastering a flue, mortar splashed in his eye, burning it badly and causing a permanent injury, according to the medical testimony before the Commission.

Scott stated that he sometimes did work by the "job" and sometimes by the day. While it is true that in this instance he engaged the men who were working with him, he was told to do so by Mr. Jensen.

We think, under these facts, the finding of the Industrial Accident Commission that Scott was an employee of Jensen and not an independent contractor at the time of his injury is sustained by the evidence.

Petitioner directs our attention to the evidence in the record that Scott was not a member of the brick mason's union and that the rules of the said union prohibited union men from working with a nonunion journeyman bricklayer; that under the rules of said union its members could only work with Scott if Scott was acting as a contractor. The men who worked with Scott were union men and understood these rules. However, all the witnesses stated that these rules were often violated, and their existence and observance were not matters binding upon the Industrial Accident Commission in reaching its conclusions. The testimony regarding these matters was doubtless given due weight, but was found not to offset the other matters in the record which support the finding of the Commission regarding the status of Scott.

The award of the Industrial Accident Commission is affirmed.

LEWIS v. McNEAL. (Civ. 3893.)

(District Court of Appeal. Second District, Division 1, California. June 1, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 31, 1922.)

1. Payment $\Leftrightarrow$ 65(6)—Defendant who admits original indebtedness required to prove payment.

In an action for services, defendant, having admitted the original indebtedness, had the burden of proving payment thereof, except in so far as admitted by the complaint.

2. Evidence $\Leftrightarrow$ 354(17)—Creditor's books not admissible to show that payments had not been made.

In an action involving an issue as to whether certain payments had been made, books kept by the creditor held not admissible to show that payments had not been made, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1946, providing for admission of writings as "prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein" in certain cases.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Margaret I. Lewis, special administratrix of the estate of George E. Lewis, deceased, against Mabel McNeal. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Minor Moore, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James H. Pope and A. G. Ritter, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In this case plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of George E. Lewis, her deceased husband, sued for the recovery of a balance alleged to be due his estate upon a contract made by defendant with deceased whereby he was employed to furnish labor and materials in the construction of a house of the admitted cost of $8,394.50, upon which, as alleged in the complaint defendant paid $5,587.86, leaving a balance unpaid of $2,806.64. It was also alleged that defendant was indebted to plaintiff in said sum upon a mutual, open and current book account. By her answer defendant admitted her employment of deceased, and that he furnished material and labor and made expenditures in the construction of said house in the sum of $8,394.50, all as stated in the complaint, but alleged that she had paid all of said sum due under the employment, save and except the sum of $284.44, which was the balance due to plaintiff, and likewise denied any indebtedness in excess of $284.44 upon the alleged open, mutual, and current book account. The court found the allegations of the complaint to be true, and that plaintiff was entitled to judgment as prayed for, from which judgment so entered defendant has appealed.

While defendant attacks the findings for want of sufficient support, her chief contention is that the court erred in the admission of evidence.

[1] Having admitted the original indebtedness of $8,394.50, the burden of proving payment thereon of other than the sum of $5,587.86, admitted in the complaint to have been made, devolved upon defendant. In her own behalf she testified that on September 15th she paid the sum of $2,000 to George E. Lewis on account of said indebtedness, which payment was in cash from money which she had, some six weeks prior thereto, taken from her safe deposit vault and kept in her house until the time of making said payment; that it was paid to him in front of the Hollywood Bank, at which place she met Lewis, and upon receiving it she gave to him a typewritten statement, dated July 29th, showing the condition of her account, and which statement he had delivered to her about August 1st, and, going into the bank, while she went shopping, he indorsed thereon in his own handwriting, under date of September 15th, the payment of the $2,000, and as so indorsed returned the same to her. She also testified that she on April 16, 1920, paid Lewis $500 in cash, credit for which $500 was given by him in the typewritten statement delivered to her on August 1st wherein he acknowledged payment of the gross sum of $4,587. It is admitted that on July 21st defendant paid Lewis by check $500, and on August 16th paid him $500; that on said last date Lewis in his own handwriting made the following indorsements on said typewritten statement: "July 21, received by check $500.00; August 16, received by check $500.00"—and that thereafter, to wit, on October 26th, she gave Lewis a check for $500, upon which she says was written, in the lower left-hand corner, "Balance due, $305," which was intended to exhibit to him the balance due on her account. The contention of plaintiff is that the typewritten statement rendered under date of July 29th, and showing payment of $4,587, was intended to include the $500 paid on July 21st, and that the indorsement thereon as to such payment made by Lewis August 16th was an error and in fact a duplicate receipt of the $500 paid in July; whereas defendant claims that, having erroneously omitted the same from the typewritten statement, he made the indorsement to cover it.

The subject of the controversy, then is, as to these two cash payments, one of $500, claimed by defendant to have been paid in cash on April 16th, and the other of $2,000, claimed by defendant to have been paid in cash on September 15th, to the making of which payments at the times mentioned she in positive terms testified. There is nothing to sustain plaintiff's contention that the indorsement upon the typewritten statement of the payment of $500 made on July 21st was an error, other than the fact that the typewritten statement rendered defendant was made after the date of said payment. Neither the typewritten statement with the indorsements thereon so made by Lewis nor the check for $500 dated October 26th, which defendant claimed was indorsed, "Balance due, $305," was produced at the trial. The defendant claimed that both documents had been lost, prior to which loss, however, she had exhibited them to plaintiff and her daughter, who had inspected the same, and both plaintiff and her daughter testified there was no indorsement, as claimed, upon the check dated October 26th, showing a balance due of $305 only; and they also testified the indorsement upon the typewritten statement, under date of September 15th, "Received by cash $2,000," was not in the handwriting of Lewis. The fact that all other payments save and except those in controversy were made by check, that defendant had lost not only the statement containing the disputed indorsement, but likewise the check of October 26th upon which she claimed to have indorsed the balance due to Lewis, together with the irregularity of defendant's act as stated in drawing the $2,000 from her safe deposit box and keeping it in her house for some six weeks and then paying it to Lewis on the street, together with other circumstances connected with the transaction as related by her, when added to the testimony of plaintiff and her daughter, Mabel Lewis, to the effect that the purported receipt upon the typewritten statement was not in the handwriting of deceased, George E. Lewis, and the check dated October 26th for $500, which had been seen by them at the time of its delivery, contained no indorsement showing a balance due of $305, were well calculated to raise a doubt in the mind of the trial judge as to the truth of defendant's statements. While defendant's testimony as to such facts of payment was positive, and assuming it was not and owing to decedent's death could not be contradicted, the court by reason of the circumstances connected with the transaction, as shown by defendant's own testimony, in connection with that of plaintiff in denying that the indorsement was in the handwriting of deceased, might well have deemed it sufficient to discredit her story and justify the conclusion that defendant had not established the fact of payment. Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 129, 113 Pac. 147; Cox v. Schnerr, 172 Cal. 371, 156 Pac. 509; Travis Glass Co. v. Ibbetson (Cal. Sup.) 200 Pac. 595. As said in the case last cited:

"The most positive testimony of a witness may be contradicted by inherent improbabilities as to its accuracy contained in the witness' own statement of the transaction; or there may be circumstances in evidence in connection with the matter, which satisfy the court of its falsity; the manner of the witness in testifying may impress the court with a doubt as to the accuracy of his statement, and influence it to disregard his positive testimony as to a particular fact; and, as it is within the province of the trial court to determine what credit and weight shall be given to the testimony of any witness, this court cannot control its finding or conclusion denying the testimony credence, unless it appears that there are no matters or circumstances which at all impair its accuracy."

Hence, if the court upon such conflicting testimony, considered in the light of the circumstances shown and the conduct of defendant in relating matters in connection with the transaction, had made the finding, this court, upon a review thereof, would not be warranted in holding it without support of sufficient evidence.

[2] Plaintiff, however, did not rest her case upon such testimony, but, over defendant's strenuous objections, introduced the day book kept by her deceased husband and a ledger to which the daughter, Mabel Lewis, had transcribed the entries therefrom, and wherein all payments claimed to have been made by defendant, other than the payment of $500 on April 16th and $2,000 on September 15th, were made to appear. Since defendant admitted the original indebtedness and plaintiff conceded the making of all payments other than the two in controversy, the books could have been pertinent to no facts other than those in controversy, and hence they must be deemed to have been received and by the court considered for the purpose of showing that defendant had not made the payments as she stated; in other words, to establish, not an affirmative fact shown by an entry in the books, but a negative fact from the absence thereof. Section 1946, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that:

"The entries and other writings of a decedent, made at or near the time of the transaction, and in a position to know the facts stated therein, may be read as prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein, in the following cases: 1. When the entry was made against the interest of the person making it. 2. When it was made in a professional capacity and in the ordinary course of professional conduct. 3. When it was made in the performance of a duty specially enjoined by law."

While under this provision the entries in the books, not the absence thereof, would be evidence against his estate, they would constitute no evidence of negative facts as to which no entry was made, since the omission might have been due to mere negligence or forgetfulness and without motive, either good or bad. Schwarze v. Roessler, 40 Ill. App. 474. Not only is there no statutory provision under which the books were admissible, but it is the general rule that books of account are never deemed evidence to rebut a presumption by showing there is nothing contained in them in reference to the claim set up by the adverse party. The entries made upon a proper showing are competent evidence of the facts shown thereby, but the fact that no entries were made by the deceased constitutes no proof of the omitted fact in dispute. Lawhorn v. Carter, 11 Bush (Ky.) 7; Mattocks v. Lyman, 18 Vt. 98, 46 Am. Dec. 138; Winner v. Bauman, 28 Wis. 563; Ladd & Bush v. Sears, 9 Or. 244; Kerns v. McKean, 76 Cal. 87, 18 Pac. 122; Morse v. Potter, 70 Mass. (4 Gray) 292; Riley v. Boehm, 167 Mass. 183, 45 N. E. 84. The books were received, not as containing entries relating to the cash payments in controversy, but as showing from the omission thereof that the money was not paid as defendant said it was, and upon the assumed fact that, had it been paid, deceased would have entered it as a credit, it is argued that its absence therefrom is proof that it was not received, and apparently the court in reaching its conclusion entertained this view of the matter. In our opinion, the books were incompetent for such purpose, and the court should have sustained the objection to their admission.

Respondent insists the books were not received in evidence, for which reason her counsel claims that defendant is not entitled to have the question reviewed. There is no merit in this contention. While copies of the books themselves are not brought up in the record, plaintiff's witness, over defendant's objection that the same was incompetent, testified fully as to the contents of the books, reading, the entries; whereupon her counsel offered the ledger and day book in evidence, and an objection thereto by defendant was by the court overruled.

Our conclusion renders it unnecessary to discuss other objections urged by appellant in support of her contention.

The judgment is reversed.

CO. v. ALBERTI et al. (Civ. 3782.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 2, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 31, 1922.)

4. Evidence §20(1)—Court may take judicial knowledge of method of final carrier's paying initial and intermediate carriers.

Where a consignee is to pay freight, a court may take judicial knowledge of the method usually employed for the final carrier to pay the initial and the intermediate carriers their part.

2. Carriers §193 — Payment by final carrier to initial and intermediate carriers held to constitute an assignment of their rights to the final carrier.

Where a final carrier was to collect freight due on a shipment from a consignee, payment by it to the initial and the intermediate carriers of their part of the freight by operation of law constituted an assignment to the final carrier of the right of the initial and intermediate carriers to recover for the services rendered by them.

3. Carriers §196—Defense of loss of goods through delay in transportation cannot be set up unless pleaded.

In an action by a carrier against a shipper to recover freight, failure to plead the defense that the goods were destroyed through negligence in transportation prevents setting up the defense.

4. Carriers §196—Evidence held sufficient to justify a finding that delivery was duly made at destination.

In an action by a carrier against a shipper to recover freight charges, evidence that a car was delivered at a place about a mile from its destination, the usual place of delivery of cars consigned to the destination, justified a finding that the car was duly delivered to the destination.

5. Carriers §194 — Consignor who consigns to himself primarily liable for freight.

Where a shipper consigned goods to himself, he was primarily liable to the carrier for the freight, and this obligation was not affected by the fact that the freight was not prepaid, nor by the shipper's transfer of the bill of lading, subject to the lien for freight charges, to a third party with whom the carrier had no contractual obligation.

6. Trial §397(4)—Finding as to allegation unsupported by affirmative evidence not necessary.

In an action by a carrier against a shipper to recover freight, where an allegation that the carrier permitted the buyer of the goods to inspect them contrary to directions of the shipper was supported by no affirmative evidence, a finding thereon was unnecessary.

7. Carriers §194—Permitting buyer to inspect goods held not to relieve consignor of liability for payment of freight.

Where goods were consigned to a shipper, the fact that a carrier permitted a buyer to inspect them contrary to directions of the shipper did not operate to relieve the shipper from the liability to pay freight.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by the Southern California Commercial Company against Aleardo Alberti and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. A. Massey, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

R. A. Morton and Mulford & Dryer, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action is by plaintiff as assignee of the Kansas City Southern Railway Company, which was the final carrier, to recover freight charges for the transportation of a carload of grapes from Los Angeles, Cal., to Frontenac, Kansas. Judgment for plaintiff, from which defendants appeal.

The issues tendered by the verified pleadings are simple. It is alleged in the complaint that on October 14, 1916, defendants delivered to the Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railway Company, in the county of Los Angeles, a carload of wine grapes under an agreement for the transportation thereof to Frontenac, Kan., where V. Brunetti should be notified of its arrival, and the same delivered to the order of defendants; that the carload of grapes was by said Salt Lake Railway Company and its connecting lines delivered to plaintiff's assignor, the Kansas City Southern Railway Company, by which as final carrier it, on October 23d, arrived at Frontenac, Kan., whereupon a notice in writing of such fact was duly given by the agent of such last-named railway company to V. Brunetti, who presented a bill of lading therefor, but refused to accept said carload of grapes or pay plaintiff's assignor as final carrier the lawful charges thereon; that upon such refusal of Brunetti, plaintiff's assignor immediately communicated with defendants, and requested instructions for the disposal of the goods, but they refused to instruct plaintiff's assignor in the premises, whereupon, for $30, the grapes were lawfully sold for freight charges, which sum was credited upon the through freight charges for the transportation of said carload of grapes, which amounted to $374.90; that plaintiff's assignor, as the final carrier, advanced to the initial and intermediate carriers their respective proportions of said freight charges; that the balance due thereon of $344.90 has not been paid; that prior to the commencement of this action the Kansas City Southern Railway Company duly assigned to plaintiff all its right, title, and interest in and to its claim for said freight charges.

By their answer defendants denied that the grapes were transported, as alleged in the complaint, from Los Angeles county to Frontenac, or that Brunetti was notified of the arrival of the car at its destination, or that he refused to accept the same and pay the freight charges thereon, or that such charges were $374.90 or any sum whatsoever, or that said sum, other than $30, has not been paid, or that the final carrier, plaintiff's assignor, paid the intermediate carriers their proportion of said freight, or that the claim for such freight had been assigned to plaintiff; as to all of which issues the court, upon ample evidence establishing such facts, found adversely to defendants. Further answering, defendants, while admitting they ordered the car of grapes shipped to Frontenac and delivered to their order, alleged their act in so doing was not for their account, but for and on behalf of V. Brunetti, who as provided in the agreement, should not be permitted to inspect the grapes; that plaintiff's assignor did permit an inspection thereof by Brunetti, and that he paid said freight charges. The court made no finding as to whether or not plaintiff's assignor permitted an inspection of the grapes by Brunetti in violation of the terms of the agreement, as alleged.

[1, 2] There is no merit in appellants' contention that the evidence is insufficient to establish the alleged assignment. The evidence conclusively shows the proportion of the total freight charges earned by the initial and intermediate lines of road over which the car was transported, and that plaintiff's assignor paid the respective amounts earned to each of them, which was in accordance with the method usual in cases of this character, as the court may judicially know. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Riverside Mills, 219 U. S. 186, 31 Sup. Ct. 164, 55 L. Ed. 167, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 7. Such act, by operation of law and in consideration of the payment so made, constituted an assignment to the final carrier of the rights of the initial and intermediate carriers to recover for the services rendered by them. Hutchinson, Carriers, § 828; Bissel et al. v. Price, 16 Ill. 408; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Hall, 69 Ill. App. 497. The rule appears to be founded upon commercial necessities, and without the application of which both carriers and public concerned would be subjected to great inconvenience and unnecessary trouble and expense.

[3] Appellant's chief contention, and that to which the larger part of their argument is devoted, is that the agencies which undertook the transportation of the car of grapes were guilty of negligence, by reason of which fact the grapes were spoiled in transit and valueless when they reached their destination. A sufficient answer to this contention is that no issue as to delay of the carriers in transporting the car, negligence, or want of proper care in handling the grapes was tendered by the pleadings or tried by the court; hence the purported finding that the grapes upon the arrival of the car were, due to no fault of the carriers, in a condition of fermentation and decay, even if unsupported by the evidence, must be disregarded.

[4] That the evidence shows the car to have been delivered at Pittsburg, Kan., which is about one mile from Frontenac, and that the former was the usual place for the delivery of freight consigned to the latter place, justified the finding of the court that the car was duly delivered at Frontenac.

[5] The agreement was to deliver the car of grapes at Frontenac to the order of defendants as consignors thereof. As such consignors they were primarily liable for the freight charges, which, as to them, could be discharged only by payment. "The consignor with whom the contract of shipment is made is primarily liable for the payment of the freight charges, whether he is the owner of the goods or not" (10 Corpus Juris, p. 445; Hutchinson, Carriers, § 810; Railroad Co. v. MacCartney, 68 N. J. Law, 165, 52 Atl. 575; Wells Fargo & Co. v. Cuneo [D. C.] 241 Fed. 727; Atlas S. S. Co. v. Colombian Land Co., 102 Fed. 358, 42 C. C. A. 398), and this obligation as to the carrier was not affected by the fact that the freight was not prepaid, nor by defendants' transfer of the bill of lading, subject to the lien thereof for freight charges, to a third party with whom the carrier had no contractual relation (Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Vredenburg Sawmill Co., 13 Ala. App. 442, 69 South. 228).

[6] Finally, it is contended that the carrier permitted the consignee to inspect the grapes contrary to the express direction of defendants indorsed on the bill of lading, and as to which the court made no finding. A finding was unnecessary, for the reason there was no evidence in support of such affirmative allegation. Spader v. McNell, 130 Cal. 500, 62 Pac. 828; De Tolna v. De Tolna, 135 Cal. 575, 67 Pac. 1045.

[7] Conceding, however, that the evidence shows the granting of such permission by plaintiff's assignor, such fact was immaterial, since, even though defendants might be entitled to recover damages for such act, it could not excuse them from their obligation to pay the freight charges. In 10 Corpus Juris, title "Carriers," page 253, it is said:

"The consignee has the right to examine the goods before accepting delivery; and this doctrine applies to interstate as well as intrastate shipments, there being nothing in the Carmack Amendment which restricts this right."

See, also, Earnest v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 149 App. Div. 330, 134 N. Y. Supp. 323; Yuille-Miller Co. v. Chicago, I. & L. Ry. Co., 164 Mich. 58, 128 N. W. 1099; Hutchinson, Carriers, § 733. Moreover, the direction was, "No inspection of car allowed by consignee." For aught that appears to the contrary, Brunetti, if he inspected the car, did so as agent of the consignors, who, as owners, had the right to examine it.

We find no merit in any of the points urged by appellants for a reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. REED. (Cr. 861.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 25, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 24, 1922.)

1. Burglary $\S$ 41(1)—Evidence held sufficient to justify conviction.

In a prosecution for larceny and burglary, evidence held sufficient to justify verdict of guilty of burglary, although acquitting of larceny.

2. Burglary $\S$ 42(1)—Mere possession of stolen property not sufficient to fasten conviction of theft.

Mere possession of stolen property, even if unexplained, is not alone sufficient to fasten a conviction of the theft upon the possessor.

3. Jury $\S$ 133—Juror's voir dire, although having contradictions, supported denial of challenge.

Voir dire, although showing mess of contradictions, justified trial court's finding as to juror's proper qualification and supported denial of challenge for cause.

4. Jury $\S$ 103(14)—Juror's opinion from general discussion and newspaper report not disqualification per se.

Where a juror was examined on his voir dire, notwithstanding that the opinion, which some of the answers, when taken alone, indicated that he held concerning defendant's guilt, was based on general discussion and newspaper report, he was not disqualified to act if his examination showed that he would set aside his opinion and give defendant a fair trial upon the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

James Reed was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Morfoot & McCroskey, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. Defendant and one Michael J. Malone were jointly informed against in two counts. One of these charged grand larceny and the other charged burglary, the two alleged offenses arising out of the same transaction. Defendant was tried alone and was acquitted on the grand larceny charge, but was convicted on the burglary charge. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial of the cause.

Appellant contends that the evidence against him was insufficient to sustain the verdict holding him guilty of the burglary charge. There was no evidence directly connecting appellant with the burglarizing of the house which is shown by the record to have been feloniously entered by some person, the testimony also showing that property of considerable value was taken from the place at the time. The evidence did show that appellant, a day or two after the burglary, attempted to sell certain of the stolen property then in his possession. The person to whom the offer was made communicated with the police, and appellant and Malone were arrested. No explanation was then given as to how appellant came into possession of the stolen articles, nor, in fact, did he present any evidence upon the subject at the trial. Upon the arrest being consummated, appellant asked the arresting officer if he could see the owner of the house which had been burglarized, saying in effect that he could locate all the stolen property and would return it if the owner would not prosecute him. He also denied to the police officers that he had attempted to sell any of the stolen articles. At the time of his arrest appellant gave his name as James Reed, but there was testimony at the trial to show that the appellation was not his true name.

[1] We are convinced that this array of evidence was amply sufficient to justify the verdict of guilty rendered against appellant.

[2] It is undoubtedly the law that the mere possession of stolen property, even if unexplained, is not alone sufficient to fasten a conviction of the theft upon the possessor (People v. King, 8 Cal. App. 329, 96 Pac. 916; People v. Lang, 142 Cal. 482, 76 Pac. 232); but the cases establishing that rule are also to the effect that the fact of such possession, if unexplained, is an item to be taken into consideration by the jury, together with other incriminating circumstances, in arriving at a verdict. When the facts shown in this case are compared with the facts of the two cases cited above, and are measured by the law as stated in those cases, there is no doubt left in our minds as to the propriety of the conviction of appellant.

Appellant takes the position that the evidence was insufficient to uphold the conviction of the crime of burglary because the jury declared his innocence of the charge of grand larceny. We cannot ascribe any weight to this argument. The jury might very well have convicted appellant on the larceny charge, but that it did not do so cannot operate to overturn the verdict finding appellant guilty of the other offense. The fact that the jury could split its verdict as it did upon the two charges, while it may inspire speculation in the minds of the curious, gives us no concern in determining the appeal. Having reached the conclusion that the evidence would have supported a verdict of guilty on both charges, we are bound to uphold the conviction which actually resulted upon one of them.

Several other points are stated by appellant, but only one of them is argued. That point, therefore, is the only remaining one to which it is necessary to address ourselves under the many decisions of the courts of review of the state to the effect that points not argued on appeal are points not to be considered, none of which decisions need be cited.

[3] The question now to be determined is whether the trial court erred in denying a challenge for cause interposed by appellant as to one of the jurors who was sworn in the case and who sat in judgment against appellant. Appellant exercised all the peremptory challenges allowed him by law, and the question of the propriety of the denial of the challenge for cause is therefore directly before us. The juror as to whom this challenge was presented testified on his voir dire, in response to questions by counsel for appellant, that he had heard the case discussed; that he had read about the facts of the case in the newspapers; that he was inclined to think that what he read in the newspapers had created an impression on his mind or an opinion "about this case," his opinion being, "I thought if they had hold of the right man there couldn't be any doubt about his guilt," but that he did not know whether appellant was the right man. Then followed these questions and answers:

"Q. You realize it is a fact that these officers have brought him in here, and the district attorney's office filed an information against him? Do you think that they have got the right man by reason of that fact? A. I don't know until I hear the evidence. Q. Well, have you got any opinion at this time? A. Not as to his identity; no. * * * Q. Well, does that discussion that you had, does that leave you with any fixed impression about this case? A. Yes; I think it does.

"The Court: Did you discuss as to the guilt or innocence of this defendant? A. No; it was about the details of the alleged crime.

"The Court: Well, that is not controverted, the fact that the house was robbed—that is not controverted.

"Mr. Morfoot: No; there is no controversy about that. * * * Do you feel that you could fairly try this case as to the guilt or innocence of this defendant? A. I doubt if I can, because I thought it was a particularly heinous offense. * * * Q. So that you feel that you are prejudiced against this defendant in this case? A. Well, to be perfectly frank, I feel that I would be. Q. Could you not give him a fair and impartial trial? A. No. Well, I might be able to do that. Q. * * * Now, if you were on trial under such circumstances, and you had a man sitting there feeling as you do, would you be willing to have a man of that opinion that you have at this time try you? A. No. Q. Then you would admit, wouldn't you, that you are prejudiced towards the defendant? A. I am prejudiced against the person who committed this offense, yet he may be— Q. You don't feel that you can try James Reed in this case with a fair, impartial, and open mind? A. I don't believe I could."

Here the challenge was interposed. It was resisted by the district attorney, who then conducted the following examination of the prospective juror:

"* * * You heard the details of a burglary that occurred * * * in Mr. Lewis' home? * * * A. Yes. Q. Now, at that time did you hear anybody's name mentioned in connection with the commission of that burglary? A. No; that made no impression upon me at all. Q. You don't know anything about this defendant? A. No. Q. Never saw him before? A. No. Q. Or heard of him? A. No. Q. You don't know whether he committed this crime or not? A. No; I haven't any idea. Q. Notwithstanding this opinion about this house being burglarized in the manner in which it was, do you feel you could hear the evidence and weigh the evidence fairly and impartially and give this defendant a fair and impartial trial, just the same as you could anybody else? A. Well, Mr. McCartney, I am placed in a position where the burden of proof would be on the defendant."

The trial judge then subjected the talesman to the following examination:

"The Court: If you were a defendant, arrested for an offense, would you consider that you ought to prove yourself not guilty or that the state ought to prove you guilty? A. No. Q. What evidence do you have that this defendant is guilty? A. I haven't any at all. Q. Why do you say that you would want him to prove himself innocent? A. Well, I would try to differentiate between this defendant and the man who committed this crime, if I make myself clear. Q. Well, that is what you are impaneled for, to determine who committed the crime, not whether a crime has been committed; that is conceded in this case, that this house was burglarized; now, the question to be submitted to you is whether this defendant is the man. Now, you say that you would expect the defendant to prove that he was innocent? A. I would not go quite that far, your honor, to say that I would expect him to prove it, but I would go into the case with a feeling that it was perhaps, in a ways, up to him. Q. Why? A. Because I was very much struck at the details of this alleged crime as I heard it. I thought it was absolutely an unpardonable thing. Q. * * * Now, what is there in that to show that the defendant is guilty? A. Nothing at all. Q. Well, then, why couldn't you try the defendant and give him a fair, impartial trial? A. I intended to say that I felt that I could, but that I would not like to be tried by a jury that had the same mental attitude that I have. Q. Well, you say you haven't any mental attitude against the defendant; you don't know him, never heard of him. Suppose they had Mr. McCartney up for it; would you be prejudiced against him? A. Not at all. Q. Well, you haven't any more evidence that the defendant committed it than you have that Mr. McCartney committed it? A. Not in the least. Q. Why couldn't you try the defendant just as well as you could try Mr. McCartney? A. Well, it is possible that I could, your honor. Q. Is there any reason why you could not, I say, is there any reason why you could not try this defendant? A. Oh, I believe I could set aside what prejudice I have, and give the man a fair trial. Q. By Mr. McCartney: The question is, would you? A. Oh, yes; I certainly would."

On its face, this examination shows a mess of contradictions, but we have grave doubts whether these apparent contradictions actually reflect the condition of mind of the talesman at the time. The phrasing of his answers shows him to have been a man of considerable intelligence, in fact, of a degree of intelligence which could not harbor the confusion which his words appear to exhibit between a prejudice or feeling against the nature of the crime and a prejudice against the man who was merely charged with its commission. We greatly fear that this juror was one of those men who so far forget the duties and obligations of their citizenship as to attempt to escape them when put to the test, and that he entered the jury box with a determination to escape jury service in this case if he could possibly do so. Unfortunately that manner of man is not a rara avis. If, however, this position is not tenable, it is enough to say that the trial judge was better qualified than are we, he having had the talesman under his eye, to resolve the apparent contradictions in his statements and to determine whether he would make an impartial juror. There is surely enough evidence among the varying statements in the record to support the ruling of the trial court in denying the challenge, and the finding of a trial court upon such a question as is here presented is, as to its finality, like any other finding of fact made upon conflicting evidence. People v. Ruef, 14 Cal. App. 576, 114 Pac. 48, 54.

[4] It is to be observed, also, that the opinion which some of the answers of the talesman, when taken alone, indicate that he held concerning the guilt of appellant, was based upon general discussion and newspaper report. It has been held in this state, both frequently and uniformly, that where a juror has formed such an opinion upon such a basis, he is not disqualified to act if his examination shows, as the examination in this instance did show, that he will set aside his opinion and give the defendant a fair trial upon the evidence. People v. Warner, 147 Cal. 546, 82 Pac. 196; People v. Brown, 148 Cal. 743, 84 Pac. 204; People v. Ruef, supra.

The judgment and the order denying motion for a new trial are affirmed.

BRYAN v. PRESCOTT et al. (Civ. 3833.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 24, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 20, 1922.)

1. Deeds $\hookrightarrow$ 196(3)—Conveyance by wife, in which husband gains advantage, is presumed to have resulted from undue influence.

Under Civ. Code, § 158, authorizing either husband or wife to enter into any transaction with the other subject to the general rules governing actions of persons occupying confidential relations, as defined in the title on trusts, section 2235, providing that all transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary by which the trustee obtains any advantage are presumed to be entered into under undue influence, and section 2219, providing that every one who voluntarily assumes a relation of personal confidence with another is a trustee, a conveyance by the wife to the husband, from which the husband obtained a large advantage for himself, is presumed to have been obtained by undue influence, and that presumption prevails until overcome by evidence clearly showing the contrary.

2. Trusts $\hookrightarrow$ 103(3)—Purchase of outstanding interest in land with proceeds of mortgage on interest secured from wife by undue influence held void.

Under Civ. Code, § 853, as to resulting trusts, where a husband procured by undue influence a conveyance from his wife to her undivided half-interest in property, and then mortgaged the property, and with the proceeds purchased the other half-interest therein, the invalidity of the purchase from the wife affects also the purchase of the other interest.

3. Adverse possession $\hookrightarrow$ 62(3)—Evidence held not to show possession of surviving husband was adverse.

Where a wife devised her home premises to her daughter, who resided in another state, and the daughter requested the husband to care for the property for her, not knowing of a void deed by the wife to the husband, the husband's possession of the property, without informing the devisee of the deed, was not adverse to the devisee's interest, especially where he yielded possession to her when she came to the state and demanded possession several years after the death of testatrix.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action to quiet title by T. P. Bryan, trustee, against Elizabeth J. Prescott, individually and as administratrix of the estate of Ruhamah Bryan, deceased, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Bowers, of Sawtelle, for appellant.
Victor Watkins, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Action to quiet title to a lot described in the complaint. The premises are also referred to as 2130 Vallejo street, in the city of Los Angeles. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment entered against him.

In the year 1904 the lot was conveyed by one Palmer to Ruhamah Young and her daughter, Emma Brown, as tenants in common; the consideration therefor being paid by Mrs. Young. At some time between the date of that deed and the year 1910 Mrs. Young married the plaintiff, T. P. Bryan. In the year 1911 Emma Brown died, and it is conceded that whatever interest she had in the property passed to her husband, Woods G. Brown. On the 13th day of May, 1913, Ruhamah Bryan died. At the trial of this action it was stipulated that Mrs. Bryan left a will under which any interest that she had in this property at the time of her death passed to the defendant Elizabeth J. Prescott. On the 15th day of January, 1912, Mrs. Bryan signed and acknowledged a deed purporting to convey the lot to the plaintiff, and he caused the same to be recorded. According to his testimony, the deed was delivered to him by his wife. Mr and Mrs. Bryan were living on the premises at that time and until her death. After that time he continued in undisturbed possession, under circumstances hereinafter stated, until the year 1919. The complaint in this action was filed May 10, 1920.

The deed of Mrs. Bryan to the plaintiff recites a consideration of $100. The plaintiff testified that his wife did not make a gift to him of the property, but that the transaction was a matter of business; that he did not pay her any money at the time of execution of the deed; that he loaned her $30 before they were married; that he afterwards paid for her a $100 note to a physician, which note had been given for professional services rendered to her before the marriage. He testified that he had an understanding and agreement with his wife that she would give the deed for $100, but he was unable to state any of the words used in their conversations on the subject. Within a few weeks after the date of this deed, the plaintiff obtained a loan of $1,000 by mortgaging this property. With $850 of this borrowed money he purchased from Woods G. Brown his interest in the property. This transaction is evidenced by a deed of date March 25, 1912, from Brown to the plaintiff. The admitted value of the property in dispute is at least $2,000. Plaintiff testified that at the time when Mrs. Bryan signed the deed to him, her mind was "as good as I ever saw her," and that it continued the same until a few days before her death. Yet in a letter written at some time during that period, by the plaintiff to the defendant, referring to Mrs. Bryan, he said:

"I suppose you see by her letters that she is off on her mind. * * * She is not well by a long ways, that with her mind and age put her mind in bad form. * * * Her old age, and mind out of balance on many things, and from what I can learn, has always been so to some extent."

At the time of the death of Mrs. Bryan, the defendant Mrs. Prescott was living in the state of New York. She did not come to California until the 1st of January, 1919. Three weeks later she obtained from the plaintiff the key to the house, and went into possession of the property. Ever since that time she has occupied the same as her residence. She had been prevented by the death of her son and by other circumstances from coming to California until 1919. The plaintiff and another witness testified that plaintiff gave Mrs. Prescott the key on her representation that she wanted to rent the property from him. She denies this. She went to see him at the Soldiers' Home, where he was staying at that time, although some of his furniture remained in the house on the premises that are here in litigation. She says that she asked him for the keys, and he gave them to her. "He told me the things were all gone out of the home, and he didn't know where they had gone to or who had taken them, and he gave me the keys to the home to move in, and I moved in with my little daughter, and we lived there." After the commencement of this occupancy by the defendant, she for the first time learned that plaintiff had a deed to the property. Three or four weeks after the defendant moved into the premises, the plaintiff called there, and a conversation took place between him and the defendant. She said:

"I asked him how it was that my mother had willed me this property and deeded it to him. He said, 'As it is, she didn't know it was a deed she was signing. She was ignorant on business.'"

On the 6th day of April, 1913, Mrs. Bryan wrote to the defendant that she had given to Mr. Bryan "the deeds and receipts for this property. Mr. Bryan will keep them for you dear Bessie." The findings of the court state:

"That at the time said deed was so signed by said Ruhamah Bryan, now deceased, said Ruhamah Bryan was over the age of 80 years, and very infirm and feeble in health, and did not know or realize the purport of said instrument, and said instrument or said deed was never delivered by said Ruhamah Bryan to the plaintiff herein, with the intention of conveying her said property to the plaintiff herein as his property, but said Ruhamah Bryan thought she was conveying and intended by said deed or instrument to convey said property to plaintiff in trust for her said daughter, Elizabeth J. Prescott, one of the defendants herein. That at the time said plaintiff procured his said wife, Ruhamah Bryan, now deceased, to sign said instrument or deed, the said plaintiff and his said wife were living together as husband and wife in said property hereinbefore described, and continued to live there together until the death of said Ruhamah Bryan, to wit, on or about the 13th day of May, 1913. That no adequate or sufficient consideration was given to the said Ruhamah Bryan, or received by her for the signing of said instrument or deed, and the only consideration that was given to said Ruhamah Bryan or received by her, if any at all, was given to her or received by her for such, was the cancellation of an alleged debt in the sum of $110, which the plaintiff claims was owing to him by his said wife at that time, by reason of the payment by him several years previous to that time of a doctor's bill, in about the sum of $100, and previously owed by his said wife, and the advancement of about $10 by the plaintiff to his said wife, or for her benefit, some years previous to said January, 1912."

[1] Appellant contends that no evidence was produced in support of any charge of fraud, misrepresentation, duress, threat, or undue persuasion on the part of appellant to obtain his deed from Mrs. Bryan, and that without such evidence the effect of the deed was to convey to him both the legal title and the entire beneficial interest in the property. In support of this proposition he relies upon section 158 of the Civil Code, and the decision in Tillaux v. Tillaux, 115 Cal. 663, 47 Pac. 691. The gist of the decision in Tillaux v. Tillaux is that the marriage relation does not ipso facto raise the presumption that a deed of conveyance from the husband to the wife has been the result of undue influence. It is summarized to this effect in White v. Warren, 120 Cal. 322, 325, 49 Pac. 129, 52 Pac. 723. Nevertheless, in White v. Warren, where the question at issue was whether moneys advanced by the wife to the husband were received by him as a loan or as a gift, it was held that—

"It devolved upon the husband, who claimed to have received the gift, to prove that such gift was made without any undue influence on his part, the presumption being that, in the absence of proof to that effect, there was such undue influence used."

This decision was based upon a construction of sections 158, 2235, and 2219 of the Civil Code. These sections are as follows:

Sec. 158. "Either husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property, which either might if unmarried; subject, in transactions between themselves, to the general rules which control the actions of persons occupying confidential relations with each other, as defined by the title on trusts." Sec. 2235. "All transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary during the existence of the trust, or while the influence acquired by the trustee remains, by which he obtains any advantage from his beneficiary, are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration, and under undue influence." Sec. 2219. "Every one who voluntarily assumes a relation of personal confidence with another is deemed a trustee, within the meaning of this chapter. * * *

The court said:

"Here, conceding what is claimed by the defendant as to the nature of the transaction, it is evident that he was greatly advantaged thereby, and, such being the fact, the burden rested upon him of disproving the presumption of undue influence created by the law under such conditions."

So here, since it appears from the evidence that the plaintiff obtained a great advantage from the transaction with his wife, the presumption of undue influence must prevail unless overcome by evidence clearly showing that undue influence was not used by him to obtain that advantage. On the evidence which came before the court in this case, we think that the court was justified in finding, as in effect it did, that the conveyance was not made freely or with knowledge of its effect, and that the plaintiff obtained an unfair advantage thereby.

In Magee v. Brenneman, 206 Pac. 37, considering the effect of section 2235 of the Civil Code, in a transaction between attorney and client, the Supreme Court said:

"This does not mean that a trustee may not deal with his beneficiary. But if he does deal with him in such manner as to obtain an advantage, the trustee has the burden of showing by evidence that the transaction was fair. * * * To place the burden on the beneficiary would be to put such contracts in the same category as those between parties occupying no relation of trust, to ignore the provisions of section 2235 of the Civil Code, and to deny this added protection to one whose confidence has been abused."

See, also, Cox v. Schnerr, 172 Cal. 371, 378, 156 Pac. 509.

[2] The conclusions above stated apply to the undivided half interest in the property obtained by the deed from Brown as well as to the interest which was vested in Mrs. Bryan. This results from the fact that the entire consideration paid to Brown was obtained by using the proceeds of a mortgage loan on Mrs. Bryan's property. Civ. Code, § 853.

[3] Appellant next contends that he has become the owner of this property by adverse possession; that he held and possessed the same adversely to the defendant for a period of more than five years prior to the commencement of this action. There is no merit in this claim. The plaintiff never entered into possession under the deed. He never did any act to direct the attention of the defendant to the fact that he repudiated the obligation of his trust. On the contrary, the testimony of the defendant is to the effect that she, by correspondence, requested him to take care of the property for her until she came to California, and that she knew of no adverse claim by him. His subsequent conduct, in surrendering possession to her on her arrival here, is confirmatory of that evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Evidence §20(1)—Court takes judicial notice of employment of men of certain trades in certain places.

The court will take notice that both riveters and rivet passers had been employed continuously for many years in Los Angeles in the erection of steel structures for large buildings, and that such workmen had been continuously employed for several years in building ships at Long Beach and at San Pedro.

2. Master and servant §385(1)—Compensation for injuries held computed on correct basis.

Compensation awarded to an employé injured after working a week in an employment calling for a weekly wage which was less than the wages in his ordinary employment, interrupted by illness, held computed on the proper basis under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 12, subd. (a), par. 4, the rate of wages paid at time of injury; there being no showing on the question as to earnings to bring him within paragraph 2.

Proceeding by A. E. Wingard before the Industrial Accident Commission against the Los Angeles Shipbuilding & Drydock Company for an award. From a decision awarding petitioner less than he asked, petitioner brings certiorari. Affirmed.

Courtney A. Teel, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner and W. H. Pillsbury, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

WORKS, J. An award was made in petitioner's favor under an application to respondent Accident Commission for an allowance of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act because of injuries received by petitioner on April 16, 1921, and while working as an employee of respondent Shipbuilding & Drydock Company, hereinafter referred to as the employer. Petitioner by the present proceeding asks us to review the action of the Accident Commission on the ground that the compensation allowed by the award was less than petitioner should have received under the law.

One of the contentions of petitioner is that a certain weekly benefit allowed by the award was computed upon an improper basis. For a long time petitioner had been in the service of the employer as a riveter at a daily wage of $6.40. This employment was interrupted by an illness which was suffered by petitioner, and which kept him away from the plant of the employer for a week. On the Monday following this absence he appeared at the place, but asked, on the ground that his strength was not fully restored, that he be put to work temporarily as a rivet passer, that employment paying a daily wage of but $4.16. Petitioner's request was granted, and he immediately began work in the capacity which called for this lesser wage. He continued in that line of work until Saturday of the same week, by which time it had become understood that he was to return to his ordinary employment as a riveter on the succeeding Monday. On that last day of his service as a rivet passer, however, that is, on the Saturday mentioned, petitioner suffered the injury because of which he asked respondent Accident Commission to allow him compensation. In awarding him a weekly benefit that body computed it upon the basis of his daily wage of $4.16 instead of upon the daily wage of $6.40, as petitioner contends should have been done.

The solution of this question depends upon a construction of portions of section 12 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act. Stats. 1917, p. 831; Deering's Consolidated Supplement to Gen. Laws 1917-1921, Act 2143c. The section provides, under subdivision (a), as follows:

"(1) If the injured employee has worked in the same employment, whether for the same employer or not, during at least two hundred sixty days of the year preceding his injury, his average weekly earnings shall consist of ninety-five per cent. of six times the daily earnings at the time of such injury where the employment is for six full working days a week. Where his employment is for five, five and one-half, six and one-half or seven working days a week, the average weekly earnings shall be ninety-five per cent. of five, five and one-half, six and one-half or seven times the daily earnings at the time of the injury, as the case may be.

"(2) If the injured employee has not so worked in such employment during at least two hundred sixty days of such preceding year, his average weekly earnings shall be based upon the daily earnings, wage or salary of an employee of the same class working at least two hundred sixty days of such preceding year in the same or a similar kind of employment in the same or a neighboring place, computed in accordance with the provisions of the preceding subdivision.

"(3) If the earnings be irregular or specified to be by the week, month, or other period, then the average weekly earnings mentioned in subdivisions (1) and (2) above shall be ninety-five per cent. of the average earnings during such period of time, not exceeding one year, as may conveniently be taken to determine an average weekly rate of pay.

"(4) Where the employment is for less than five days per week or is seasonal or where for any reason the foregoing methods of arriving at the average weekly earnings of the injured employee cannot reasonably and fairly be applied, such average weekly earnings shall be taken at ninety-five per cent. of such sum as shall reasonably represent the average weekly earning capacity of the injured employee at the time of his injury, due consideration being given to his actual earnings from all sources and employments during the year preceding his injury; provided, that the earnings from other occupations shall not be allowed in excess of the rate of wages paid at the time of the injury."

[1, 2] The parties to this proceeding agree that neither paragraphs (1) nor (3) apply to the question we now consider, petitioner insisting that the point is controlled by paragraph (4), and respondents contending that paragraph (2), the one followed by respondent Accident Commission in making its award, is to govern our decision. We are convinced that the view of respondents is the correct one, if all factors contemplated by paragraph (2) may be found in the record. It is obvious that the clauses, "If the injured employee has worked in the same employment" and "If the injured employee has not so worked in such employment," which are the opening words of paragraphs (1) and (2), respectively, refer to the employment in which an employee is engaged at the time of his injury. That employment in the present instance, as we have already observed, was that of a rivet passer. Taking the meaning which we have ascribed to the quoted clauses as a premise and looking now to paragraph (2) in an endeavor to ascertain its applicability to the present situation, we have only to determine, except for a consideration hereafter to be mentioned, whether rivet passers worked at the city of Long Beach, where petitioner was injured, or in a neighboring place, at least 260 days of the year preceding petitioner's injury. We are pointed to nothing in the record on this question, but that fact need give us no concern, for the particular point may be settled under the law of judicial notice. We know that both riveters and rivet passers have been employed continuously for many years in Los Angeles, which is less than 25 miles distant from Long Beach, in the erection of steel structures for large buildings. Even if there be a difference between that employment and the work of riveters and rivet passers in shipbuilding, a fact as to which we are not actually informed, we know that such workmen have been at work continuously for several years in the building of ships at Long Beach itself and at San Pedro, distant less than 10 miles from the former city. That we may take judicial notice of such facts as these is attested by the opinion of the Supreme Court in Ex parte Kohler, 74 Cal. 38, 15 Pac. 436. Having progressed so far we come now to another matter—and this is the consideration to which we have referred above. Paragraph (2) contemplates the basing of the average weekly earnings of an injured employee upon the daily earnings of an employee of the same class in the same or a neighboring place, extended over the period of time mentioned in the statute. The record here shows nothing upon the question as to what the daily earnings of such an employee were during 260 days within the year preceding the injury to petitioner, either in Los Angeles, San Pedro or Long Beach. To this extent, then, respondents have failed to bring the case within the terms of paragraph (2). On account of this fact neither paragraphs (1), (2), nor (3) apply, and we are bound to fall back upon paragraph (4). It will be observed that under the last-mentioned paragraph, "where for any reason the foregoing methods"—that is, those defined in paragraphs (1), (2) and (3)—"of arriving at the average weekly earnings of an injured employee cannot reasonably and fairly be applied," certain average weekly earnings shall be taken as a basis for the computation, "provided, that the earnings from other occupations shall not be allowed in excess of the rate of wages paid at the time of the injury." The language of this proviso undoubtedly refers to the wages paid at the time of the injury to the injured employee. As the finding of respondent Accident Commission was based upon the exact wage paid to petitioner at the time of his injury, the requirement of the proviso seems to have been met precisely. We are satisfied that the finding of respondent Accident Commission, fixing the weekly benefit allowed petitioner, was computed upon the proper basis.

The next contention made by petitioner arises under section 9 of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The section provides that—

Where liability for compensation exists, the employer shall furnish "such medical, surgical and hospital treatment * * * as may reasonably be required to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury."

The section also provides that—

"In case of his neglect or refusal reasonably to do so, the employer to be liable for the reasonable expense incurred by or on behalf of the employee in providing the same."

Some time after petitioner was injured his parents removed him from the hospital in which he had been placed by the employer, that hospital being the place to which the employer regularly sent its injured employees for treatment, to another hospital, and there placed him under medical care other than that which had been provided for him by the employer at the first hospital. The reason assigned for the removal was that petitioner had not received proper care and attention up to the time of the removal. Respondent Accident Commission refused to allow petitioner his medical and hospital expenses after the removal on the ground that there was a conflict of the evidence as to conditions existing in the hospital in which the employer had placed him; that conflict being resolved against petitioner. We have read carefully all the evidence heard by the Accident Commission and referred to by counsel as bearing on the point presented—and it comprises a great part of the entire evidence taken in the proceeding—and conclude that the commission arrived at a correct solution of the question. The major parts of the evidence which petitioner aimed at the hospital management and at the conduct of the hospital physicians and nurses met with direct contradiction in the opposing testimony.

We cannot say from the uncontradicted items of the evidence on the subject that the removal of petitioner from the first hospital in which he was placed was justified; that is, we cannot say that those items show that the employer either neglected or refused to furnish to petitioner such medical, surgical, and hospital treatment as was reasonably required to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury which he had suffered. The propriety of this conclusion seems so manifest to us that we do not feel called upon to recite the somewhat voluminous evidence bearing upon the question.

Award affirmed.

LUTHER v. CLARK et al. (Civ. 3900.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 31, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 27, 1922.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨299(3)—Complaint held not insufficient as failing to allege a valid reason for failure to convey perfect title.

In an action by a vendor against a purchaser to recover possession of land, a complaint, alleging that plaintiff's predecessor in title was to convey a perfect title and furnish a certificate of title showing it to be perfect, and from which it appeared that a corporation supplying water to the public had a right of way across the property for its pipe line, and alleging that plaintiff tried to obtain a release of the easement without success, and because of this fact he was unable to obtain a certificate showing perfect title, was not insufficient as failing to allege a valid reason excusing plaintiff from conveying a perfect title and furnishing a certificate showing such condition of the title.

2. Judgment ⇨248—Letter written after decision could not affect judgment.

In an action by a vendor against purchasers for possession of property sold, in which the vendor's predecessor in title had contracted to convey perfect title and to furnish a certificate showing such condition of the title, which the vendor was unable to do because a right of way for a water pipe line across the property was held by a public service corporation, on the purchaser's refusing at the trial to accept a deed so long as the easement remained and to pay the purchase price, refusal to enter an interlocutory judgment setting a time within which the purchasers should pay the purchase price was not error, regardless of a letter written by the purchasers after the decision offering to accept the deed and pay the purchase price.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨296—Purchaser may not retain possession refusing to pay purchase price for failure to convey title according to contract.

Where a vendor's predecessor in title contracted to sell land and to convey a perfect title and to furnish a certificate showing such condition of title, which he was unable to do because of an easement for a pipe line across the land, the purchaser had no right to retain possession of the property and to refuse to pay the purchase price for failure to convey title according to the contract, and, on refusal to accept a conveyance subject to the easement, a decree returning possession to the vendor was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Suit by Sidney Luther against Stephen A. D. Clark and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. Franklin Baxter, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Muhleman & Crump, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. It appears from the complaint herein that plaintiff is the owner of certain real estate described therein, the net area of which is 7.521 acres, which property is, and at all times mentioned was, subject to an easement and right of way across the same for a pipe line owned by the Hermosa Beach Water Corporation for the conveyance of water for public use; that plaintiff acquired title to said property from one Henry Krotzer, who, prior to plaintiff's acquisition thereof, had executed a contract for its sale to Stephen A. D. Clark. By the terms of the contract, dated June 11, 1912, Krotzer agreed that the tract of land consisted of 8 acres and was free and clear of all easements or incumbrances whatsoever, and that the purchase price to be paid by Clark was $500 per acre, net measurement, and that he would furnish the purchaser with an unlimited certificate of title by the T. I. & T. Co. of Los Angeles, Cal., showing measurement of the land, names and width of streets and roads touching the same, and a perfect title. The terms of payment were $50 cash, the balance to be paid as follows: $950 on or before September 1, 1912, $600 on or before March 1, 1913, and $2,500 on or before September 1, 1913; the last two payments to be evidenced by promissory notes secured by a mortgage upon the property. It provided further that Clark should have immediate and full possession of the land; that the conveyance should be by grant deed; and that Clark and his wife should, within five days after the certificate as provided was written, place in escrow the mortgage to secure the last two payments, and complete the cash payments September 1, 1912. It further provided that should any defect appear in the title that could not be removed to the satisfaction of Clark, then, at his option, all payments made should be returned to him. It is alleged that Clark made the $50 cash payment referred to, went into possession of the property about June 11, 1912, and has at all times since been and now is in possession thereof; "that plaintiff has heretofore attempted and endeavored to obtain a release of the easement and right of way of the Hermosa Beach Water Corporation over and across said property, and to obtain an unlimited certificate of title from the Title Insurance & Trust Company, referred to in said agreement as the 'T. I. & T. Co. of Los Angeles, California,' showing the measurement of the land, names and width of all streets and roads touching the same, and a perfect title as provided in said contract, but said Hermosa Beach Water Corporation has refused and does refuse to consider any proposition to relinquish said easement and right-of-way owned by them, and said Title Insurance & Trust Company has refused and does refuse to issue such unlimited certificate of title, stating that it is impossible for it to do so in accordance with said contract; that plaintiff is unable to have said easement and right of way removed or said certificate of title issued through no fault of plaintiff or of said Henry Krotzer," who executed the contract and subject to which plaintiff acquired title to the property and the rights of Henry Krotzer therein; and further "that plaintiff is unable to comply with the terms of said contract on his part; that plaintiff is willing to and does hereby offer to restore to defendants everything of value which plaintiff has received under said contract, and hereby tenders unto defendants said sum of $50, being the first payment on the purchase price of said land under said contract as alleged"; that defendants have refused and do now refuse to receive back said payment of $50 and cancel said contract and restore possession of the property to plaintiff, or to accept such title as plaintiff is able to convey, which title plaintiff hereby offers to convey, with a reduction in the purchase price proportionate to the difference between 8 acres and 7.521, as provided in said contract, but insist upon and do retain both the balance of the purchase price of said land and the possession thereof.

The prayer of the complaint is that defendants be required to either accept such title as plaintiff can convey and pay the purchase price thereof as agreed, or to accept back the sum of $50, paid by Clark to plaintiff's predecessor, Henry Krotzer, and cancel said contract and restore possession of the property to plaintiff; and in case of their refusal so to do, that said contract by decree of court be canceled, annulled, and declared to be of no effect, and that plaintiff's title be quieted against defendants, and that he be let into immediate possession of the property.

By their answer defendants denied that plaintiff, as alleged, was unable or had endeavored to comply with the contract by obtaining a release of the easement and right of way of the Hermosa Beach Water Corporation over and across said property, or that he had endeavored to or was unable to obtain an unlimited certificate of title from the Title Insurance & Trust Company, referred to in said agreement as the T. I. & T. Co. of Los Angeles, Cal., as provided in said contract, or that said T. I. & T. Co. has refused to issue such certificate of title, or has stated that it was impossible for it to do so in accordance with said contract; -and further alleged that since the commencement of the action defendant George T. Clark had purchased from defendant Stephen A. D. Clark all of his right, title, and interest in and to said contract and the land described therein.

Upon these issues the court found that plaintiff was the owner of and entitled to possession of the property, the area of which was as alleged in the complaint; that it was at the time of the execution of the contract and ever since had been and was subject to an easement or right of way for a pipe line across the southwest corner thereof in favor of the Hermosa Beach Water Corporation, as well as to other public easements for street and highway purposes; that defendants claim an interest and title in the property by virtue of said contract so executed by Henry Krotzer to Stephen A. D. Clark on June 11, 1912; that plaintiff has attempted and endeavored to obtain a release of the easement and right of way of the Hermosa Beach Water Corporation over and across the property, but that said corporation has refused to and does refuse to relinquish said easement or consider any proposition for the release thereof, and said Title Insurance & Trust Company refuses to issue an unlimited certificate of title, stating that it is impossible for it to do so in accordance with said contract; that plaintiff, without his fault or that of Henry Krotzer, has been and is unable to have said easement and right of way removed or said certificate of title issued, and is unable to fully comply with the terms of said contract on his part, but is willing and offered in open court at the trial of this cause to restore to defendants everything of value which plaintiff or his assignor received under said contract, and in open court at the trial tendered to defendants a grant deed conveying the property, subject only to the incumbrances aforesaid, which plaintiff has been unable to have removed, and offered to reduce the purchase price thereof in proportion to the difference between 8 acres and 7.521, as provided in said contract, but that defendants, and each of them, have at all times refused to exercise the option to receive back said payment of $50 and cancel said contract and restore to plaintiff possession of the property, or to accept such title as plaintiff is able to convey, but insist upon, and do retain the balance of the purchase price of said land and the possession thereof; "that defendants in open court at the trial of this cause, unqualifiedly refused to accept a deed to said property subject to any easement or right of way for a pipe line across said land, or anything other than a perfect title." And as a conclusion of law the court found that defendants, and neither of them, had any interest or estate whatever in or to said premises or any part thereof, that they be debarred from asserting any claim to said land, and that plaintiff was entitled to the possession thereof. Final judgment followed as prayed for in the complaint, from which defendants have appealed.

[1] Appellants insist the complaint is insufficient in that no valid reason is alleged excusing plaintiff from conveying a perfect title and furnishing the certificate of the T. I. & T. Co. showing such condition of the title, and hence the court erred in overruling the general demurrer interposed. There is no merit in this contention. It appears from the complaint that the Hermosa Beach Water Corporation had an interest in the property, to wit, a right of way across the same for its pipe line, through which it conducted water for a public use, which fact, since it is obvious that one cannot convey a perfect title to real estate which he does not own, was a sufficient excuse for plaintiff's failure to comply with his contract. Assuming a duty devolved upon plaintiff, under the terms of his contract, to clear the land from such burden, he alleges and proves by competent evidence that he has in good faith endeavored to obtain from said corporation a release of the easement and right of way, and that it has refused to relinquish the same or entertain any proposition therefor, by reason of which fact he has been unable to obtain a certificate showing a perfect title. Since in our opinion the complaint was sufficient as against the general demurrer, it follows that the court did not err in denying defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings, based upon the fact that the complaint did not state a cause of action, nor in overruling their objection to the introduction of evidence thereunder.

[2] It appears that the court at the close of the trial gave its decision in favor of plaintiff and ordered a final judgment entered, of which fact appellants complain. The evidence clearly shows that, as found by the court, defendants without qualification announced in open court that they would not accept the purchase of the property, nor pay for the same, until the property was free from the rights of the Hermosa Beach Water Corporation and the delivery to them of a certificate showing such fact, as called for by the contract, which was a condition impossible of performance under the circumstances shown to exist. In response to the question asked by the court, "You won't accept a deed so long as that easement remains?" defendants replied, "That is right," to which the court said:

"That being the case, there is no occasion to enter an interlocutory judgment. The defendant says he will not accept the offer (of the deed tendered in open court), and the judgment will be—"

After some further colloquy, the court asked:

"No point is made, Mr. Baxter, that these deeds do not run to the persons to whom you would have them run?"

"Mr. Baxter: No, only they do not satisfy us, and we won't accept them."

"The Court: Very well. Judgment will be for the plaintiff."

It is apparent that upon these facts defendants are in no position to complain because of the failure of the court to enter an interlocutory judgment extending the time within which defendants should pay the purchase price of the property. To do so under the circumstances would have been a futile act and no purpose could be served thereby.

The fact, as stated by appellants, that after the decision defendants, by a letter to plaintiff, offered to accept the deed and pay the purchase price, is immaterial, for the reason that it was a private communication and no part of the proceedings at the trial. It constitutes no part of the record and cannot be considered as affecting the judgment. While appellants claim that before the judgment was entered they made a motion before the court to be permitted to pay the purchase price, the record contains nothing whatsoever in relation thereto.

[3] Upon the findings, added to which, as shown by the evidence, is the fact that during the 10 years that defendants had the use and occupation of the property plaintiff was compelled to and did pay all the taxes, it would be difficult to conceive of a more inequitable position than that assumed by them. Their contention is that they may indefinitely keep possession of the property so received from the vendor and refuse to make payment of the purchase price; in other words, that they may keep both the property and the purchase money. They have refused to pay anything or comply with their part of the contract, save and except when plaintiff can convey a clear title, which, under the circumstances, he can never do, for the reason that another party owns an outstanding interest and title in the property; hence a conveyance in accordance with the terms of plaintiff's contract is impossible. As said in Garvey v. Lashells, 151 Cal. 526, 91 Pac. 498:

"A purchaser cannot retain possession of property delivered to him under a contract of sale without complying with the terms of the contract as to payment for the reason that the title of his vendor is not satisfactory. If a perfect title was to be conveyed, and the vendor is unable to give such a title, the vendee has appropriate remedies, but he cannot keep both the property and the purchase money."

In Haile v. Smith, 128 Cal. 415, 60 Pac. 1032, the court, supported by Worley v. Nethercott, 91 Cal. 512, 27 Pac. 767, 25 Am. St. Rep. 209, states the rule to be that—

"A purchaser of land in possession thereof under a contract of sale, by the terms of which the vendor is to give a warranty deed of the property conveying a good and perfect title thereto, cannot, upon the vendor's failure and inability to convey a good and perfect title, re-tam both the land and the purchase money until a perfect title shall be offered him, but he must pay the purchase price according to the contract, and receive such title as the vendor is able to give if he chooses to retain the possession of the land."

The judgment is affirmed.

SMITH v. QUESTA. (Civ. 3642.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 24, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error ⚡1024(5)—Order refusing motion to set aside judgment based on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

Where an order refusing a motion to set aside a judgment was founded on conflicting evidence, it will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⚡339(5)—Appeal from order denying motion to vacate judgment held too late.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 939, providing that an appeal from an order denying a motion to vacate a judgment must be taken within 60 days after the entry of the order in the minutes, where an order denying defendant's motion to vacate a judgment was entered in the minutes February 18th, a notice of appeal filed April 25th following was too late.

3. Appeal and error ⚡792—Appellate court will of its own motion dismiss appeal not taken in time.

Statutory time for taking an appeal is jurisdictional, and, where an appellant has made no attempt to appeal until after the time prescribed by the statute, the appellate court is without jurisdiction, and will of its own motion dismiss the appeal.

4. Appeal and error ⚡113(1)—Order refusing to hear application for rehearing of motion to vacate judgment is not appealable.

Where defendant's motion to set aside a judgment was overruled, an order refusing to hear defendant's application for a rehearing of his motion to vacate the judgment is not appealable, and will be dismissed, since an appeal will not lie from an order refusing to set aside a former appealable order made regularly and advisedly.

5. New trial ⚡153—Notice of intention must be filed within ten days after notice of entry of judgment.

Notice of intention to move for a new trial, not being filed within 10 days after receiving notice of entry of judgment, is too late.

6. New trial ⚡153—Application of appellant for order vacating judgment held a waiver of formal written notice of entry of judgment.

Where a judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff December 10th, and defendant on January 22d following filed a notice of intention to move to set aside the judgment, accompanied by an affidavit, such application to vacate the judgment amounted to a waiver of a formal written notice required to be served on the attorney for defendant in order to start the running of the 10 days' time allowed after receiving notice of the entry of judgment within which the losing party may move for a new trial.

7. Appeal and error ⚡345(1)—Failure to take appeal from judgment within 60 days held to cause loss of right to appeal.

Where a notice of intention to move for a new trial was not filed until 77 days after the entry of judgment, so that no proceeding on motion for new trial had been inaugurated or was pending at the expiration of 60 days after the entry of judgment, within which an appeal might be taken from the judgment in absence of any pending proceeding for a new trial, an appeal from the judgment taken more than 60 days after its entry was too late.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by W. R. Smith against Manuel Questa. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph F. Seymour, of El Centro, for appellant.

Hill & Lee, of El Centro, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. In this action for the restitution of leased premises, and for damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of defendant's breach of certain covenants, plaintiff recovered judgment in the absence of defendant from the trial, and the latter now appeals from the judgment, and likewise from an order denying his motion to set it aside. He also appeals from an order sustaining an objection to hearing his motion for a new trial and his motion for a rehearing of his motion to set aside the judgment.

The action was commenced October 14, 1920. Defendant, appearing by an attorney who has since been superseded by present counsel, filed an answer and likewise a cross-complaint. In due time plaintiff answered the cross-complaint. On October 29, 1920, the case being then at issue, the court, on motion of plaintiff's counsel, set the cause for trial on December 1, 1920. On October 31, 1920, defendant's counsel received notice of the setting of the case for trial. Notwithstanding the receipt of such notice by defendant's counsel, neither he nor his client appeared in court when the case came on for trial December 1, 1920. Plaintiff, therefore, in the absence of defendant and his counsel, put in his evidence, and a judgment in his favor was rendered and entered December 10, 1920. Shortly before the opening of court on the morning of the day for which the case was set for trial, defendant's counsel called plain-tiff's counsel on the telephone and asked for a short continuance of the case on account of his client's absence. Plaintiff's counsel refused to accede to the request, and defendant's counsel concluded that it was useless for him to appear in court without his client.

On January 22, 1921, defendant, who in the meantime had substituted his present counsel for his former attorney, served and filed a notice that he would move the court to set aside the judgment on the ground that it had been taken against him through inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect. He accompanied his notice with an affidavit made by himself, wherein, after admitting that his former attorney had received due notice that the cause was set for trial December 1, 1920, he deposed that he himself knew nothing about the trial or of the date set therefor, and that if his attorney had notified him that the case had been set for trial he would have been present with his witnesses. Counter affidavits were filed by plaintiff, as well as additional affidavits on behalf of defendant. In one of the counter affidavits, an affidavit made by defendant's former counsel, it is positively affirmed by the affiant that he did notify his client, the defendant here, that the case was set for trial on December 1, 1920, but that defendant failed to keep his promise to appear at the trial and bring his witnesses with him, and that the only reason why affiant did not appear was that he could not try the case without the presence of his client and his witnesses.

[1] The affidavits are quite voluminous, but from what we have set forth it sufficiently appears that there was a substantial conflict in the evidence upon which the court denied defendant's motion to set aside the judgment. So that, even if the appeal from the order denying defendant's motion to vacate the judgment had been taken in time—a matter which we presently shall consider—it would be our duty to affirm the order, for the reason that, there being a substantial conflict in the affidavits, the action of the trial court in determining whom to believe is conclusive on the appeal to this court. The statements in the affidavits that favor respondent must control. Patterson v. Keeney, 165 Cal. 465, 132 Pac. 1043, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 232.

On February 18, 1921, the court denied defendant's motion to set aside the judgment. Thereafter, namely, on February 25, 1921, defendant filed a notice that he would move the court to grant him a rehearing of his motion to set aside the judgment. At the same time he filed a notice of his intention to move for a new trial. The record before us is silent as to any service upon plaintiff of either of the last-mentioned notices. Plaintiff objected to any hearing of defendant's motion for a rehearing of his application to set aside the judgment. Plaintiff likewise objected to any hearing of defendant's motion for a new trial. On March 10, 1921, the trial court sustained plaintiff's objection to hearing defendant's motion for new trial, and likewise sustained the objection to hearing defendant's motion for a rehearing of his application to vacate the judgment. The notice of appeal was filed April 25, 1921.

[2] The appeal from the order denying defendant's motion to vacate the judgment was taken too late. That order was entered in the minutes of the court on February 18, 1921. The notice of appeal was filed April 25, 1921, or 66 days after the entry of the order. An appeal from such an order must be taken within 60 days after its entry in the minutes. Code Civ. Proc. § 939.

[3] The statutory time for taking an appeal is jurisdictional and mandatory; and, where an appellant has made no attempt to appeal until after the time prescribed by the statute, the court is without jurisdiction. Estate of Brewer, 156 Cal. 90, 103 Pac. 486; Lancel v. Postlethwaite, 172 Cal. 326, 156 Pac. 486. Respondent has made no motion to dismiss the appeal. Indeed, he has made no appearance in this court by printed brief or otherwise. But, since this court is without jurisdiction of the appeal, we, of our own motion, and notwithstanding respondent's failure to appear and move a dismissal, are bound to dismiss the appeal from the order denying defendant's motion to set aside the judgment. Langan v. Langan, 89 Cal. 186, 26 Pac. 764; McLaughlin v. Menotti, 89 Cal. 355, 26 Pac. 880; People v. Walker, 132 Cal. 137, 64 Pac. 133.

Moreover, the transcript before us has not been authenticated by the judge's certificate. The record here consists of a clerk's typewritten transcript containing the judgment roll, together with certain papers and records purporting to have been used on the proceedings had subsequent to the entry of the judgment. This transcript is certified by the clerk, but not by the judge. In Barnabee v. Hunstock, 42 Cal. App. 659, 183 Pac. 951, and Reed v. Clark (Cal. App.) 206 Pac. 1018, it was held that, where the order appealed from is subsequent to the judgment, and arises on a record outside of the judgment roll, it is not for the clerk, but for the judge who determined the motion, to certify the papers and proceedings on which the order appealed from was made, and that, in the absence of a record so certified the order should be affirmed. Here the order cannot be affirmed, because, the appeal not having been taken in time, the court is without jurisdiction, and the appeal must be dismissed.

[4] The order refusing to hear defendant's application for a rehearing of his motion to vacate the judgment is not appealable, and therefore must be dismissed. The first order, that made on defendant's original motion to set aside the judgment, was an appealable order. An appeal will not lie from an order refusing to set aside a former appealable order, made regularly and advisedly. Such subsequent order is the mere negative action of the court declining to disturb its first decision. It is the first decision, and not the refusal to alter it, which is the proper subject of complaint. Henly v. Hastings, 3 Cal. 341; Harper v. Hildreth, 99 Cal. 285, 33 Pac. 1103; Doyle v. Republic Life Ins. Co., 125 Cal. 15, 57 Pac. 667.

[5] In sustaining the objection to hearing defendant's motion for a new trial the court did not err. There is some doubt whether a new trial is the proper remedy when the defendant has not appeared at the trial. See McKinley v. Tuttle, 34 Cal. 235, and Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, § 9. But, regardless of whether a new trial was an appropriate remedy, defendant's notice of intention to move for a new trial was filed too late, and for that reason alone the court was warranted in refusing to entertain the motion. The party intending to move for a new trial must file and serve his notice of intention "within ten days after receiving notice of entry of the judgment," when the case is tried by the court without a jury. In this case the judgment was entered December 10, 1920. Defendant's notice of intention to move for a new trial was filed February 25, 1921.

[6] The record before us is silent as to any service on defendant of a formal written notice of the entry of the judgment. But, though the statute requires written notice of the entry of judgment to be served upon the attorney for the adverse party, such formal written notice may be waived. Such waiver may appear, as declared in Mallory v. See, 129 Cal. 356, 359, 61 Pac. 1123, from some act of acquiescence of the party in open court or in the proceedings in the case as disclosed by the records, or files of the case or the minutes of the court, when the conduct of the party in the case, as appears from such records or minutes, is inconsistent with any theory other than that he had notice of the entry of the judgment. Under such circumstances he is deemed to have waived written notice. A written admission by a party entitled to notice of knowledge that the judgment had been entered would supersede the necessity of giving such notice; and a motion to the court or other proceeding by a party with reference to the judgment, which presumes his knowledge that it has been made and entered, and by which he seeks to protect his own interests against the rights of the other party under the judgment, will be regarded as a waiver of his right to a notice of the entry of the judgment. Gardner v. Stare, 135 Cal. 118, 67 Pac. 5. In the present case the appellant, on January 22, 1921, or 34 days before he filed his notice of intention to move for a new trial, filed a notice of motion to set aside the judgment, accompanied by his affidavit. The contents of the papers which appellant thus placed upon the files of the court leave no room to doubt that, as early as January 22, 1921, his counsel knew that the judgment had been entered. We hold, therefore, that the application of appellant for an order vacating the judgment was a waiver by him, as of that date, of a formal written notice of the entry of judgment. And, since the notice of intention to move for a new trial was not filed until February 25, 1921, the court had no jurisdiction to hear the motion, and therefore the objection to hearing it was properly sustained.

[7] The appeal from the judgment was taken more than 60 days after its entry. The notice of intention to move for a new trial was not filed until 77 days after the entry of the judgment, with the result that no proceeding on motion for new trial had been inaugurated or was pending at the expiration of the 60 days after entry of the judgment within which an appeal might be taken from the judgment in the absence of any pending proceeding for a new trial. The right of appeal from the judgment was therefore lost. Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Beggs (Cal. Sup.) 196 Pac. 487.

The appeal from the judgment is dismissed; the appeal from the order denying defendant's motion to set aside the judgment is dismissed; the appeal from the order refusing to hear defendant's motion for a rehearing of the order denying his motion to vacate the judgment is dismissed; the order sustaining plaintiff's objection to a hearing of defendant's motion for a new trial is affirmed.

HOYT v. THOMAS et al. (Civ. 3897.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 26, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 24, 1922.)

Specific performance ~~§~~ 86—Not granted of contract to make will for ordinary service susceptible of pecuniary measurement.

Specific performance will not be granted of deceased's contract to will to plaintiff deceased's property, in consideration of plaintiff taking care of and managing it, and during illness of deceased rendering such aid and assistance as was in his power, conceding fairness of the contract, the services being ordinary and susceptible of pecuniary measurement, and it being immaterial that plaintiff has kept no memoranda and is unable to testify to the time devoted thereto or the value thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Frank C. Hoyt against Belle Thomas and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles J. Kelly, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lloyd W. Moultrie, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered in favor of defendants upon an order of court sustaining a general demurrer to the second amended complaint for the specific performance of a contract, without leave to amend.

The case stated by the complaint, so far as material, is in substance as follows: Hattie McIntire died in September, 1917, leaving an estate the value of which, as distributed to defendants as the heirs of deceased under an order of court, was $3,469.12. It is alleged that in March, 1903, a contract was entered into between plaintiff and said Hattie McIntire "by the terms and conditions whereof this plaintiff promised and agreed to and with the said Hattie McIntire that he would render to the said Hattie McIntire from that time during the remainder of the term of her natural life such care and personal services as she might require of him, and particularly that he would attend to the business affairs of the said Hattie McIntire both in connection with her real property and otherwise, and that he would endeavor to so manage and conduct her affairs in such manner if it were possible that the said Hattie McIntire would, during the remainder of her lifetime, be assured of and provided with a suitable and proper home and sufficient income to provide for her a suitable and proper living, and that whatever sickness, misfortune, or losses she might suffer he would render to her such comfort, aid, and assistance within his power or ability as she might require or request of him, and that during the remainder of the term of her natural life he would, and in consideration thereof the said Hattie McIntire then and there promised and agreed to and with this plaintiff that upon her death all of the property and estate of which she died possessed should be and become the property of this plaintiff, and that prior to her death she would execute a last will and testament or such other papers as might be necessary to transfer, set over, and secure to this plaintiff such property and estate of which she might die possessed"; that plaintiff, during the lifetime of Hattie McIntire fully performed his part of the contract so made, notwithstanding which fact the said Hattie McIntire did not, as she agreed, execute a will in favor of plaintiff, nor execute any papers transferring to plaintiff the property which she possessed at the time of her death, nor any part thereof, the legal title to all of which was, under said order of distribution, acquired by defendants, who are alleged to hold the property in trust for plaintiff under and by virtue of the terms of said contract so made between plaintiff and deceased. It is further alleged that plaintiff, in reliance upon the terms of said agreement and promise so made by Hattie McIntire, neglected to keep any account or memoranda in writing of the numerous services rendered by him in the performance of said contract or the time devoted to her care and comfort, without which plaintiff has no recollection or knowledge of the total time so devoted by him to the performance of said agreement, and hence during the administration of the estate of Hattie McIntire was not and is not now able to produce satisfactory evidence to establish the value of the services so rendered by him under the terms of the agreement; that the greater part thereof had, at the time of their rendition, no fixed market value, and as to such thereof upon which a value could have been fixed it is now impossible, upon the evidence which he could produce, for a jury to determine the measure thereof in money.

The prayer of the complaint is that defendants be required to transfer and convey the property so received by them to plaintiff.

The case has heretofore been before this court upon an appeal had by the defendants from a judgment of specific performance rendered upon the original complaint in favor of plaintiff, and the opinion reversing the judgment therein is reported in Hoyt v. Thomas, 195 Pac. 260. The decision on the former appeal should be deemed determinative of the question here presented. In the opinion referred to we had occasion to quote at length from the contract as alleged in the original complaint and from the testimony of plaintiff as to the character of the agreement and what he did thereunder. Reference to this contract and testimony shows the contract then under consideration to have been identical with that now declared upon, save and except that in the original complaint plaintiff alleged and at the trial had thereon testified that the services performed under the contract were of the value of $4,000; whereas in the amended complaint now presented he alleges that he kept no account or memoranda in writing of the numerous services rendered to deceased and has no recollection or knowledge thereof, by reason of which fact he cannot even approximate the time so devoted to the services rendered under the terms of the agreement or fix the value thereof so as to enable a jury or court of law to determine his damage. Nevertheless, as said in the former appeal, "the plaintiff himself seems to have had it in his mind that the services had a particular and definite money value, for he testified, without apparent hesitation and without qualification, so far as the record shows, that in his opinion the services were worth, as stated, about $4,000." Waiving plaintiff's apparent willingness to meet the exigencies of the case arising from the former decision and conceding a loss of memory as to the facts upon which he so readily based his sworn statements in obtaining the former judgment, we are of the opinion that the complaint fails to state a cause of action for the equitable relief demanded.

The action is one for the specific performance of the alleged contract whereby Hattie McIntire agreed that she would by will, in consideration of the performance of the alleged contract on plaintiff's part, devise her property to him. That courts of equity will under special circumstances enforce such contracts seems to be the settled law. Pomeroy on Specific Performance, p. 263; Morrison v. Land, 169 Cal. 580, 147 Pac. 259. To warrant such action, however, it must not only be made to appear that the contract is fair and just (Flood v. Templeton, 148 Cal. 374, 83 Pac. 148), but that the services called for and performed, by reason of their peculiar character, are such that they cannot be measured by a pecuniary standard (Morrison v. Land, supra), and hence cannot be compensated for in money (Owens v. McNally, 113 Cal. 444, 45 Pac. 710, 33 L. R. A. 369). Most of the cases where contracts of the nature here involved have been enforced appear to have been those where home ties were broken and new domestic or filial relations created, as where a minor goes to live with an adult upon his promise that he will stand in loco parentis and will devise to such minor his property in return for filial services during his lifetime. Healey v. Simpson, 113 Mo. 340, 20 S. W. 881. In the instant case no personal and domestic ties were severed by plaintiff and no peculiar personal relation created between the parties pursuant to which Hattie McIntire would be the recipient of plaintiff's society and filial affection. No such relation was contemplated by the contract. This being true, and conceding the contract is not obnoxious to the rule that it must be fair and just, it follows that plaintiff's right to specific performance of the contract must be based upon the fact that the services called for by the same were, by reason of their peculiar and unusual character, not susceptible of pecuniary measurement, for, as said in Stellmacher v. Bruder, 89 Minn. 507, 95 N. W. 324, 99 Am. St. Rep. 609:

"If the consideration for the contract be labor and services which may be estimated, and their value liquidated in money, so as reasonably to make the promisee whole, specific performance will not be decreed."

The contract as made was that plaintiff during the period specified should care for and render to deceased such personal services as she required of him; that he should give attention to her business affairs in an effort to successfully manage the same to her interest and profit, and during her illness render her such aid and assistance as should be within his power, to the extent that she requested the same. We are unable to perceive anything unusual or out of the ordinary in the character of the services which plaintiff agreed to perform for deceased, or why, upon proper proof, they could not be adequately compensated for in money. In character they are such as are of everyday occurrence and usually performed upon an express or implied contract for an agreed or implied pecuniary compensation. Hence, since it appears that no relation of a filial or like personal character was created or contemplated by the contract due to and incidental to which plaintiff discharged duties the nature of which made it impossible to estimate their value, but, on the contrary, the services called for thereby, if rendered, were susceptible of measurement and plaintiff compensated in money on account of the breach thereof, specific performance should not be decreed. The fact that plaintiff kept no memoranda and is unable, as he says, to testify as to the time devoted by him in rendering the services, or value thereof, is immaterial. His is the misfortune suffered by any plaintiff who performs services which may be measured in money and is unable to produce evidence of such value, but it furnishes no reason for equitable jurisdiction.

The judgment is affirmed.

McKEEVER v. LOCKE-PADDON CO.
(Civ. 3889.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California, May 31, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 27, 1922.)

1. Fraud — 11(2)—False representations regarding land value held actionable.

False representations as to the value of land made by a party to a trade are alone sufficient to constitute fraud where the party to whom the representations were made is not acquainted with conditions and land values in the locality where the land is situated, has no opportunity to investigate, and relies upon the representations.

2. Fraud — 59(2)—Finding of value of plaintiff's land exchanged held unnecessary under rule of damages.

In an action for false representations made by defendant in an exchange of land, it was unnecessary for the court to find on the value of the land plaintiff traded; his measure of damages being the difference between the actual value of the property received and its value had it been as represented.

3. Trial ☞391—Separate findings as to ratification of an exchange of land held unnecessary.

Where, in an action for false representations made by defendant in an exchange of land, the court found that plaintiff did not ratify the exchange, it was unnecessary to further find on each reason on which defendant claimed the ratification was predicated.

4. Appeal and error ☞1011(1)—Findings of trial court based on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Where the findings of the trial court on matters of fact are based on conflicting evidence, the appellate court cannot interfere.

5. Appeal and error ☞1033(9)—One cannot complain of value placed on his land by the court, where the value fixed was more than the value he conceded.

Where defendant, in an action for false representations made in a trade of land, conceded that his land was worth no more than $16 per acre, and where the evidence showed that the land was worth no more than $5 per acre, defendant could not complain of the value of $28.75 per acre fixed by the court.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Frank M. McKeever against the Locke-Paddon Company, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. L. Smith, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Reisner & Honey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Justice pro tem. In this action the plaintiff, Frank M. McKeever, recovered a judgment against the defendant, Locke-Paddon Company, a corporation, for damages sustained in connection with a real estate trade into which plaintiff was induced to enter through the fraudulent representations of the defendant. On stipulation of the parties the action was tried before a jury, sitting in an advisory capacity, and a general verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff for $3,500. The trial judge failed to file any written decision, findings of fact, or conclusions of law, or any order adopting the verdict, but merely entered judgment on the verdict. An appeal was taken by defendant, and the judgment was reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to give its decision in writing, as provided in section 633 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and to enter judgment accordingly. McKeever v. Locke-Paddon Co. (Cal. App.) 193 Pac. 258. Thereafter the trial court adopted the verdict of the jury, filed its decision containing its findings of fact and conclusions of law, and judgment was entered in accordance therewith. The defendant has again appealed from the judgment.

Appellant's grounds of appeal are in effect an attack upon the entire record in the case. Among the numerous grounds urged are that the amended complaint is fatally defective; that the findings are insufficient in form and incomplete in substance, and do not support the judgment; that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings; that the court erred in the exclusion of evidence offered by defendant, and that the amount of damages allowed by the jury was arrived at in an illegal manner.

The record discloses that on December 23, 1916, the plaintiff McKeever agreed to exchange certain real property situate in Palo Alto, Santa Clara county, for two pieces of real property, represented as belonging to the defendant Locke-Paddon Company, one being situate in Alameda county and the other in Yolo county. The exchange was consummated on January 18, 1917.

During the trial the court withdrew from the jury the issues as to the Alameda county property, and afterwards found against the plaintiff on those issues, upon the ground that that transaction was free from fraud. We are therefore concerned here only with the transaction involving the Yolo county property.

In this respect it is alleged in the amended complaint that the defendant fraudulently represented to plaintiff:

"That said Yolo county property contained 80 acres of comparatively level farming land and 80 acres of pasture and woodland, said woodland being timbered with large oak trees, which were very valuable when cut; that said Yolo county property was worth $60 per acre, and was accessible by a good road."

Appellant contends, first, that because of the allegations in the amended complaint, to the effect that it was represented by defendant that part of the Yolo property was "timbered with large oak trees, which were very valuable when cut," the trees must be considered separately from the land and dealt with as personal property, and that, since there is no allegation in the amended complaint as to the value of those trees "when cut" independent of the allegation as to value of the real estate, the amended complaint fails to state a cause of action. The allegation in question will not, we think, bear such technical construction. It is elementary that growing timber is part and parcel of the land. Section 658, Civ. Code; Sears v. Ackerman, 138 Cal. 583, 72 Pac. 171. There is no claim made that any part of the timber here was severed from the soil. The parties assumed to deal with land, and the apparent reason that timber was mentioned at all was by way of description of the character of the land as represented by defendant. The point, we think, does not merit further discussion.

The findings, if substantially supported by the evidence, are sufficient in law, in our opinion to uphold the judgment. The trial court found that the defendant made the representations as alleged by plaintiff, and that the same were false, and were known by defendant to be false when made; that they were made for the fraudulent purpose of procuring the exchange of the properties, and that they were the controlling influence and inducement for the consummation of the transaction by plaintiff. The court further specifically found that said property did not contain 80 acres of comparatively level farming land nor 80 acres of pasture and woodland, and that said land was not worth any more than $28.75 per acre, and "that said land was inaccessible, there being no roads to the same; that said land lies upon the summit of a high and inaccessible range of hills." It was further found that at the time of making said exchange plaintiff resided in Oakland; was totally unacquainted with conditions and land values in Yolo county, and "did not have sufficient opportunity to investigate the value thereof"; that plaintiff confided in the truth of said representations, and trusted, believed, and relied upon the statements so made, and that had it not been for such statements and representations he would not have made said exchange.

[1] The misrepresentations concerning the land values alone are sufficient, under the circumstances here shown, to constitute fraud. Winkler v. Jerrue, 20 Cal. App. 555, 129 Pac. 804; Bonnarjee v. Pike, 43 Cal. App. 502, 185 Pac. 479. In the latter case it is said:

"That a representation as to the value of property is often a representation of fact, and actionable if false, is well established, especially where the vendee to whom the representation is made is so situated as to have no means of investigating the question for himself, and therefore relies on the statements of value made by the vendor or his agent. Crandall v. Parks, 152 Cal. 772, 93 Pac. 1018; Phelps v. Grady, 168 Cal. 73-77, 141 Pac. 926."

Appellant further contends that the findings ignore material issues, in that they do not negative certain allegations contained in the answer to the effect that plaintiff made independent investigations of the Yolo property before he made the trade; that he was familiar with the property, and that he was an experienced real estate dealer. We find no merit in the point. All of the issues above mentioned, even conceding them to be material, are adequately covered by the findings. It was found by the court that plaintiff at the time of the exchange "was totally unacquainted with the actual conditions and value of said Yolo county property, and did not have sufficient opportunity to investigate the value thereof"; that said defendant had much experience in handling real estate, and was familiar with conditions and land values in Yolo county. And the court further found that plaintiff "believed, trusted, and relied upon" said representations, and that they were the controlling influence which induced plaintiff to make the exchange, and, had it not been for said representations, plaintiff would not have done so. In the recent case of Koblick v. Larson, 207 Pac. 929, it is held that the failure to find specifically on the issue of investigation is not ground for reversal, when the evidence shows that no real investigation was made, and that the party who was victimized relied implicitly and solely upon the representations of the selling agents, who he considered and believed to be his friends. In view of the evidence on this point it cannot be successfully contended that the plaintiff made any independent investigations. There was some testimony given by the witness Paddon and his agent Ausmus, who were charged with perpetrating the fraud on behalf of the defendant, to the effect that plaintiff had stated that he had communicated by phone with a friend who was familiar with Yolo property, and that as a result of such communication he, the plaintiff, was satisfied with the Yolo property. This conversation was positively denied by plaintiff, however, and in view of the fact that the court found that plaintiff did not have opportunity to investigate, and that he relied wholly upon the representations made by defendant, no further finding was necessary, we think, on the matter of independent investigation.

[2] Appellant also contends that the findings are incomplete because the court did not fix the value of the Palo Alto property. That contention cannot be sustained. In the case of Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 143 Pac. 729, in a comprehensive and clear opinion written by Mr. Justice Henshaw, the Supreme Court held it to be the law of this state that where one sues for damages for fraud and deceit upon an executed contract for the sale or exchange of land, and where there has been no rescission, the measure of damages is the difference between the actual value of the property received and its value had the property been as represented, and that the measure of plaintiff's recovery is not affected by the price paid. This rule is based upon the principle that the vendee is obliged to accept the burden of the contract with its benefits, according to its terms, with the right to a recovery for the fraud based upon the fact that the benefits which he receives are not those which under the representations of the vendor he was entitled to receive. The rule contended for by the appellant here seems to be the one mentioned in Cross v. Bouck, 175 Cal. 253, 165 Pac. 702, which is therein quoted from the case of Rockefeller v. Merritt, 76 Fed. 909, 22 C. C. A. 608, 35 L. R. A. 633, namely that the "measure of the damages suffered by one who is fraudulently induced to make a contract of * * * exchange of property is the difference between the actual value of that which he parts with and the actual value of that which he receives under the contract." But, as pointed out by Mr. Justice Henshaw in Hines v. Brode, supra, the courts of this state do not follow the federal rule. He says, in speaking of the rule adopted and followed in this state:

"This is not only the rule in California, but it is declared to be the rule under the great weight of authority. The opposing rule is that which obtains in England and in the courts of the United States. That rule refuses to recognize * * * the prospective profits which the vendee expected to make by his transaction."

Later, in the case of George Cople Co. v. Hindes, 34 Cal. App. 576, 170 Pac. 155, the Supreme Court, in denying a petition for a hearing before that court, criticized the rule mentioned in Cross v. Bouck, supra, declaring the correct rule to be the one stated in Hines v. Brode, and held that only the peculiar facts of Cross v. Bouck justified the application of the exceptional rule, in that case.

It was therefore not only unnecessary for the court to find on the value of the Palo Alto property, but the evidence rejected, if any there was, on this point was properly excluded. It could not have been received on the theory of recoupment for the simple reason that no recoupment was pleaded or prayed for by the defendant. In fact, the answer contains no allegation as to the value of the Palo Alto property. We do not consider the case of Herdan v. Hanson, 182 Cal. 538, 189 Pac. 440, cited by appellant, in point, for the reason that the situation there was different from the one presented here. There the evidence of the value of the property traded by plaintiff was offered and received in support and as a part of plaintiff's case, over the objections of the defendant, on the main issue of fraud charged against the defendant.

[3] As an affirmative defense it was alleged in the answer that plaintiff ratified the exchange in various ways, among them being by a settlement or agreement of compromise. Defendant contends that in order to sustain the judgment there must be a specific finding that there was no such compromise. This objection may be dismissed with the statement that the trial court, in its findings, did specifically negative the very wording of the allegation itself. The ultimate fact alleged was the ratification, and the court found that there was no ratification. It was unnecessary to further find on each reason upon which the defendant claimed the ratification was predicated.

[4] The question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings on the main issue of fraud is one we are not permitted to inquire into, under the well-determined rule, because of the conflict of proof on the essential elements constituting the fraud. Appellant has quoted testimony extensively in its brief for the purpose of showing that the representations plaintiff claims were made by the selling agents of the defendant were not in fact made, and that whatever was said by them was mere matter of opinion and stated as such. But, in view of the positive testimony given on the part of the plaintiff that the representations were made, it is evident that the testimony quoted by appellant merely raises a conflict, and under such circumstances we are not at liberty to interfere with the findings of the trial court. The question of whether the statements were expressions of opinion was likewise one for the trial court. In Stockton v. Hind (Cal. App.) 196 Pac. 122, it is said:

"Where there is any doubt as to whether or not a representation was intended and understood as a mere expression of opinion or a statement of fact, the question is one not of law but of fact for the court or jury. 20 Cyc. 15, et seq.; Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 395, 92 Pac. 1011; 14 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 36."

This conflict in the evidence was first passed upon by a jury and then by the trial court. Both found adversely to the defendant. In that state of the record the decision of the trial court must prevail.

[5] The defendant, we think, is not in a position to complain about the value of the land as fixed by the court, for the reason that the defendant conceded the land to be worth no more than $2,500, which would be less than $16 per acre, whereas the court allowed $28.75 per acre. By what method the court arrived at this figure is immaterial, so long as the amount fixed was within the limits of the evidence. There was evidence received to the effect that the land was hilly and inaccessible, with no road at all to the property; that there were only two or three acres "on top of the hill" fitted for agriculture; that the soil was "gravelly and rocky" with some clay land; that the only timber on the place was a small quantity of "scrub oak"; and that the rest of the land was practically covered with "buck" and "chamise" brush, and that the whole property was worth no more than $5 per acre. From this evidence it would appear that the value fixed by the court was liberal.

Defendant has also made the points that the wrong party has been sued, and that the court erred in its rulings on the admissibility of proof. We have examined those points, and find that they are without support in the record. Equally untenable is the objection that the jury arrived at the amount of its verdict illegally. The jury was an advisory one. Its verdict was not binding upon the court, and so far as the judgment in the action is concerned it makes no difference what system the jury adopted in arriving at its verdict.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

57 Cal. App. 399

PEOPLE v. RYAN. (Cr. No. 610.) (District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 20, 1922.) Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge. William Ryan was convicted of assault with intent to commit murder, and he appeals. Affirmed. Thomas J. Horan, of Vallejo, and L. R. Jacobson, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. The defendant was charged in an information filed by the district attorney of Sacramento county with the crime of assault with intent to murder one W. R. Cook, a deputy sheriff of said county. He was regularly tried and convicted, he moved for a new trial, which was denied, and has appealed from said order and the judgment sentencing him to the penitentiary. There has been no appearance for him in this court, but we have examined the record and find that he was fairly tried and justly convicted. The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

JANSSON v. NATIONAL S. S. CO.
(S. F. 9611.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 26, 1922.)

1. Exceptions, bill of ☞51—No specific time for judge to act on bill of exceptions presented for settlement.

When once in the hands of the clerk for the judge or court, the law does not specifically declare the time within which the judge must act upon a proposed bill of exceptions presented for settlement.

2. New trial ☞93—Delay of judge in settling bill of exceptions cannot be attributed to moving party when he has complied with law in presenting it.

When Code Civ. Proc. § 650, regarding the preparation, service, and presentation for settlement of a proposed bill of exceptions, had in all respects been complied with, the delay of the judge in acting upon it cannot be attributed to the moving party for a new trial, or his attorney, and he should not be made to suffer by reason thereof; it being the duty of the movant to present the proposed bill and amendments.

3. Appeal and error ☞977(2) — Question of laches of movant for new trial in securing settlement of statement for trial court.

The question as to whether the moving party has been guilty of laches in securing a settlement of a statement on motion for new trial is primarily a question for the trial court, and the appellate courts should not be called on originally to determine whether a movant has been derelict in securing the due diligence of such settlement.

4. Appeal and error ☞222—Failure to urge objection below deemed waiver.

Where a valid objection might have been interposed to a settlement of a bill of exceptions, on the ground that in securing it movant for new trial was guilty of laches, failure to urge it must be deemed a waiver.

5. Appeal and error ☞933(6)—On failure to pursue proper remedy to dismiss motion for new trial, time for settlement of bill of exceptions presumed properly extended.

Where, if movant for new trial was guilty of laches in presenting bill of exceptions for settlement, plaintiff's proper remedy was by application to the trial court to dismiss the motion, if he fails to pursue it, it must be presumed by appellate court that the time for settlement was properly extended.

6. Appeal and error ☞933(6)—Bill of exceptions on motion for new trial presumed either given or waived where record silent as to notice of settlement.

Where the action of the trial court in settling a bill of exceptions on motion for new trial was attacked on the ground that plaintiff was not notified by the clerk of the time designated by the judge for settlement of the bill, the absence from the record that such notice was not given justified the presumption that it was either given or waived.

7. Appeal and error ☞1072—Hearing of motion for new trial before bill of exceptions settled where issue understood by counsel and court immaterial.

Where a bill of exceptions had been approved and was on file at the date of making an order for new trial, the hearing thereon before settlement of bill of exceptions at most was a mere irregularity, and in no way injurious to plaintiff, the issue being perfectly understood by both counsel and court as to the grounds of the motion.

8. Negligence ☞136(9) — Question for jury though evidence is not conflicting.

Negligence is a question of fact for the jury, even where there is no conflict in the evidence, as reasonable men might differ as to whether or not the facts constitute negligence.

9. Negligence ☞136(9) — Question for jury where different conclusions can be drawn from evidence.

The fact that a party has a right to have his theory of the case presented to the jury in the form of an instruction provided there is evidence to support it does not justify the court in giving instructions that certain facts constitute negligence where different conclusions can be necessarily drawn from the evidence.

10. New trial ☞40(4)—Instruction constituting error at law, ground for new trial, although not objected to.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 647, where instructions were improperly given, it constituted an error which could be made the ground for a new trial under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 7, and reviewed by appellate court upon appeal from the order granting it, although no objection was made below.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by Hjalmar A. Jansson against the National Steamship Company. From an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Cavitt, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHURTLEFF, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff, upon which verdict a judgment was entered; thereafter defendant moved for a new trial, which was granted, and it is from such order that this appeal is prosecuted.

The facts are as follows: On the date of the accident resulting in the injury complained of plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant as a member of the crew of a steamer which was discharging a cargo of lumber at the Army street wharf, in San Francisco. When unloading, it was the duty of plaintiff to make up piles of lumber from such cargo. These piles were made up on deck in a wire sling, which sling plaintiff would attach to a hook suspended from the gaff of the vessel, and it would then be hoisted by a steam winch above the deck and clear of the vessel, and ashore. Attached to the gaff was a guy rope, by which the gaff could be stopped at the proper place, and the contents of the sling unloaded, and thereafter "dragged" back aboard ship. At the time of the accident the crew of the steamer had just finished their accustomed 3 o'clock coffee, and were returning to their work of unloading the vessel, which work had been temporarily suspended. Plaintiff was near the rail on the inshore or starboard side of the steamer. A sling load of lumber, which had been prepared by other members of the crew on the port side of the vessel, was hoisted over the plaintiff's head. The guy rope, usually in charge of the second officer, had been attached to a cleat on what is termed a "sampson post" at the time he left to have his coffee, and he had not returned to his post when the sling in question was lifted from the deck of the steamer. The sling load of lumber was stopped in its course inshore by reason of the guy rope being thus fastened to the cleat, with the result that two heavy planks slipped from the sling and fell to the deck, striking and breaking plaintiff's leg.

In due time, after the entry of judgment, the defendant moved for a new trial upon several grounds, but those relied upon were:

(1) "Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. (2) The verdict is against law. (3) Errors in law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the defendant."

The motion also stated that said grounds specified "will be made upon a statement of the case to be hereafter prepared, served and allowed, settled and filed as is provided by law." Plaintiff presents the preliminary objections that no statement on motion for new trial had been prepared, settled, and filed at the time the motion for a new trial was heard by the trial court, and that the statement subsequently settled and filed was of no legal efficacy, because, at the time it was so settled and filed, due to the laches of defendant, the court was without jurisdiction to settle the same. We think, however, that the record establishes that each of these contentions is lacking in merit.

There is no claim that defendant's notice of intention to move for a new trial was not served in time. Section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure, when the proceedings under review were initiated, provided, and in that respect it was not changed by the amendment of 1915, that a party desiring a bill of exceptions could at any time, within "ten days after the entry of judgment, if the action was tried with a jury, * * * or such further time as the court in which the action is pending, or a judge thereof, may allow, prepare the draft of a bill, and serve the same, or a copy thereof, upon the adverse party." Stats. 1911, p. 400; Stats. 1915, p. 207. The record discloses that the defendant's time to serve its proposed bill of exceptions was properly extended to March 29, 1915, and that a copy thereof was served upon plaintiff prior to the expiration of such extension; that thereafter, on April 30, 1915, plaintiff served on defendant a copy of his proposed amendments to defendant's proposed bill; that on May 8, 1915, and within time, defendant notified plaintiff that it rejected the latter's amendments, and that on said day the proposed bill and amendments were presented to the court for settlement. It therefore definitely appears that the defendant in all respects complied with the law in the preparation, service, and presentation for settlement of his proposed bill of exceptions.

[1, 2] When once in the hands of the clerk for the judge or court, the law does not specifically declare the time within which the judge must act upon it. The delay of the judge, if any, in settling the bill of exceptions, cannot, under circumstances such as are present here, be attributed to the moving party or his attorney, and he should not be made to suffer by reason thereof. It is the duty of the moving party to present the proposed bill and amendments (Doon v. Tesh, 131 Cal. 406-409, 63 Pac. 764), and that is exactly what was done here.

[3-5] Moreover, as said by the District Court of Appeal, from which this case was transferred to this court, in its opinion (35 Cal. App. Dec. 883, 884) affirming the order appealed from, and which language we adopt as a correct expression of the rule:

"The question as to whether the moving party has been guilty of laches in securing a settlement of a statement on motion for a new trial is primarily a question for the trial court. Appellate courts should not be called on originally to determine whether a movant has been derelict in securing with due diligence such settlement. Curtin v. Ingle, 155 Cal. 53. Here there is nothing in the record to show that any objection was ever made in the court below to the settlement of the bill on this ground. Even if a valid objection might have been interposed, the failure to urge the same must be deemed a waiver. Sheppard v. Sheppard, 15 Cal. App. 614. Plaintiff's proper remedy, if defendant was guilty of laches, was by application to the trial court to dismiss the motion for a new trial for want of prosecution. No such motion having been made, it must be presumed by this court that the time for settlement was properly extended. Churchill v. Flournoy, 127 Cal. 355."

[6] We find no merit in plaintiff's claim that defendant was guilty of laches. Equally untenable is the contention that the bill of exceptions was never settled, allowed, and approved as required by law. The record recites that this was done on June 7, 1917, but plaintiff attacks such action of the judge upon the ground that he (plaintiff) was not notified by the clerk of the time designated by the judge for the settlement of the bill. We find nothing in the record indicating that such notice was not given, and such absence justifies the presumption that it was either given or waived.

It is true that the bill of exceptions recites that the plaintiff objected to its settlement, or the settlement or allowance of "any statement on motion for new trial," but the enumerated objections do not include the one now relied upon by plaintiff, namely, want of notice of the date upon which the judge would settle the bill. The record is silent concerning the nature or contents of plaintiff's proposed amendments; nowhere therein are they set forth; so far as appears, all of them may have been allowed and incorporated in the bill; we have no means of determining from the record that such is not the fact.

[7] Plaintiff makes the further objection to the order under review that the motion resulting in the same was heard before the bill of exceptions was settled. But, inasmuch as the bill had been approved and was on file at the date of the making of the order, such hearing at most was a mere irregularity, and in no way injurious to plaintiff. As said by the appellate court in its opinion already alluded to (35 Cal. App. Dec. 884):

"The issue was perfectly understood both by counsel and the court as to the grounds of the motion."

The error of law occurring at the trial mainly relied upon by defendant consists of the giving of three instructions, which it contends, and the learned judge of the trial court declared, were erroneous and prejudicial. It is unnecessary to state these instructions in their entirety. They were in substance and effect that, if the jury found the facts, as previously stated herein, and which were practically without contradiction, to be true, their verdict should be for the plaintiff. Referring to these instructions, the trial judge, after stating that he was reluctant to give them, correctly said:

"If they do not expressly hold and direct that the certain acts of defendant therein detailed constitute negligence, they certainly do so by necessary implication. Whether these acts did constitute negligence was the very question involved in the case, and that was for the jury to pass upon. The instructions, by characterizing as negligence the acts mentioned, took from the jury that question."

[8, 9] Quoting again from the opinion of the appellate court, which we also adopt as a correct statement of the law and its application to the facts appearing here:

"It has been frequently declared by the appellate courts of this state that negligence is a question of fact for the jury even where there is no conflict in the evidence, as reasonable men might differ as to whether or not the facts constituted negligence. Wahlgren v. Market St. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 656; Carlson v. Cucamonga Water Co., 7 Cal. App. 382; Burr v. United Railroads, 163 Cal. 663; Kimic v. San Jose, Los Gatos, etc., Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 379. Appellants seek to uphold the giving of the instructions upon the ground that they set forth his theory of the case. The fact that he had the right to have his theory of the case presented to the jury in the form of an instruction, provided there is evidence to support it, does not justify a court in giving instructions that certain facts constitute negligence where, as here, different conclusions can be rationally drawn from the evidence."

While we express no opinion one way or the other touching the fact, yet it must be conceded that, even though the evidence is substantially without conflict, reasonable men might differ as to whether or not it showed the plaintiff was himself guilty of contributory negligence, which was one of the issues raised by the answer.

[10] Plaintiff makes the point that defendant, having failed to object to said instructions, was precluded from doing so on motion for a new trial. The Code of Civil Procedure (section 647) provides that—

"Giving an instruction, although no objection to such instruction was made, * * * (is) deemed to have been excepted to."

If the instructions in question were improperly given, it constituted an error at law, which could be made, as it is here, the ground for a new trial (Code Civ. Proc. subd. 7, § 657), and reviewed by this court upon an appeal from the order granting the same.

The order is affirmed.

POULTRY PRODUCERS OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA, Inc., v. BARLOW.
(L. A. 5774.)

1. Specific performance ⇨6—Not specifically enforced unless remedy is available to both parties.

A contract cannot be specifically enforced unless such remedy is available to both parties, under Civ. Code, § 3386.

2. Monopolies ⇨17(2) — Contract between corporation organized to market products of stockholders and stockholder held not to create an unlawful combination in restraint of trade.

A contract between a corporation organized by poultry producers for the co-operative marketing of their poultry, and a stockholder thereof, requiring the latter to sell all of his products to the corporation, and requiring the corporation to resell such products at the best prices obtainable, and pay over to the stockholder the proceeds after deducting therefrom the cost of transportation and an amount for selling costs to be determined by the corporation, held not to create an unlawful trust or combination in restraint of trade in contravention of the Cartwright Act (St. 1907, p. 984, § 1, subds. 3, 5), in view of the proviso thereto added by St. 1909, p. 593, making the act inapplicable to associations organized for the purpose of marketing the products of its members.

3. Contracts ⇨137(1)—Invalidity of provision of subscription contract held not to invalidate agreement of stockholder to sell all his products to the corporation.

Invalidity of provision of subscription contract between corporation organized by poultry producers for the purpose of marketing their products, and a poultry producer, giving the corporation the optional right to purchase its own stock from any of its shareholders, did not invalidate the stockholder's agreement to sell all of his products to the corporation, made in consideration of the corporation's promise to find a good market therefor and turn over the proceeds after deducting certain costs to the stockholder; the corporation's right to purchase its stock not being a part of the consideration for the stockholder's agreement to sell products to corporation.

4. Injunction ⇨60—Specific performance ⇨73—Contract for services requiring special knowledge, skill, or ability generally not specifically enforceable in suit therefor or to restrain breach.

With the exception of such special, unique, and extraordinary personal services as are within Civ. Code, § 3423, as amended by St. 1919, p. 328, and Code Civ. Proc. § 526, as amended by St. 1919, p. 325, a contract for services generally will not be specifically enforced either directly by means of a decree directing the defendant to perform it, or indirectly by injunction restraining him from violating it, especially where the relation between the parties is one of mutual confidence, and the contract stipulates for acts requiring special knowledge, skill, or ability, or the exercise of judgment, discretion, integrity, and like personal qualities, under Civ. Code, § 3390, subds. 1, 2.

5. Specific performance ⇨75—Contracts providing for succession of acts whose performance cannot be consummated by one transaction not specifically enforceable.

Equity will not decree the specific performance of contracts which by their terms stipulate for a succession of acts the performance of which cannot be consummated by one transaction, but will be continuous and require protracted supervision and direction.

6. Injunction ⇨59(1) — Specific performance ⇨68—Agreement by stockholder of co-operative marketing corporation to sell all his products to the corporation held not specifically enforceable.

Contract between co-operative marketing corporation and stockholder, requiring the stockholder to sell all his products to the corporation and the latter to use its best efforts to resell at the best prices obtainable and pay over the proceeds less certain costs to the former, will not be enforced either by injunction or by specific performance decree at the instance of the corporation, since Civ. Code, § 3386, requires mutuality of remedy, and an injunction will not be granted to prevent breach of contract under section 3423, subd. 5, unless performance of the contract can be specifically enforced, and since the obligation of the corporation calls for service involving the exercise of judgment and discretion and a repose of confidence, and involves a continuous supervision, requiring special knowledge, skill, and judgment, cannot be specifically enforced.

7. Specific performance ⇨6—Want of mutuality in right to specific performance removed by special performance by party who seeks specific performance.

A want of mutuality in the right to specific performance existing at the inception of the contract, precluding specific performance under Civ. Code, § 3386, is removed when there has been a full and substantial performance of the contract by the party who seeks specific performance.

8. Specific performance ⇨6—Defendant's refusal to perform does not make contract enforceable against him, where there is want of mutuality of remedy.

Where a contract cannot be specifically enforced against the defendant because of such nature that defendant could not compel the plaintiff to perform it, the defendant's refusal to perform his part of the contract does not make the contract specifically enforceable against the defendant.

9. Specific performance ⇨6—Plaintiff's willingness to perform what otherwise he could not be required to perform does not entitle him to specific performance as against defendant.

Plaintiff's offer and willingness to do what otherwise he could not be specifically required to do does not confer upon him the right to specific performance against defendant, where the contract is not specifically enforceable because of a want of mutuality of remedy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by the Poultry Producers of Southern California, Incorporated, against L. F. Barlow. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

F. R. Baker, Marshal Stimson, and Noel Edwards, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Oliver B. Wyman, of San Francisco, amicus curiae.

Willis I. Morrison, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Aaron Sapiro, Milton D. Sapiro, and Lawrence L. Levy, all of San Francisco, amici curiae.

SLOANE, J. The plaintiff is a corporation organized by poultrymen of Southern California for co-operative effort in marketing their products. The stockholders of the corporation are all producers, holding one share of stock each for every 1,000 hens owned. Each stockholder is obligated, under what is termed a produce sale agreement, to sell all eggs produced from his poultry through the corporation. In this action plaintiff recovered judgment in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles against the defendant, one of the contracting stockholders, for $230, stipulated damages for breach of contract by reason of sale of eggs to other purchasers, and for specific performance of the contract to sell and deliver eggs to plaintiff during the unexpired term covered by the contract, and enjoining defendant from making sales of his product to other persons. Defendant appealed.

A hearing was granted before this court on respondent's petition therefor after judgment of reversal by the District Court of Appeal. The latter court affirmed the judgment of the trial court for recovery of damages, but granted a reversal as to injunction and specific performance. In taking the matter over for rehearing we were in accord with the part of the decision affirming the judgment for damages, but were not satisfied at the time that plaintiff was not also entitled to the equitable relief by injunction and specific performance. On further consideration of this part of the judgment we have reached a conclusion in accord with that of the District Court of Appeal.

[1] Both of these remedies are subject to the same limitation. Neither can be enforced unless there is mutuality of remedy between the parties. It is provided by section 3425 of the Civil Code that an injunction cannot be granted restraining the violation of contract, "the performance of which would not be specifically enforced," and the doctrine is elementary and impregnably fortified by authority that a contract cannot be specifically enforced unless this remedy is available to both parties. Equity will not enforce a specific performance of a contract when the party asking its enforcement cannot, from the nature of the obligation assumed, be compelled to perform on his part.

While there is, perhaps, nothing in the obligation assumed by the defendant under the contract in question which binds him to sell and deliver to plaintiff all the eggs produced from his poultry during a given period of time that could not be specifically enforced, if it were a simple sale for cash to be paid on delivery, a different condition is presented when the reciprocal obligation of the plaintiff calls for a future performance, and consists of the exercise of personal skill, diligence, and discretion in finding the best market for the eggs, selling them for a suitable price, and paying to the defendant a certain percentage of the proceeds, and where the transaction is to be repeated at frequent intervals throughout a number of years.

So far as this marketing contract is concerned, it is, on the part of the plaintiff, a contract of agency calling for services of the corporation of a highly personal nature, requiring the exercise of skill and discretion, and covering repeated transactions to extend over a number of years. It has not been the practice of courts of equity to attempt to enforce such complicated personal obligations, or to burden themselves with the supervision of frequently recurring duties of contracting parties.

We adopt the following exhaustive opinion, written by Mr. Justice Finlayson of the District Court of Appeal, as fully covering the facts and the law of this case:

"In addition to damages for breach of contract, plaintiff, by the auxiliary force of an injunction, seeks to prevent the further breach of that provision of defendant's contract whereby he expressly undertakes to sell to plaintiff such of the eggs produced by his poultry during the years 1917, 1918, and 1919 as he intends to sell in any event. The breach complained of is that, since about May 17, 1917, defendant has sold to others than plaintiff all the eggs produced by his flocks. The action was tried January 11, 1918, and judgment, which passed for plaintiff, was entered March 11, 1918. The lower court found that up to the date of the commencement of the action, plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $230 by reason of defendant's failure to sell and deliver eggs to it exclusively. It was adjudged that plaintiff recover that sum as damages, and likewise that defendant be enjoined from marketing, delivering, or selling to any one other than plaintiff, during the remainder of the calendar year 1918 and all of the calendar year 1919, any of the eggs produced by his flocks, and which he intended in any event to sell or market. From this judgment defendant appeals. The appeal is on the judgment roll alone. Plaintiff, a California corporation, was organized in December, 1916, for the purpose of promoting the raising of poultry and the production of eggs in Southern California, through and by means of co-operative methods that had been suggested by the state market director. To that end defendant, and a number of others engaged in raising poultry in Southern California, executed a document bearing the caption 'Subscription Agreement,' whereby they agreed that a corporation should be organized, to be known as the 'Poultry Producers of Southern California, Inc.,' for the purpose of promoting and fostering the business of raising poultry and marketing eggs in the state of California. Each of the incorporators, one of whom was this defendant, subscribed for and agreed to purchase one share for every 1,000 hens owned by him. Defendant, whose flock did not exceed 1,000 hens, subscribed for one share. Pursuant to the agreement thus executed by defendant and the other poultrymen, plaintiff was brought into existence as a legal corporate entity. This 'Subscription Agreement' contains a provision whereby it is attempted to give to the corporation to be organized thereunder the right, at its option, to purchase its shares from any of its stockholders, at any time, at a price equal to the current book value of the shares.

"Contemporaneously with the execution of the so-called 'Subscription Agreement,' and as a part of the entire contract, defendant and the other poultry raisers each executed a second document entitled 'Produce Sale Agreement,' whereby defendant and his co-operating fellow poultry raisers undertook to sell and deliver their eggs to plaintiff, upon the latter's organization as a going concern. So far as its terms are material here, the 'Produce Sale Agreement' so executed by defendant is as follows: 'This agreement, made as of the first day of February, 1917, between the Poultry Producers of Southern California, Inc., a California corporation, to be incorporated, with its office at Los Angeles, California, hereinafter called the buyer, first party, and the undersigned [the defendant], hereinafter called the seller, second party: Witnesseth that: In consideration of the mutual obligations herein and of the agreements by each of the parties hereto and of the agreement of all the original subscribers to stock in said 'Buyer' corporation, the buyer agrees to purchase and market and the seller agrees to sell and to deliver to the buyer—for the price to be secured by the buyer as hereinafter mentioned—such of the eggs produced by the seller, his lessors, assignors or successors, during the years 1917, 1918 and 1919, as he intends to sell or market in any event. The buyer agrees to use its best efforts to resell said eggs at the best prices obtainable under market conditions, and, after deducting therefrom the seller's cost of transportation and an amount for selling costs (to be determined by the buyer, in its sole and exclusive discretion), not to exceed two cents per dozen eggs, to pay over the amounts received thereby as payment in full to the seller. * * * The eggs delivered by the seller hereunder may be mingled and sold with other eggs of like grade and like quality purchased by the buyer under contracts similar to this contract, and the amount to be paid to the seller weekly, as herein stated, shall be based on the proportional value in eggs delivered by him to the buyer out of the total weekly receipts of moneys from the sale or other disposition of the eggs according to quality and grade, less the deductions hereinabove mentioned. At the discretion of the board of directors the buyer may itself purchase from seller eggs of a quality satisfactory to itself at a price equal to the net price to seller under this contract, which eggs it may warehouse and sell at such future time as the board of directors may direct, without making further accounting to seller therefor. * * * This agreement shall be binding upon the seller for the full term hereof, and he shall be obligated hereby for all eggs produced for him whether he produces the same directly or lets or leases or in any way exercises ownership or control or has the legal right to so exercise ownership or control of said egg production during the term of this contract.'

"Appellant contends: (1) That the contract evidenced by the two documents signed by him—the Subscription Agreement and the Produce Sale Agreement—is void and unenforceable, because: (a) It violates the act commonly known as the Cartwright Law (Stats. 1907, p. 984, and Stats. 1909, p. 593); (b) it gives to the corporation to be created under the Subscription Agreement the optional right to purchase its own stock from its stockholders. And (2) For lack of mutuality of remedy, and other reasons which we deem unnecessary to mention in view of our conclusion, defendant's agreement to sell his eggs to plaintiff is not one that will be specifically enforced.

[2] "1. We see no reason for holding that the contract creates an unlawful trust or combination in restraint of trade in contravention of the Cartwright Act. Appellant contends that the contract violates subdivisions 3 and 5 of section 1 of that act. It may be assumed, for the purpose of this decision only, that the contract would be contrary to subdivisions 3 and 5 of section 1, but for the proviso that was added in 1909 reading: 'Provided that no agreement, combination or association shall be deemed to be unlawful or within the provisions of this act, the object and business of which are to conduct its operations at a reasonable profit or to market at a reasonable profit those products which cannot otherwise be so marketed, provided further, that it shall not be deemed to be unlawful, or within the provisions of this act, for persons * * * engaged in the business of selling * * * commodities of a similar or like character, to employ, form [or] organize * * * any * * * corporation, having for its object or purpose the * * * marketing * * * of such commodities.' We think it fairly inferable from the findings that the object of the agreement executed by defendant and the other poultry raisers, as a result of which plaintiff was incorporated and organized, and the object and business of the combination or association thus formed were to market the poultry raisers' eggs at a reasonable profit; also that only by the formation of some such co-operative association, and the organization of a common sales agency, such as plaintiff, can their eggs be marketed at a reasonable profit. Moreover, it further appears from the trial court's findings that defendant and the other poultry raisers who signed similar agreements are persons engaged in the business of selling commodities of like character, to wit, eggs; that they organized plaintiff as a corporation entity and employed it as their common sales agency; and that plaintiff's object and purpose is the marketing of such eggs. Thus is the clause of the proviso of 1909, whereby certain agreements, combinations, and associations are recognized as lawful and are expressly declared not to be within the inhibitory provisions of the Cartwright Act.

[3] "2. It may be conceded that, as appellant contends, the clause in the Subscription Agreement purporting to give to the corporation to be formed thereunder the optional right to purchase its own stock from any of its shareholders, is illegal and void, and consequently unenforceable. See Schulte v. Boulevard Gardens, etc., Co., 164 Cal. 464, 129 Pac. 582, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 156, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1013. The defendant, as well as each of the other poultrymen who joined with him in the execution of the Subscription Agreement and the Produce Sale Agreement promised to do several things, one of which was to give to the corporation about to be incorporated and organized the optional right to purchase its own stock at any time that it elected so to do. The corporation was not obligated to buy its own shares. It could do so or not at its option. It is here seeking to recover damages for the breach of and to specifically enforce one only of several promises made by defendant—a promise that, considered by itself, is legal and valid. The exercise by the corporation of its optional right to purchase any of defendant's stock is no part of the consideration for any of the promises made by defendant. The option was intended for the benefit of the corporation, not defendant. Each of the valid promises made by defendant is supported by a legal consideration. Defendant's illegal and unenforceable promise to give to the corporation, when formed, the optional right to purchase any of his stock at any time after its issuance to him is not so mingled and bound with his other and valid promises that they cannot be separated. All of the consideration moving from the corporation to defendant for his legal promises is legal and valid. * * * If one gives a good and valid consideration, and thereupon another promises to do two things—one legal, and the other illegal—he shall be held to do that which is legal, unless the two are so mingled and bound together that they cannot be separated, in which case the whole promise is void.' Hanauer & Co. v. Gray, 25 Ark. 350, 99 Am. Dec. 226, citing Parsons on Contracts, 380. 'Where an agreement founded on a legal consideration contains several promises, or a promise to do several things, and a part only of the things to be done are illegal, the promises which can be separated, or the promise, so far as it can be separated, from the illegality, may be valid. The rule is that a lawful promise made for a lawful consideration is not invalid merely because an unlawful promise was made at the same time and for the same consideration, and this rule applies, although the invalidity is due to violation of a statutory provision, unless the statute expressly or by necessary implication declares the entire contract void.' 13 C. J. § 470, p. 512.

"For these reasons we are satisfied that the contract between plaintiff and defendant, the resultant of the Subscription Agreement and the Produce Sale Agreement executed by defendant and the other poultry raisers, and which plaintiff, upon its creation and organization, accepted as its own, was and is a valid contract in so far, at least, as plaintiff is here seeking its enforcement, and that plaintiff, therefore, is entitled to its damages for defendant's breach thereof. We think, however, that, for the reasons we are about to state, plaintiff is not entitled to a specific performance of defendant's unperformed obligation to sell and deliver eggs.

"3. Our Code expressly provides that an injunction cannot be granted to prevent the breach of a contract where its performance 'would not be specifically enforced.' Civ. Code, § 3423, subd. 5. But for this express statutory limitation upon the court's power to grant injunctive relief, it is possible that the part of the decree which enjoins defendant from selling eggs to others than plaintiff might be upheld, notwithstanding the lack of mutuality of remedy. For it appears to be the rule in some jurisdictions that where a contract confers on one party an exclusive right or privilege, a breach of the contract through conduct of the other party inconsistent with the exclusiveness of the right or privilege may be enjoined, subject to the general principle as to the inadequacy of the legal remedy for the breach, and it is immaterial that such inconsistent conduct is not prohibited by the express terms of the contract; also that, notwithstanding a lack of mutuality of remedy, it is possible to secure performance of the plaintiff's stipulations, indirectly, by making the injunction conditional on continued performance by him, and dissolving the injunction when a breach on his part appears. Pom. Eq. vol. 5, § 296, and volume 6, § 775; Standard Fashion Co. v. Siegel-Cooper Co., 157 N. Y. 60, 51 N. E. 408, 43 L. R. A. 854, 68 Am. St. Rep. 749. In this jurisdiction, however, the express statutory inhibition above referred to—subdivision 5 of section 3423 of the Civil Code—prohibits the granting of an injunction to prevent the breach of any contract, 'the performance of which would not be specifically enforced.' The result is that in this state the courts may not enter a conditional decree in order to avoid the effect of a lack of that mutuality of remedy which is an essential to the right to specific performance. Anderson v. Neal Institutes Co., 37 Cal. App. 174, 173 Pac. 779.

"It is elementary that mutuality of remedy is an indispensable prerequisite to the specific performance of a contract. The remedy must be mutual, as well as the obligation, and when the contract is of such a nature that it cannot be specifically enforced as to one of the parties, equity will not enforce it against the other. Cooper v. Pena, 21 Cal. 404; Stanton v. Singleton, 126 Cal. 657, 59 Pac. 146, 47 L. R. A. 334; L. A., etc., Development Co. v. Occidental Oil Co., 144 Cal. 528, 78 Pac. 25; Pacific, etc., Ry. Co. v. Campbell-Johnston, 153 Cal. 106, 94 Pac. 623. 'Neither party to an obligation can be compelled specifically to perform it, unless the other party thereto has performed, or is compellable specifically to perform, everything to which the former is entitled under the same obligation, either completely or nearly so, together with full compensation for any want of entire performance.' Civ. Code, § 3386.

[4] "With the exception of such special, unique, and extraordinary personal services as fall within the purview of the amendments of May 6, 1919 (St. 1919, pp. 328, 325) to sections 3423 of the Civil Code and 526 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the general rule is that a contract for service will not be specifically enforced, either directly by means of a decree directing the defendant to perform it, or indirectly by an injunction restraining him from violating it. Especially is this the rule where the relation between the parties to the contract is one of mutual confidence, and the contract stipulates for acts that require special knowledge, skill, or ability, or the exercise of judgment, discretion, integrity, and like personal qualities. This rule is codified in subdivisions 1 and 2 of section 3390 of our Civil Code.

"The rule that equity will not specifically enforce an obligation to render personal service has been assigned three distinct reasons for its existence. Some courts have based the rule upon the fact that it would be an invasion of one's statutory liberty to compel him to work for, or to remain in the personal service of, another. It would place him in a condition of involuntary servitude—a condition which the supreme law of the land declares shall not exist within the United States, or in any place subject to their jurisdiction. Another reason assigned for the rule, according to some of the authorities, is that, in view of the peculiar personal relation that results from a contract of service, it would be inexpedient, from the standpoint of public policy, to attempt to enforce such a contract specifically. It is said by the judges who base the rule upon this consideration of public policy that, where one of the contracting parties is to act as the confidential agent of the other, it is necessary, not only for the parties, but for the sake of society at large, that there should be entire harmony and a spirit of co-operation between the contracting parties. The third reason for the rule, as given by other authorities, is that it is inconvenient, or, as others express it, impossible, for a court of justice to conduct and supervise the operations incident to and requisite for the execution of a decree for the specific performance of a contract which involves the rendering of personal services. For a discussion of these three bases of the rule, see the note to H. W. Gossard Co. v. Crosby, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) pp. 1125 et seq.

[5] "Growing out of the last of the three enumerated reasons for the rule that equity will not specifically enforce a contract for services that are of a strictly personal nature is the cognate rule that courts of equity will not decree the specific performance of contracts which by their terms stipulate for a succession of acts whose performance cannot be consummated by one transaction, but will be continuous and require protracted supervision and direction. Stanton v. Singleton, supra, 126 Cal. 665, 59 Pac. 146, 47 L. R. A. 334; Pacific, etc., Ry. Co. v. Campbell-Johnston, supra; Crane v. Roach, 29 Cal. App. 587; Anderson v. Neal Institutes Co., supra. 'Courts of equity,' says the court in Pacific, etc., Ry. Co. v. Campbell-Johnston, supra, 153 Cal. 117, 94 Pac. 628, 'only decree specific performance where the subject-matter of the decree is capable of being embraced in one order and is immediately enforceable. It will not decree specific performance when the duty to be performed is a continuous one, extending possibly over a long period of time and which, in order that the performance may be made effectual, will necessarily require the constant personal supervision and oversight of it by the court.'

"Turning now to the contract in question here, and considering it in the light of the foregoing principles: By the terms of their contract, defendant agrees to 'sell and deliver' to plaintiff, and the latter 'agrees to purchase and market,' such of the eggs produced by defendant's poultry during the years 1917, 1918, and 1919 as he intends to sell or market in any event; and, further, plaintiff expressly agrees 'to use its best efforts to resell said eggs at the best prices obtainable under market conditions.' It is of prime importance to defendant, as one of the poultrymen for whom plaintiff is acting as sales agent—for that is practically what the relationship amounts to—that plaintiff should market the eggs at the times when and in the markets where the best possible prices can be obtained—in other words, that it should indeed exercise 'its best endeavors' in an honest effort to resell the eggs at the best market prices; for defendant and the other poultry owners for whom plaintiff has agreed to act are to receive for the eggs that they sell and deliver to plaintiff such sums as plaintiff, in its turn, may succeed in reselling the eggs for, less the expenses incurred by it for transportation and other necessary marketing and selling costs, not exceeding a maximum of two cents per dozen.

[6] "The exercise by plaintiff of 'its best efforts to resell the eggs at the best prices obtainable under market conditions' involves some degree of personal services, knowledge, judgment and skill, and a repose of confidence. Defendant's agreement to sell and deliver, and plaintiff's undertaking to use its best efforts to resell the eggs at the best prices obtainable under market conditions, is more than a mere contract of purchase and sale. Plaintiff has been made the common agent of all the subscribing poultry owners to perform the very services that they themselves would have had to do individually had they not created plaintiff as their common agent for the furtherance of their co-operative enterprise. That is, they themselves, individually, would have had to go into the most favorable markets, reasonably accessible to them as individuals, and there have sought the best obtainable prices. This personal service, involving the exercise of judgment and discretion, plaintiff has undertaken to perform for defendant and the other poultry raisers engaged with him in the co-operative marketing of eggs.

"Moreover, a decree of specific performance enforcing plaintiff's obligation to resell the eggs at the best prices obtainable during the years 1918 and 1919 would involve a continuous and long series of acts of supervision, requiring special knowledge, skill, and judgment, and repeated examinations and new directions by the court, and, as we have seen, a court of equity will not undertake to frame a decree for the specific performance of a contract the performance of which cannot be consummated by one transaction, but will be continuous and require protracted supervision and direction, with the exercise of special knowledge, skill, or judgment in such oversight.

"It is suggested that the rule that specific performance will not be decreed where such performance would require the constant supervision of the court is not an absolute rule, but one of discretion only, and therefore is not a limitation of the jurisdiction of the court; otherwise courts of chancery could not recognize an exception to the rule when considerations of public policy intervene, as, for example, where contracts have been made by railway companies obligating them to build side tracks, extensions, etc. This statement of the law appears to find support in some of the cases. See Standard Fashion Co. v. Siegel-Cooper Co., supra; 36 Cyc. 587; Brown v. Western Maryland R. Co., 84 W. Va. 271, 99 S. E. 457, 4 A. L. R. 523. Assuming, for the purposes of this decision only that the rule is not one that goes to the very jurisdiction of the court, as a court of equity, but that it is a rule of decision only, based upon considerations of convenience and judicial discretion, the rule, nevertheless, is one of those fixed principles of equity that have become established for the guidance of the court, and any departure therefrom, save where the convenience of the public would have been promoted, would amount to an abuse of the court's legal discretion. Rochester & K. F. Land Co. v. Roe, 8 App. Div. 360, 40 N. Y. Supp. 799, 805. We think it clear that, in the exercise of a judicial discretion, a court of equity should always decline to enforce specific performance where, as here, private interests only are involved, and the task of supervision, in order to see to it that plaintiff, in good faith, exercises its best judgment and skill in marketing the eggs for the highest possible prices, would impose upon the court a duty well-nigh impossible of performance.

"It is claimed by respondent that the general rule requiring mutuality of remedy is subject to the exception that when a party has substantially performed his part of the contract he may compel specific performance by the other party. In this regard our attention is called to the fact that the lower court found that plaintiff, shortly after its organization, in reliance upon defendant's contract and similar contracts executed by the other poultrymen, rented a large warehouse for a central distributing depot; that it entered into contracts obligating it to sell and deliver eggs to third persons during the year 1917, and that it expended considerable sums of money for the purposes of standardizing the egg product to be delivered by it.

[7] "Undoubtedly a want of mutuality in the right to specific performance, existing at the inception of a contract, may be removed, and is removed when there had been a full and substantial performance of the contract. And if the renting of the warehouse, the making of contracts for the resale of eggs during the year 1917, and the expenditure of moneys to standardize the egg products, could be said to constitute a substantial performance of plaintiff's agreement to use its best efforts to resell the eggs during the years 1917, 1918, and 1919 at the best obtainable prices, then plaintiff would be entitled to specific performance. The substantial execution by plaintiff of its obligation would give present mutuality to the contract, although in its inception it lacked it. Spires v.

Urbahn, 124 Cal. 110, 56 Pac. 794. But nothing less than a full or substantial performance of plaintiff's obligations can create the mutuality of remedy necessary to entitle it to specific performance against defendant. The rule is stated in section 3386 of the Civil Code, as follows: 'Neither party to an obligation can be compelled specifically to perform it, unless the other party thereto has performed, or is compellable specifically to perform, everything to which the former is entitled under the same obligation, either completely or nearly so, together with full compensation for any want of entire performance.' See, also, Pacific, etc., Ry. Co. v. Campbell-Johnston, supra, 153 Cal. 115 et seq., 94 Pac. 623. It is quite evident that plaintiff's obligation has neither been performed nor substantially performed, and that it is not compellable to perform everything to which defendant is entitled under his contract, either completely or nearly so. It is alleged in the complaint and found by the court that plaintiff 'has entered into contracts for the sale of eggs during the present calendar year'; i. e., the year 1917. There remained, therefore, two years during which plaintiff, according to the terms of its obligation, was obligated to use 'its best efforts to resell the eggs at the best prices obtainable under market conditions.' It does not appear that it had made any contract to resell the eggs during those years. The contract that it made for the resale of the 1917 egg product was made by it with a brokerage company. By this contract plaintiff employed the brokerage firm to sell eggs upon the market, during the year 1917, for the best prices obtainable, agreeing to pay a commission for such services. This contract, while it remained executory, was not even a partial performance of plaintiff's obligation. The brokerage company merely agreed to do for plaintiff what the latter had agreed with defendant and his fellow poultry raisers to do for them. Assuming, though by no means conceding, that plaintiff thus could delegate to the brokerage company authority to perform its obligation to exercise, from time to time and as necessary, its own judgment, or that of its directors or managing officials, in an honest endeavor to use its best efforts to resell the eggs at the highest market prices, still a large and very material part of plaintiff's obligation remained unperformed and unenforceable. When the complaint was filed on December 14, 1917, there still remained two years during which plaintiff was to resell defendant's eggs, and, to that end, use its best efforts to resell at the best prices obtainable in the markets of the state. The most that can be said is that plaintiff's obligation has been performed to a large extent, but it certainly cannot be said that it has performed or is compellable specifically to perform everything to which defendant is entitled, either completely or nearly so.

[8, 9] "Finally, it is suggested that plaintiff has performed its obligation as far as it can in view of defendant's refusal to deliver to it the eggs that he contracted to sell and deliver to plaintiff for resale by the latter. But neither the refusal of defendant to permit plaintiff to resell his eggs, nor plaintiff's willingness to do so, have any bearing on the applicability of the equitable principle that where there is no mutuality of remedy there can be no decree for specific performance. Every action for specific performance is based upon the refusal of a defendant to perform the terms of a contract which the plaintiff thinks equity should compel him to perform. So that a defendant's refusal to perform his part of the contract is of no moment so far as plaintiff's right to a decree of specific performance is concerned. Pacific, etc., Ry. Co. v. Campbell-Johnston Co., supra; Roy v. Pos, 60 Cal. Dec. 88, 92; Moore v. Tuohy, 142 Cal. 342, 75 Pac. 896; King v. Gildersleeve, 79 Cal. 504, 21 Pac. 961. Neither does the offer or willingness of the plaintiff to do what otherwise he could not be specifically required to do confer the right to compel it from the other party. If this were true, then in the present instance plaintiff, by offering and expressing a willingness to resell eggs delivered to it by defendant, and to use its best efforts to secure the best market prices therefor, could have demanded of defendant a sale and delivery to it of all eggs produced by defendant's hens during the unexpired term of the contract, and on defendant's refusal, and without its having performed any part of its contract for such balance of the term of the contract, but simply reiterating in its complaint its willingness to do so, could have demanded specific performance of defendant. The equitable doctrine, codified in section 3386 of the Civil Code, that the plaintiff is not entitled to a decree of specific performance unless he has performed or is compellable specifically to perform all or substantially all of his obligation, is not satisfied by a mere willingness, or offer, to perform. See Pacific, etc., Ry. Co. v. Campbell-Johnston, supra, 153 Cal. 116, 94 Pac. 623.

"It may be possible that if, before defendant breached his agreement, plaintiff had so altered its position that to deny it specific performance now would operate as a fraud upon it, equity would regard plaintiff's past performance as a substantial performance, and indirectly decree specific performance by defendant by enjoining him from selling his eggs to any one other than defendant. But the complaint does not allege, nor does the court find, any fact from which such fraud may be inferred. It is true it is alleged in the complaint and found by the court that, relying upon the contracts made by it with the defendant and the other poultry raisers, plaintiff entered into contracts with various persons for the future conduct of its business, including a contract whereby it rented a warehouse for a central distributing depot, etc., but the nature and extent of the obligations and liabilities thus incurred by plaintiff under these contracts with third persons are not disclosed; nor do the pleadings or findings vouchsafe any information as to the period during which such contracts are or were enforceable. Non constat but that the contracts thus entered into by plaintiff with such third persons covered a period that has wholly expired before the action was commenced, or even before defendant breached its contract. There is nothing to show that the obligations incurred by plaintiff under these contracts with third persons will become more onerous if defendant should fail specifically to perform his agreement to sell and deliver to plaintiff eggs during the years 1918 and 1919.

"Our conclusion is that the contract is valid, and that plaintiff is entitled to the damages which the trial court found were suffered by it by reason of defendant's breach, but that it is not entitled to specific performance, either directly or indirectly, by enjoining defendant from violating his agreement; and that, in so far as the judgment decrees specific performance, either directly or indirectly, it should be so modified as to omit those provisions. We also think that appellant is entitled to have the judgment thus modified, notwithstanding that the time during which he has been enjoined from selling eggs to others—the years 1918 and 1919—has expired. This is so because otherwise appellant would be deprived of his right to costs.

"The trial court found on all the issues presented by the pleadings. The rights of the respective parties are determinable from the findings, and a retrial is therefore unnecessary."

Were it not for the doctrine of mutuality of remedy as a prerequisite to the equitable relief here demanded, there would seem to be no good reason for denying respondent the more adequate relief that would be thus afforded to marketing corporations such as this, which are more or less dependent for their efficient maintenance and operation upon ability to specifically enforce the mutual obligations of their members. The individual stockholder thus contracting the delivery of his wares would seem to be adequately safeguarded by his legal remedy for damages.

But in view of the established rule requiring mutuality of relief in equity, parties situated as is the respondent here will have to safeguard themselves as best they can by resort to their legal remedy in damages.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment on the findings conformable with the views herein expressed.

1. Habeas corpus §92(3)—Scope of inquiry.

In a proceeding in habeas corpus to obtain release from custody under a judgment of contempt, the only inquiry that can be made is with reference to the jurisdiction of the court which made the judgment of which the imprisonment is a part.

2. Habeas corpus §94—Question of jurisdiction determined by record.

The question of jurisdiction must be determined by the record in the case, and, if jurisdiction is thereby shown, extrinsic evidence cannot be allowed to contradict it.

3. Contempt §54(6)—Filing of affidavit with clerk unnecessary to give court jurisdiction.

The superior court has jurisdiction to proceed in a matter of contempt committed out of Application of Mary M. Selowsky for a writ of habeas corpus, directed to the sheriff of Napa County, to secure the release of petitioner from custody under a judgment of contempt. Writ denied.

See, also, 186 Pac. 608.

D. M. Duffy, of Napa, for petitioner.

Clarence N. Riggins, Dist. Atty., of Napa, for respondent.

SHAW, C. J. Application is made herein for a writ of habeas corpus, in order to release from custody Mary M. Selowsky. The ground of the petition is that the judgment of contempt upon which she is imprisoned is void.

[1, 2] In a proceeding in habeas corpus in a case of this character, the only inquiry that can be made is with reference to the jurisdiction of the court which made the judgment of which the imprisonment is a part. Ex parte Joutsen, 154 Cal. 544, 98 Pac. 391; 1 Bailey on Jur. § 311. The question of jurisdiction must be determined by the record in the case, and if jurisdiction is thereby shown, extrinsic evidence cannot be allowed to contradict it. 1 Bailey on Jur. § 526. The judgment in the present case was a judgment convicting Mrs. Selowsky of contempt of court for a violation of a previous judgment of the court enjoining her from maintaining a nuisance on certain premises in Napa county.

The contempt charged against Mrs. Selowsky was committed out of the presence of the court. The point of objection to the judgment of contempt arises from the contention that at the time of the proceedings leading up to that judgment no affidavit stating the facts constituting the contempt had been filed in the superior court. The facts relating to this subject are as follows: On April 17, 1922, the district attorney of Napa county presented to the superior court of that county his verified petition, supported by an affidavit, adequately stating the facts which constituted the contempt of which Mrs. Selowsky was finally adjudged guilty. Thereupon the court made an order directing her to appear and show cause on April 24, 1922, why she should not be punished for such contempt. This order, with copies of the petition and affidavit, so presented to the court, were duly served on Mrs. Selowsky on April 17, 1922. On the 24th the parties appeared in court, and the hearing was continued to May 16, 1922, on which day, the parties all being present, the evidence was heard relating to the matter and the case was submitted to the court for decision. In the meantime it appears that the affidavit and petition in which the order to show cause was issued had not been marked "Filed" by the clerk of said court. The order to show cause, together with the copies of the affidavit and petition of the district attorney, were delivered to the sheriff on April 17, 1922, for service, and at the same time, in some manner, he obtained possession of the original affidavit and petition of the district attorney. Thereafter the originals remained in his possession until June 12, 1922. On that day the said original petition and affidavit were marked "Filed" by the clerk of the court as of that day, and at that time the court pronounced its judgment and sentence in the matter of the contempt, adjudging said Selowsky guilty and imposing a fine of $1,000 and imprisonment of six months in the county jail.

[3] The contention of Mrs. Selowsky is that the superior court has no jurisdiction to proceed in a matter of contempt committed out of its presence unless and until an affidavit charging the contempt in question is filed with the clerk of said court.

[4] We are of the opinion that this point is not well taken. The proceeding was not a prosecution for a criminal contempt under section 166 of the Penal Code, but a "special proceeding of a civil nature," under title 5, part 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure (sections 1209-1222). While it is frequently described as quasi criminal in opinions on the subject, the procedure to be followed is that prescribed in the Code of Civil Procedure, and the mode by which the court obtains jurisdiction is that which is given in section 1211, as follows:

"When the contempt is not committed in the immediate view and presence of the court, or judge at chambers, an affidavit shall be presented to the court or judge, of the facts constituting the contempt, or a statement of the facts by the referees or arbitrators, or other judicial officer."

No other or different proceeding is necessary to set the power of the court in motion in such a case. Therefore, when the district attorney presented to the court the affidavit stating the facts constituting the contempt, the jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter at once attached, and when the order to show cause was thereafter made and service was made by delivering copies of the order and affidavit to the accused, the court thereby obtained jurisdiction of the person. The Code does not require that the affidavit shall be filed, or shall be so marked by the clerk, either as a condition precedent to obtaining jurisdiction, or as a condition necessary to retain it. His failure to do so, or the failure of the court or the district attorney to deliver it to him to be filed, could not divest the court of jurisdiction to proceed. These acts were purely ministerial, and ministerial misprisions after jurisdiction has been obtained are mere irregularities of procedure and are not fatal to the jurisdiction of the court or to the validity of its orders or judgments. The only part of the record to be looked to is that part which relates to the acquisition of jurisdiction. Irregularities in procedure thereafter and prior to the judgment do not affect or divest the jurisdiction after it has attached. The record on that subject in this case shows that all the steps necessary to give the court jurisdiction to pronounce the judgment were regularly taken. The judgment of contempt is therefore valid regardless of the failure to have the affidavit filed until the day on which the judgment was rendered.

The remarks in Ex parte Williams, 183 Cal. 11, 190 Pac. 163, were, of course, made with reference to the requirements of the Penal Code as to the procedure in the prosecution of misdemeanors in police courts. That Code at least implies that the complaint against the accused person must be filed with the court before it can proceed in such a case. The decision, of course, can have no application to a special proceeding of a civil nature under section 1211, Code of Civil Procedure. The statement in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal in Metzler v. Superior Court, 201 Pac. 142, to the effect that the "filing of an affidavit" in such a case is necessary to a valid judgment, was made with reference to the case there presented where no affidavit had been presented, or even made, and where the court had issued the order to show cause solely upon information obtained from the testimony of witnesses in a case pending before it. The question of the necessity for filing was not before the court. The statement means no more than that there must be an affidavit and that such order cannot be issued upon oral testimony. There are no decisions to the effect that the court cannot proceed unless the affidavit is first filed. No other objection to the validity of the judgment is worthy of mention.

The petition for a writ of habeas corpus is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by the First Federal Trust Company, executor, against the Howard Investment Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Charles W. Slack, F. A. Denicke, and H. S. Young, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

A. E. Shaw and Cushing & Cushing, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This action was brought to recover $8,375, being one-half of a sum paid by the defendant Howard Investment Company to one Frederick P. Howard, ostensibly as a salary for his services as president of the corporation.

The original plaintiff was Mrs. Emma Shafter Howard, who subsequently died, and the suit was thereafter prosecuted in the name of the present plaintiff, First Federal Trust Company, her executor.

Plaintiff's cause of action rests upon the claim that the payments in question were wrongfully made by the Howard Investment Company from a fund in which the original plaintiff, Mrs. Howard, owned a half interest.

Judgment in the trial court was for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. The matter is before us upon an order for hearing after judgment of reversal in the District Court of Appeal.

The facts necessary to an understanding of the case are that Mrs. Howard was the wife of Charles Webb Howard, whom she survived. In his lifetime Charles Webb Howard organized the defendant corporation, Howard Investment Company, taking in his own name 4,995 shares of the capital stock of 5,000 shares at the par value of $100 per share. The remaining five shares were issued for the purpose of qualifying directors of the corporation, but were indorsed over so that the entire beneficial interest in the corporation was in Charles Webb Howard. In consideration for the stock Mr. Howard conveyed to the corporation property valued at $500,000. Subsequently Charles Webb Howard created a trust wherein he transferred the 4,995 shares of stock of the Howard Investment Company to the Central Trust Company, the predecessor of the defendant Anglo-California Trust Company, in trust for the distribution of the net dividends for purposes not here necessary to set forth, other than it was provided that, after his death, while the trust should exist, there should be paid from the balance of the dividends from said stock the sum of $250 per month to his son, Frederick Paxson Howard, with the proviso that—

"Such payments to Frederick Paxson Howard, personally and while living, shall be and constitute, when received by him, a waiver of all compensation for any and all services which, as an officer or otherwise, he personally may, from time to time, render to said Howard Investment Company."

After the death of Charles Webb Howard on July 17, 1908, his widow Mrs. Emma Shafter Howard, was appointed administratrix of his estate, and instituted various actions affecting the status of the Howard Investment Company stock and the trust under which it was held. Particularly, as most intimately affecting the proceeding before us, Mrs. Howard in her individual right brought suit against these defendants and all others interested in the Howard Investment Company, and under the trust, to have an adjudication that all of the property conveyed to the Investment Company for its stock was community property of herself and husband, and adjudging that she was the owner of one-half thereof, and entitled to one-half of the capital stock of said corporation, and of the dividends therefrom, subsequent to her husband's death. She recovered judgment in the superior court sustaining her claim and directing a transfer to her of one-half of said 4,995 shares of stock. The defendant appealed, but pending such appeal an agreement was reached by all the parties in interest by which said judgment in Mrs. Howard's favor became final, and a settlement of all litigation was effected whereby Mrs. Howard transferred her half of the corporate stock to the trustee corporation, and received in consideration therefor a conveyance from the Howard Investment Company of "one-half of its property and assets of every nature, kind and description, after proper deductions made for * * * its current indebtedness and its attorneys' fees incurred to date."

It is not questioned that under this settlement it was determined that the property of Charles Webb Howard, which was invested in the Howard corporation, was community property, and that upon the death of her husband Mrs. Howard become entitled to one-half of the stock issued to her husband, and that, by virtue of the settlement subsequently made, on the surrender and transfer of this stock she became the owner of a one-half interest in all the property and assets of the corporation. Up to the date of this settlement and transfer Mrs. Howard's interest in the corporation was that of a stockholder, and subject to the necessary and proper expenditures of the corporation for its operating expenses.

On the consummation of the settlement of April 2, 1914, Mrs. Howard in acknowledgment thereof executed to the defendants a release of all claims and demands, which recites that she thereby does "remise, release, and forever discharge" the parties, including the parties to this action, and others, naming them, from "all manner of action and actions, cause and causes of actions, suits, debts, dues, sums of money, accounts, reckonings" and liabilities of every kind, which she ever had, now has, or hereafter "can, shall, or may have by virtue of any matter or thing whatsoever from the beginning of the world to the date of these presents."

It was subsequent to this settlement and release that Mrs. Howard instituted the present suit. It is predicated upon transactions growing out of the protracted litigation prior to the final settlement and release.

Upon the death of Charles Webb Howard in 1908 and the commencement of legal proceedings attacking the validity of the trust in favor of F. P. Howard and others, the distribution of dividends under the trust was discontinued. In consideration of an agreement by Mrs. Howard not to tie up the affairs of the Howard Investment Company by an application for an injunction and the appointment of a receiver, the investment company and the trustee company stipulated with Mrs. Howard, as testified by witnesses and found by the trial court, that pending the litigation none of the property would be disposed of, no dividends declared, no payments would be made to the trustee or dividends distributed until all of the litigation commenced by Mrs. Howard involving the title to said property should be settled and determined, and that, if she should be successful in the litigation, they would account to her for all the property and income, and that no payments would be authorized by the investment company except the necessary current expenses incurred in conserving the property and incidentally to maintain the control thereof. That these expenses were intended to include legitimate salaries to officers and employees is apparent from the fact that no exception was taken to the payment of other salaries than that to F. P. Howard.

This agreement stopped all payments of dividends to Frederick P. Howard under the trust. After his father's death in July, 1908, he was elected president of the Howard Investment Company, and served without salary until October, 1908. During that month, and in consequence of the agreement to suspend distribution of the corporation's dividends under the trust, and pending the litigation, the board of directors of the Howard Investment Company adopted the following resolution:

"On motion duly made and seconded, and unanimously carried, the following preamble and resolution was adopted:

"Whereas, Mr. F. P. Howard, president of this company, has been devoting his time to the affairs of this company, and for such time and attention no compensation has been paid him:

"Now, therefore, be it resolved, that said F. P. Howard, as president of this company, be paid a salary of $250 per month, commencing with the 1st day of October, 1908; and

"Be it further resolved, that the Central Trust Company of California be notified that the said F. P. Howard is receiving a salary of $250 per month for services rendered to the company, and that from and after October 1, 1908, any dividends which may be due him under that certain trust agreement made and executed by the late Charles Webb Howard, be retained, in accordance with the provisions made therein, by which should said F. P. Howard receive a salary for services rendered, said salary shall be in lieu of dividends that he might receive from the Central Trust Company under the aforesaid trust agreement."

Pursuant to this resolution the investment company paid to Frederick P. Howard, who continued as its president, the sum of $250 per month from October 1, 1908, to May 1, 1914, about the date of the final settlement of all pending controversies over the estate. The total sum thus paid to Frederick P. Howard was $16,750, and it was for the recovery of one-half of this amount that this action was brought by Mrs. Howard.

The theory upon which the action was maintained, and judgment for plaintiff given by the trial court, was that the money was actually paid in pursuance of the trust from money one-half of which belonged to Mrs. Howard and that her half of the amount thus paid out should have been accounted for to her under the terms of the final settlement, and that she failed to demand and receive such sum because the alleged fact that it had been paid out in lieu of dividends was unknown to and had been concealed from her.

Such are the facts upon which the judgment appealed from rests.

It is contended by defendants that the undisputed facts defeat a recovery by plaintiff, and that the facts found essential to sustain the judgment are not supported by the evidence. It is quite evident that plaintiff's cause of action depends primarily upon whether the money sought to be recovered was paid as salary or dividends. During the period in which these payments of $250 per month were being made to F. P. Howard, Mrs. Emma Shafter Howard's relation to the property and stock of the Howard Investment Company consisted in her right, as the widow of Charles Webb Howard, to succeed to one-half interest in the 4,995 shares of the company's stock held by her husband as community property and the dividends therefrom accruing after her husband's death. If the money paid to F. P. Howard during this period was legitimately paid as a salary, it was part of the current expenses of the company, and infringed no right of Mrs. Howard. If it was paid as dividends, one-half of the amount belonged to Mrs. Howard, and she was entitled to recover it from whoever wrongfully misapplied it.

After the settlement was made, and before this suit was commenced, Mrs. Howard had reassigned her interest in the investment company's stock to the trust company, and had taken therefor an assignment of one-half of all the assets of the investment company. Her right then was to recover any property or money in the hands of either defendant which constituted assets of the investment company at the date of the transfer and settlement, waiving, for the present, any question of estoppel by reason of the instrument of full satisfaction and release executed at the time of the settlement. Whether this money paid to F. P. Howard, and which he had received to his own use, was paid from the general funds of the investment company as salary, or from money declared as dividends for the benefit of the trust, we are unable to see how it could longer be assets of the investment company. But, assuming the right of Mrs. Howard to recover such money if wrongfully paid from her share of the property, the burden is upon her to show that this money was dividends, and not salary. We do not understand that it is disputed that the Howard Investment Company had the right to pay F. P. Howard, as president of the company, a salary. If it had such right, and exercised it in good faith, the plaintiff was not injured, for the reason that during such period Mrs. Howard's rights to profits of the business were those of a stockholder, and subject to the reasonable operating expenses of the company. Indeed, there would be no doubt of estoppel, by her release, to complain of such payments, because it is conceded that Mrs. Howard and her attorneys were aware almost from the beginning that what they assumed to be a salary of $250 per month was being paid to F. P. Howard as president of the Investment Company.

Plaintiff's right of recovery, then, rests upon the sufficiency of proof that the payments made to F. P. Howard were dividends, and not salary, and that Mrs. Howard was deceived and misled by the conduct or declarations of the defendants in assuming that the payments were for salary. We find no evidence in the record to sustain either of these propositions. The only fact pointed out upon which the plaintiff professes to rely as proof that these payments were dividends in the disguise of salary is contained in the recital of the resolution providing for these monthly payments that "said salary shall be in lieu of dividends" under the trust. Such oral testimony as was given on the subject was precisely in line with this resolution.

Appellants attach an unwarranted significance to this recital. Used as it was in connection with the preceding provisions that "F. P. Howard, as president of this company, be paid a salary of $250 per month," and notice to the trustee that dividends thereafter should not be paid, it can only be construed to mean that he should not also be entitled to the trust payment from the dividends, but that such salary should also satisfy the claim under the trust, or, in the words used, be "in lieu" thereof. As the declaration of trust provided that the dividend allowance when received should be in lieu of salary, so the salary resolution provided that the salary, when received, should be in lieu of dividends. Any less precaution on the part of the investment company in providing for this salary during the time when the dividend payments were discontinued would have been inexcusable. Without some such condition in the resolution F. P. Howard would have been entitled, after receiving this salary, to subsequently demand his dividends from the trust when it again commenced to function. This is what is decided, and all that is decided, in the case of Howard v. Anglo-California Trust Co., 34 Cal. App. 164, 167 Pac. 177, an action in which Frederick Paxson Howard attempted to recover from the trustee of the trust here involved the amount of his dividend allowance accumulated during the period the salary was paid and the trust tied up by Mrs. Howard's litigation. It was there held that, in receiving the salary under the conditions stated in the resolution granting it, he had waived his right to trust dividends during the period of such salary; that, while, in the absence of such proviso, he would have been entitled to both salary and dividends, his acceptance of the salary under the terms specified estopped him from collecting under the trust. It will be observed that the trust proviso did not prohibit him from collecting his allowance thereunder if he received a salary, but prevented his receiving a salary while he was paid under the trust, and it was only this reservation in the salary resolution that prevented his collecting both. The expression of the Court of Appeal on this point is as follows:

"We are of the opinion that the trial court rightly resolved this question in favor of the respondents. It is true that, under the peculiar wording of the proviso in the trust instrument above set forth, the plaintiff cannot be held to have waived any right which he might otherwise have to receive compensation for his services as an officer of the Howard Investment Company until such time as he had actually received the payments coming to him as a beneficiary of said trust; and had the Howard Investment Company voted to pay and paid the plaintiff said salary during the period when he was not receiving the monthly payments due him as such beneficiary, without the limitations attending the allowance and receipt of such salary in the foregoing resolution, the plaintiff's right of recovery in this action would have been unassailable. But such was not the case; and while it is true that the original trustee and the individual respondents herein were not parties to the contract contained in the resolution providing for the payment of a salary to plaintiff as president of the Howard Investment Company, yet the interrelation of the parties was such that said resolution cannot be otherwise construed than as intended to substitute the monthly salary which the plaintiff was to receive thereunder for the monthly sum he was otherwise entitled to receive, but was not as yet receiving, from the trustee, and that when plaintiff undertook to perform the duties of president of the Howard Investment Company for the monthly salary to be allowed him under the limited terms of said resolution, he must be understood to have agreed to waive his right to receive his monthly stipend from the trustee while such salary was being paid, and, in view of the interrelation of the parties, it must also be held that this was a waiver made expressly for the direct benefit of the trustee and of the other ultimate beneficiaries of the funds and properties of the trust."

This decision does not hold that the payments made by the investment company were dividends, and not salary, but that they were salary, in place of dividends; and, if the reservation had not been made, F. P. Howard would have recovered salary plus dividends. It therefore appears that there was nothing in the relation of the defendants to the manner of payment of the $250 per month which made the transaction different from that which the plaintiff all along supposed it to be, the payment of a salary. The fact that it also precluded any further payment of trust dividends certainly did not operate to Mrs. Howard's disadvantage.

Moreover, there is nothing to indicate that there was any misrepresentation or concealment to prevent plaintiff from ascertaining the precise state of the matter. The resolution was spread on the minutes of the corporation, the payments were carried on the corporation books as part of the expense account, and Mrs. Howard and her representatives had or could have had access to these records at any time. They knew of the salary, they knew of the conditions of the declaration of trust regarding waiver of salary while payments were made under the trust, and were reasonably put upon inquiry to inform themselves as to the state of the matter, at least before entering into a general release of all claims and demands against the defendants.

That the salary agreement was entered into in good faith, and not as a subterfuge, can scarcely be questioned, as one of plaintiff's attorneys was a director of and attorney for the investment company when the salary resolution was adopted, and advised as to its legality and fairness, and there is no evidence that F. P. Howard, as president of this corporation, operating under a half million dollars capital, was not entitled to pay for his services during this long period when he was deprived of his income from the trust. The declaration of trust, it will be recalled, only made the payment of the dividend allowance a waiver of the right to a salary, when the trust fund was being received by him.

Even if it might be surmised that the position of president of this corporation was a sinecure, and carried with it no duties or responsibilities calling for remuneration, and that this salary arrangement was a pure gratuity to protect F. P. Howard from the loss of his trust income, we can indulge in no such presumption under the evidence. As already pointed out, all the evidence on this subject indicates that the services rendered were in good faith and considered by the directors of the corporation worth to the corporation the amount paid.

The stipulation between the parties to preserve the assets of the investment company in statu quo during the pendency of the litigation provided for a continuance of payments for the current operating expenses necessary for the conservation of the corporation's business and property, and that this was intended to include salaries is evidenced by the continual acquiescence of the plaintiff in the payment of this and other amounts, as salaries, with full knowledge that the payments were being made. Plaintiff's demand here is only alleged on the theory that what was thought to be a payment of salary was discovered later on to have been an advancement of dividends.

In the light of the undisputed facts, we conclude there was no foundation for the finding of the trial court that the money in question was not paid in good faith as a salary, or that it was intended as an advancement of dividends under the trust.

As already stated, and in the absence of any evidence of fraud, or mutual mistake of the parties, there is also strong reason for holding the plaintiff estopped from reviving her claims against the defendants after the complete agreement of release and satisfaction entered into on the consummation of the contract of settlement, even though it had appeared that there had been a misapplication of some of the funds in which Mrs. Howard was interested. This money paid to F. P. Howard was part of the accounts of the investment company which entered into the determination of its available assets at the time of the settlement. It was taken into consideration in making the division agreed upon, and it may be inferred that the settlement would not have been reached, if, at the time, the investment company's right to have credit for this salary payment had been disputed. There is no claim for rescission here, and no offer to place the defendants in status quo, as a condition of this further demand.

There are other questions presented on this appeal, but, in view of our conclusion that the plaintiff has established no cause of action, it is unnecessary to consider them.

The judgment is reversed.

FRANCES INV. CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR IMPERIAL COUNTY
et al. (L. A. 6387.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 10, 1922.)

1. Records §9(3)—Object of Torrens system of registration is to establish reasonable record title to land.

The obvious purpose of the Torrens Land Act is to establish a merchantable record title to land in the true owner, and to enable the registration of every tract in such a way that all interests therein may be disclosed by the certificate, and wide powers are therein expressly granted to determine collateral issues as preliminary to establishing a title subject to registration.

2. Records §9(4)—Court acquires jurisdiction to adjudicate title under Torrens Act, though applicant is not owner of fee.

Though the Torrens Land Act provides that no estate less than a fee simple shall be registered unless the fee is first registered, it is not essential to give the court jurisdiction to register a title that the applicant for such registration be the owner of the fee, but it is sufficient if the facts pleaded are such that, when determined by the decree of the court, they establish title in fee in some one or other of the claimants.

3. Records §9(8)—Court can require pleadings in Torrens proceedings to cover every proper issue.

The objection to jurisdiction of the court in proceedings under the Torrens Land Act to determine the claim that a trust deed was procured by fraud, on the ground that fraud was not adequately pleaded, is not substantial, since the court, under the expressed and implied powers given in such proceeding, has authority to require pleadings adequate to cover any issue proper to be tried.

4. Records ☞9(5)—Court has jurisdiction in Torrens proceedings to adjudicate that trust deed was procured by fraud.

In proceedings for the registration of a title under the Torrens Land Act, a court has jurisdiction to adjudicate the issue raised by the applicant for registration that a trust deed against the land was procured by fraud, since the act broadly authorizes the ascertainment of the title to the land and the issuance of a certificate to the owner thereof, and is not limited to the ascertainment of the record title.

5. Statutes ☞115(2)—Title of Torrens Land Act includes jurisdiction to adjudicate issue of fraud.

The title to the Torrens Land Act, which is "An act for the certification of land titles and the simplicity of the transfer of real estate," is sufficiently broad to include the provisions of the act authorizing the ascertainment of the true title to the land, though such provisions are construed to include authority to adjudicate a claim that a trust deed affecting the land was procured by fraud.

6. Records ☞9(5)—Principle that a court of equity will give full relief may be applied in Torrens proceedings.

Though a proceeding for registration of title under the Torrens Land Act is a special proceeding, it is a proceeding in the superior court, which is the ordinary trial tribunal, in which the pleadings and practice are similar to ordinary civil actions, and the principle that a court of equity, having acquired jurisdiction for a particular purpose, will administer full relief between the parties can be applied by the court in such proceedings.

7. Records ☞9(5)—Provision registration decree quiets title against the world requires adjudication of claims of fraud.

The provisions of the Torrens Land Act, §§ 14 and 16, stating what is to be covered by the decree ordering registration, and providing that the decree forever quiets title to the land ordered registered, and is final and conclusive as against all persons requires the court, in proceedings for the registration of such title, to adjudicate the claim by one of the parties that a trust deed upon the land was secured by fraud.

In Bank.

Application by the Frances Investment Company, a corporation, for a writ of prohibition, prayed to be directed to the Superior Court in and for Imperial County, and to Phil D. Swing, as judge thereof, to restrain respondent from proceeding in an action for registration of title. Writ denied.

Wm. Story, Jr., of Salt Lake City, Utah, and Lissner, Lewinsohn & Barnhill, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Joe Crail and Julius V. Patrosso, both of Los Angeles (Walter Kibbey, of El Centro, amicus curiæ), for respondents.

SLOANE, J. This matter comes to us on petition for rehearing upon an order of the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, denying an original application of petitioner for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court of Imperial county from trying the validity of a trust deed in a Torrens land proceeding.

In the application for registration of title in the land proceeding, Walter P. Downey and Nellie E. Downey claimed title in fee to the premises, subject only to a trust deed which they had given to third parties to secure their promissory note. They are seeking in the land title proceeding to rescind and set aside this trust deed on the ground that it was procured by fraud, and to have title in fee certified in themselves, freed from this adverse evidence of title.

The sole question presented on this hearing is that of jurisdiction of the superior court under the Torrens Act (St. 1897, p. 138) to adjudicate as well as to ascertain and certify real estate titles. Petitioner concedes authority in the court under this procedure to quiet title to real estate by removing clouds therefrom and determining adverse claims, but disputes jurisdiction to establish title by judicial decree in one who has no title at the time of filing his petition for registration, but only an actionable right to such title. The opinion of the court of appeal in this case upholding such jurisdiction is without precedent in this state, and apparently goes further than the decisions in other states in construing similar statutes, but we find its argument convincing.

[1] The obvious purpose of the act is to establish a merchantable record title to land in the true owner, and to enable the registration of every tract in such a way that all interests therein may be disclosed by the certificate. The title of the act is:

"An act for the certification of land titles and the simplification of the transfer of real estate."

To attain this end in all cases it must frequently be necessary to determine adverse claims, either in such proceeding or by resorting to an independent action. Wide powers are expressly granted under the act to determine collateral issues as preliminary to establishing a title subject to registration, and it is insisted that the powers conferred are sufficiently in the nature of a proceeding in equity to empower the court entering upon the investigation to grant complete relief.

It is provided that—

"All land may be brought under the operation of this act by the owner or owners of any estate or interest therein, whether legal or equitable."

Petitioner insists that the claimants in this case had no estate whatever; that their estate became vested in the grantee under the trust deed, and that, conceding the transfer to have been obtained by fraud, all the interest the claimants have is an equitable remedy to avoid the transfer.

Waiving the doctrine affirmed in Warren Co. v. All Persons, 153 Cal. 771, 96 Pac. 807, that under a trust deed the legal title to land is conveyed solely for purposes of security, and that a legal title is left in the trustor as against all persons excepting the trustees and those claiming under them, may it not be true that even the right to a decree revesting title in the trustor, or for the enforcement of any other right which would vest a legal title, may be maintained in this proceeding? Suppose, for instance, the holder of a record title obtained by fraud should be the petitioner for registration of title in his name under the Torrens Act. Surely the person entitled to the rescission of such fraudulent conveyance could come in and assert his rights and have them adjudicated in such a way as to restore his title and have it certified.

So far as jurisdiction is involved, no greater power would be invoked if the owner of the equitable right to title by rescission was the moving party in the petition for certification under the act. The act especially provides for the registration of titles by prescription. Would not the same trial of independent claims of ownership be involved where in such a proceeding the claimant by adverse possession is opposed by one holding an apparent title of record? The act provides for notice to all parties in interest, and that "all persons who claim an interest may appear and object to the granting of the application"; that "the court shall set the petition down for hearing upon notice to all persons who have appeared as is required in other civil actions and shall proceed to determine the title to all the land described in the petition and of all persons who may have an interest therein * * * and shall make, give and enter a decree confirming the title of the person found to be the owner whether he be the applicant or any other person who may * * * ask to have his title registered," and that "upon the trial of any issue of fact raised by the verified pleading of any person claiming by such pleading to have an interest in * * * the land or appurtenances, such issue shall, upon demand of any party appearing, be submitted to a jury in the same manner and to the same extent as such issue can, under general law and the Constitution of the state, be submitted to a jury trial, * * * and * * * the verdict * * * shall have the same force and effect as is provided by general law upon the submission of like issues to a jury." Stats. 1915, p. 1932.

The act contains many other provisions for determining and certifying various estates, liens, and incumbrances incident to land titles "in such a manner as to show their relative priority, all particular estates, mortgages, easements, liens, attachments and other incumbrances," and that "a decree of the court ordering registration shall be in the nature of a decree in rem, shall forever quiet the title to the land therein ordered registered and shall be final and conclusive as against the rights of all persons, known and unknown, to assert any estate, interest, claim, lien or demand of any kind or nature whatsoever, against the land so ordered registered." It is also declared that "this act shall be construed liberally so far as may be necessary for the purpose of effecting its general intent."

[2] Petitioner calls attention to the requirements that "no mortgage, lien, charge or lesser estate than a fee simple shall be registered unless the fee simple to the same land is first registered." It is true that a fee simple title must be established before a certificate of registration may be decreed, but it will be remembered that the existence of a fee-simple title is not required in the applicant at the time of filing his petition, but that the owners of any estate or interest, whether legal or equitable, may petition, and that it is sufficient to institute proceedings "if it appears to the court from its examination of an abstract or from the report of the examiner, or from the petition, where no abstract is required, that the title to the land described in the application appears to be substantially as alleged." In other words, it is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction if the facts pleaded are such that when determined by the decree of the court they establish title in fee in some one or another of the claimants.

Petitioner in its final reply brief cites Matter of Application of Wasson (Cal. App.) 201 Pac. 793, as the latest pronouncement of the courts of California construing this law. The question presented here was not involved in that case, and it contains nothing repugnant to the jurisdiction here invoked. The opinion holds that—

"The applicant for initial registration of title, as a title in fee, must produce proof that he is possessed of such title, either by the production of a regular chain of conveyance from the general government, or by proof of the creation of a title by adverse possession, and evidence establishing title good as against the world is essential to warrant a decree awarding such registration."

This does not negative the proposition that the decree in the Torrens proceeding itself may determine such title under an inchoate right thereto as preliminary to granting registration.

[3] We are not seriously impressed with petitioner's objection that fraud is not adequately pleaded. We have no doubt that under the expressed and implied powers of the court in such proceeding there is authority for requiring pleadings adequate to cover any issue properly to be tried.

[4, 5] We agree with the District Court of Appeal that the superior court of Imperial county is not without jurisdiction to try the issue presented under the Torrens Land Act, and adopt and quote from the opinion of Mr. Justice Works of that court to supplement the views already herein stated, as follows:

"It is pointed out to us that the title of the law, contemplating, as it does, a 'certification of land titles,' is not broad enough to allow an inclusion in the measure of a grant of such jurisdiction as the respondents seek to exercise, but the suggestion does not impress us as being of great weight. The purpose of the act is to provide a machinery through which some title may be certified, and a part of that machinery consists in the determination by a court what title is to be certified. Said Mr. Justice Shaw in Robinson v. Kerrigan, 151 Cal. 40, in which case the constitutionality of the original Torrens law was settled: 'The object of the act is well stated in the title. It purports to establish a system for the registration of title to land, whereby the official certificate will always show the state of the title and the person in whom it is vested, and to provide that, after the original registration, transfers of the land may be made in the manner prescribed in detail in the act. As a foundation for the system, it is necessary to have the title established. To that end a proceeding is authorized whereby such title may be settled and declared by a decree of the superior court.' It appears, then, that in passing upon the question of jurisdiction presented by the controversy before us emphasis is not to be placed upon the word certification in the title of the law. The ascertainment of title, in a given proceeding, is a preliminary step to certification, and the question now is: What kind or nature of land titles had the people in mind in framing the title to the law they adopted? Had they in contemplation merely the record title or did they intend the actual right, to be determined from a consideration of all existing evidence on the subject and from which consideration there might spring a decree establishing actual title, or ownership? These questions are to be answered upon a construction of the body of the law. We are convinced that the title of the act is comprehensive enough to allow the certification of whatever kind or nature of land title the text of the act gives jurisdiction to ascertain and establish.

"The nature and extent of the jurisdiction conferred by Torrens Law, with especial reference to the question whether the exercise of that jurisdiction permits an inquiry into such matters as the respondents threaten to take cognizance of, must be ascertained by viewing from several standpoints the parts of the law which we have above marshaled. Let us first point out the various issues and controversies which may be presented for settlement in a Torrens proceeding under express provision of the law, for, if they may cover a wide range and lead to the consideration of questions of a varied and complex character, that fact will be in some degree persuasive of the construction in favor of respondents of the general language of the law under which the right to exercise the questioned jurisdiction is insisted upon. The act unquestionably confers the power to determine whether land sought to be brought under its operation is community property; to settle boundaries the location of which is disputed between the applicant and adjoining proprietors; to locate the lines of private ways, as well as those of streets and public ways generally; to ascertain, between the applicant and the state the lines of boundaries where their location is affected by the presence of navigable streams or by the flow of the tides in arms of the sea; and to determine whether a title has arisen by adverse possession. It is not necessary to draw particular attention to the range which litigation may take upon these matters. Suffice it to say that the questions of fact and law presented by some of them often lead to the consideration of as complex and different problems and as to as lengthy trials as are known to the administration of justice.

"In addition to these matters, pointed to directly by the provisions of the law, its text is burdened with words, phrases, and clauses showing an intent to confer jurisdiction of the most exhaustive and extensive character. The owner of any estate or interest in land, whether legal or equitable, may avail himself of the provisions of the act. The petition must show what interest in the land the applicant has or claims, what interest each occupant and any other person has or claims in law or equity, in possession, remainder, reversion or expectancy, and it must show all liens and incumbrances, whether recorded or not. An examiner of titles may be appointed by the court, but he is evidently intended to serve as a general referee if occasion demands, for he must be an attorney who has been under admission for five years and he is to examine into the title as well as to investigate all facts pertaining to the title which shall be brought to his notice. He is to file a written report together with his opinion as to the title. The court is not to be bound by the report but may require other or further proof. The 'notice' provided for is similar to a summons, the method of service, whether personal or by publication, is much the same as in the case of a summons and the time for appearance after service is the same. Verified pleadings are required from all parties. The notice must state that the applicant has filed a petition praying for a decree that he is the owner in fee of the land. All persons who claim an interest may appear and object to the application, or may assent in writing to registration. A Torrens proceeding is undoubtedly a special proceeding under the technical distinction provided by our law (County of Yuba v. North American C. G. M. Co., 12 Cal. App. 223, In re Scott, 182 Cal. 83, 187 Pac. 9); but it is worthy of note, especially as the law was framed and adopted under the initiative, where correct technical distinctions may not always be in mind, that the court must give notice of hearing as is required in other civil actions. Any issue of fact raised by any person claiming to have an interest in the land is, upon demand, to be tried by a jury. The decree shall state whether the owner of the land directed to be registered is married or unmarried, whether the owner is under disability, shall set forth the estate of the owner in the land and shall show the liens and charges against the land or the owner's estate therein. The registrar is to issue a certificate of title to each person declared by the decree to be the owner of any parcel of land in severalty, and the certificate must show that he is the owner of an estate in the land. In this recitation of significant terms used in the law, so striking as to require no comment further than that made at the head of this paragraph, we have omitted all reference to certain portions of section 14 and all of section 16 of this act, as they will receive attention below.

[6] "In some of the other states land courts, as they are termed, are created for the purpose of exercising the jurisdiction incident to the operation of the Torrens system. Under the California act, however, the jurisdiction is conferred upon the superior court, our ordinary trial tribunal. We have already pointed out that the course outlined for a Torrens proceeding is strikingly similar to that provided by general law for the ordinary civil action, from the filing of complaint to the rendition of judgment. Finding present the usual machinery for the conduct of a civil action, modified only in so far as the peculiar nature of a Torrens proceeding appears to require, noting that jurisdiction under the act is to be exercised by the superior court, it would not be unnatural to discover that the people intended that a Torrens decree should cut deep and should cover a wide field. It might reasonably be expected that such a law would provide for the settlement of all matters affecting land ownership instead of limiting jurisdiction to the ascertainment and certification only of record title. It may or may not be proper to consider jurisdiction under a Torrens law as jurisdiction in equity, but there is certainly great reason for the application under such law of the principle through which courts of equity, once obtaining jurisdiction of a given subject-matter, will administer complete relief in the premises. That principle has been held to apply to a Torrens proceeding (Lewis v. Chamberlain, 69 Or. 476, 139 Pac. 571), and there is internal evidence in our law that the people had the same idea in mind in adopting it. We refer to the provisions of section 17, under which a registration may occur in actions to quiet title or for partition and in probate proceedings. Having in specific terms provided that a Torrens proceeding may be merged into or engrafted upon an action to quiet title, are we not free to conclude that by general language, if general language of sufficient breadth may be found in the act, the people intended that all questions affecting actual title or ownership, should be merged into a Torrens proceeding? An act framed pursuant to such a purpose would lead to the issuance of a certificate of title worth having, one which would vouch to the world that the holder was the owner of the land described in it, that a merchantable title was vested in him. A statute framed without such an end in view would be of but scant value. It is to be remembered that the law, according to its title, is not purposed merely for the certification of land titles. It is also designed to provide for the simplification of the transfer of real estate, and no considerable simplification results in such transfers if after obtaining a decree of the superior court that he has title to property and obtaining a certificate to that effect, one who has resorted to the procedure sanctioned by the law is compelled afterward to contend for additional decrees to secure to him a title which a buyer would accept on the market.

[7] "We proceed now to a consideration of other features of the law. Under its terms the holder of a mortgage procured by fraud could without doubt, in a proceeding instituted by some other person to secure a registration of the fee-simple title, petition that his title under the mortgage be registered. It is equally free from doubt that one who has obtained the delivery of a deed through fraudulent practices may petition for a registration of the fee in him under it. It is clear that interested persons could present the issue of fraud against the mortgage in the one instance and against the deed in the other, as a bar to registration. In fact, they would be bound to present it or be forever precluded from litigating the question, for, under the provisions of section 16, a decree ordering registration forever quiets title and is final and conclusive against the world. These reflections demonstrate that jurisdiction is conferred by the law to rescind, or, at least, to deprive of legal effect, instruments procured by fraud. If that jurisdiction may be exercised in such instances as the two mentioned, why not in this instance?

"Although the foregoing arguments are most persuasive to our minds, so much so that we might safely base upon them a construction of the law favorable to the contentions of respondents, we have yet to notice certain provisions of section 14, stating what is to be covered by the decree ordering registration, and the provisions of section 16, announcing the force and effect to be ascribed to the decree. Under the first-named section the court is not only to determine the title to the land, but the title of all persons who may have any interest in it. It is also to determine whether the property is the separate or community property of the party found to be the owner, and it is to enter a decree confirming the title of the person found to be the owner, whether he be the applicant or any other person. After all that has been said, it seems a work of supererogation to more than state the language which we have so liberally italicized. Its broad and all-inclusive character is at once apparent. We may, however, call attention to the fact that the use of the word 'title' is always without qualification or limitation, a circumstance which is characteristic of the act generally. References to record title are not to be found in it. The significance of the continual use of the word 'owner' in section 14 is also evident, and that word is used as well throughout the act when reference is made to the person in whose favor the decree ordering registration is rendered. All of the foregoing considerations are brought to a climax in section 16. By its terms the decree is to forever quiet title to the land ordered registered and it is to be final and conclusive as against all persons, known and unknown. The Downeys are plainly entitled to litigate the matters presented in their application for registration and the respondents have jurisdiction over these matters."

The application for a peremptory writ of prohibition is denied.

HIND et al. v. OVERSEAS AGENCIES, Limited. (S. F. 9607.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 13, 1922.)

1. Sales ⇨415—In action for breach of contract to deliver in bond at dock, plaintiff must prove tariff duty and dock charges as part of difference between contract price and market value of replacement goods purchased.

In an action for breach of a contract to deliver rice at $6.95 per 100 pounds gross "ex dock San Francisco in bond," where plaintiffs purchased a like quantity and quality in the open market f. o. b. San Francisco at $10.25 and $11 per 100 pounds gross, the burden was on them, in order to recover more than nominal damages, to affirmatively establish, as part of the difference between the cost price under the contract and the market value of the substituted rice, if it was not purchased ex dock and in bond, the amount of the tariff duty and dock charges, which were included in the contract price, and these were not expenses to be pleaded and proved by defendant in mitigation of damages.

2. Appeal and error ⇨835(2)—Sufficiency of evidence to sustain finding considered, though raised only in supplemental brief on rehearing.

In an action for breach of a contract to deliver rice "ex dock" and "in bond," sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a finding that substituted rice purchased by plaintiffs f. o. b. was likewise purchased in bond will be considered, though such claim was made only in plaintiffs closing supplemental brief on rehearing, and there was no evidence from which the court could determine the application of the term "f. o. b." to payment of duty and dock charges.

3. Sales ⇨417—Contract to resell in bond held insufficient to justify inference that rice purchased f. o. b. to replace undelivered rice contracted for in bond was sold in bond subject to duty.

That rice purchased f. o. b. in place of undelivered rice contracted for "ex dock" and "in bond" was bought to fill the buyer's contract to resell in bond was insufficient to justify an inference that the substituted rice was purchased in bond subject to duty, even aside from the buyer's admissions that no rice in bond was available at such time, where the resale was made before the seller's breach; it being competent for the buyer to arrange after the breach for a delivery of the rice to his customer free of duty.

4. Appeal and error ⇨714(4)—Evidence ⇨16—Sales ⇨415—That charges covered by vendor under contract for delivery "f. o. b." include tariff duties must be proved by party alleging it.

While the court must take judicial cognizance that the letters "f. o. b." call for delivery to the purchaser free of charges for transportation, loading, etc., the burden is on the buyers, in an action for breach of a contract to deliver rice "ex dock" and "in bond," to show that a purchase of rice "f. o. b." to replace that undelivered was likewise subject to tariff duties, and the Supreme Court cannot take representations made on the final argument in proof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, F. O. B.]

5. Evidence ⇨129(6)—Contract relating to another transaction between parties to action for breach of contract to deliver properly excluded.

In an action for breach of a contract to deliver rice, the trial court properly excluded a contract relating to another and distinct transaction between the parties.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by George U. Hind and another, co-partners, doing business as Hind, Rolph & Co., against Overseas Agencies, Limited. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

I. F. Chapman, D. D. Hawkins, and Frank B. Austin, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ira S. Lillick and Norman A. Eisner, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. By a contract in writing, of date May 20, 1919, the defendant agreed to sell, and plaintiffs agreed to buy, certain rice, described as "2,000 small bags No. 1 Siam Usual Rice, type S3 at $6.95 per hundred pounds gross, ex dock San Francisco, in bond."

The defendant breached the contract June 25th by refusing to deliver the rice, and thereafter, within what the jury determined was a reasonable time, the plaintiffs proceeded to purchase a like quantity and quality of rice in the open market to take the place of the rice contracted for with defendant, and gave notice to defendant that they were about to make such purchase, and would hold the defendant responsible for any loss sustained in the transaction.

This substituted rice was purchased, 50 tons, or 1,000 bags of 100 pounds each, on the 27th of June, 1919, at $11 per 100 pounds gross, and 50 tons, or 1,000 bags, on the 7th of July, 1919, at $10.25 per 100 pounds gross.

Plaintiffs seek to recover in this action the sum of $7,350, the alleged excess which they were compelled to pay for the substituted rice. It is a conceded fact in the case that the terms "ex dock" and "in bond," used in the original contract, meant that the stipulated price of $6.95 per hundred was for rice on the dock and subject to wharfage charges, and subject to tariff duty. The cash payments to become due under this contract amounted to $13,900. What the amount of dockage and duty on the rice would be was not alleged in the complaint nor shown in evidence. The $7,350 sued for, therefore, represents the difference between the cash items of $21,250 for the substituted rice, and $13,900, the original contract purchase price, without taking into account the liability to be assumed by plaintiffs for dock charges and duty. The evidence, we think, is undisputed that the substituted purchase was made for rice f. o. b. San Francisco, which means free on board in San Francisco, and is claimed by defendant to be free from dock charges and duty. Assuming, for the time, that such is the proper interpretation of the evidence, the real issue presented is whether it was necessary for plaintiffs, as a condition of ascertaining their damages resulting from this breach of contract, to allege and prove the amount they would have had to pay on the original contract for duty and dock charges in addition to the stipulated cash payment. Judgment was for plaintiff in the trial court for the full demand of $7,350, and defendant appeals.

[1] There is no dispute between the parties as to the law of damages applicable to such a case. Respondents say in their opening brief:

"We agree with appellant's counsel that the damages in this case should be measured according to the principles laid down in sections 3308 and 3354, Civil Code, that is, the difference between the contract price, and the market value of rice of like grade and quality as the rice called for by the contract, in San Francisco, within a reasonable time after June 25, 1919."

Where the parties differ on this branch of the case is as to whether the charges to accrue as duty and dockage were a part of the contract price to be pleaded and proved by plaintiff, or were expenses which they were relieved from, through the failure of the contract, to be pleaded and proved by defendant, in mitigation of damages. Defendant did not itself plead these matters as an affirmative defense, but relies upon the failure of the plaintiffs to either plead or prove the necessary facts to show what the difference was between the contract price of the original purchase and the market value of the substituted rice.

It appears as conceded, that there was no rice of the quality involved to be purchased at or about the time of the breach of this contract "ex dock San Francisco, in bond," and therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to go into the market and substitute as nearly as they could the value of their original contract, but all they were entitled to recover in damages was enough to equalize the cost so that they would not be out of pocket by reason of having to buy elsewhere and under different conditions. They were not entitled to gain an advantage by reason of getting the substituted rice freed from liability for duty and dock charges.

For all that appears the difference in the price of this quality of rice "ex dock San Francisco, in bond," and as it was substituted, f. o. b. San Francisco, may have been largely accounted for by the saving made to plaintiffs in the substituted purchase by reason of buying free from duty and dock charges. The duty, at least, was a fixed charge which plaintiffs assumed and undertook to pay as part of the cost price under the contract.

As illustrated by appellant, if this contract had called for a stipulated cash price of $13,900, subject to lien of a chattel mortgage, and the substituted rice had been bought for $21,250, free of any lien, a measure of damage could not have been established until there had been pleaded and proved the amount of the lien, and it had been deducted from the $21,250 to establish the difference between the contract price and the subsequent purchase.

What the plaintiffs were entitled to under their contract was rice in bond at the dock. The equivalent thing which they were entitled to substitute was rice in bond at the dock at its then market value. It is an obvious proposition that the market value of rice subject to duty and that on which the duty has been paid will not be the same.

The burden is clearly upon plaintiffs to affirmatively establish the difference between the cost price of the rice under the contract, and the market value of the rice purchased as its equivalent, and the tariff duty and dock charges are a necessary element in that difference if the substituted rice was not purchased "ex dock" and "in bond."

The case of J. J. Moore & Co. v. J. S. Guerin & Co., 165 Cal. 534, 132 Pac. 1038, cited by respondents, is not in conflict with this conclusion. In that case the contract was to deliver coal at the ship's side at $8 a ton. On the breach of the contract by seller the buyer bought in the open market from local dealers at $12 a ton, which was the market price at that time. There was no coal to be had at the ship's side, though the evidence was that when coal was so obtained it was usually sold at about 75 cents less per ton than at the yards. There was no evidence, however, that the coal was of any more value to the buyer from being purchased at the yards. If it could have been shown that by getting coal from the yards, rather than from the ship's side, the buyer made a saving in transportation, for instance, the case would be in point, but so far as appears, delivery from the yards was no less expensive than from the ship.

Quite, a different situation, too, is presented in Rosenberger v. Pacific Coast Ry. Co., 111 Cal. 313, 43 Pac. 963. There the plaintiff sued for damages for wrongful discharge from an employment for a stated term. The measure of his damages under the recognized rule of law was his salary for the unexpired term. The burden was on the defendant to show, in mitigation of damages, that plaintiff might have obtained other employment.

In Humphrey v. Milling Co. (Cal. App.) 190 Pac. 489, the sale of the goods was f. o. b. Stockton, California. The court properly took evidence of the market value at Stockton in determining damages for failure of delivery. If the ultimate destination of the goods was Evansville, Ind., that was aside from the contract of purchase and sale, and we see no reason why the defendant could demand that the market price at Evansville should be the measure of his liability. If there were such reasons it would clearly be incumbent upon the defendant to set them up. The plaintiff's prima facie rights grew out of the contract of delivery f. o. b. at Stockton.

An examination of all of respondents' citations fails to disclose any authority relieving them from affirmatively showing all the elements going to measure the cost they were to incur in purchasing the rice under the contract as a necessary element in fixing their damages.

The evidence was sufficient to support the finding of the jury that there had been an unjustifiable breach of the contract by defendant, and plaintiffs were entitled to nominal damages in any event, but if the substituted rice was purchased free of duty and charges, the jury was not in a position to return the verdict it did, without knowing the amount of the duty and charges for which plaintiffs became liable under the contract.

[2] Some discussion is had as to whether it does not appear that the substituted purchase of rice was made "ex dock" and "in bond." This claim on the part of plaintiffs is only made in their closing supplemental brief on rehearing. The undisputed evidence was that this purchase was made f. o. b. San Francisco. As a matter of law this term carries the implication that the goods are sold free on board, but there is nothing in the record to enable the court to determine the application of the term to payment of duty and dock charges. 26 R. C. L., p. 745, and citations; Whitaker v. Dunlap-Morgan Co., (Cal. App.) 186 Pac. 181; Chandler Lumber Co. v. Radke, 136 Wis. 495, 118 N. W. 185, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 713. Moreover, in all the preceding arguments of counsel for appellant, it has been virtually conceded that the subsequent purchase was made without liability for tariff and wharfage charges. It is repeatedly stated in plaintiffs' briefs that there was no rice in bond procurable when the second purchase was made.

Only in respondents' supplemental brief on the hearing in this court is it suggested that the record shows that the rice, admittedly purchased f. o. b. San Francisco, was actually purchased in bond. Notwithstanding the inconsistency of this position with the theory on which the case was presented in the Court of Appeal and in this court on the argument, if the record discloses evidence sufficient to sustain a finding that the substituted rice like that contracted for was purchased "in bond," we see no reason why such belated discovery should not be given due consideration.

[3] Counsel for respondents apparently rely for support of this contention upon an inference which they seek to draw from the evidence showing that the rice which they contracted to buy "ex dock" and "in bond" on May 20th they contracted to sell to National Rice Mills "ex dock" and "in bond" on May 23d, and that the substituted rice was bought by them "to fill their contract" with National Rice Mills. To quote their argument they say:

"Notwithstanding the contentions of appellant the record plainly gives support to the verdict below. The contract between appellant and respondents under which the latter originally purchased the rice, provided for a sale in bond. The contract between respondents and the National Rice Mills, under which this rice was resold is also a sale 'in bond.'"

Obviously, the contract last referred to was intended to transfer to the National Rice Company the rice contracted for by plaintiffs, under precisely the conditions under which they bought it. But the resale was made before the breach of contract by defendant, at a time when they expected to be able to turn over the original purchase to their customers. Even without the admissions made in respondents' briefs that there was no rice in bond to be had at the time of the substituted purchase, there is nothing to justify an inference that because they originally contracted for rice ex dock and in bond, and contracted to sell on the same conditions, the rice, obtained over a month later f. o. b. San Francisco, was in bond, subject to duty, even though it was bought to fill such contract. We have no means of knowing what adjustment may have been made by plaintiffs with their customer regarding this sale and it was perfectly competent for them to have arranged for a delivery of the rice required, free of duty.

[4] While we must take judicial cognizance that the letters f. o. b. San Francisco call for a delivery to the purchaser free of charges for transportation, loading, etc., we are not advised by anything in the record as to the facts, or any citation as to the law whether such charges to be covered by the vendor include tariff duties. It is possible that evidence as to commercial custom in such matters might disclose that such a sale f. o. b. would still be subject to duty; but the burden is upon the plaintiffs to show it, and we cannot take representations made on the final argument in proof.

[5] As already indicated the record supports the right of plaintiffs to recover for a breach of contract. The trial court did not err in excluding contract No. 5191, relating to another and distinct transaction between the parties. The conditions arising out of that transaction could have no legitimate bearing upon the conduct of the defendant in repudiating the contract involved in this action. We find no error in the record other than as herein pointed out in relation to the measure of damages.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial to determine the question of fact as to whether the purchase of the rice to replace the original purchase was made ex dock and in bond, and if the purchase was so made, to give judgment for the plaintiffs as heretofore found by the verdict of the jury, and if made free of duty or dock charges, to ascertain the amount thereof and to reduce the amount of former judgment by the amount of such duty and dock charges.

POPP v. EXCHANGE BANK. (S. F. 9597.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 11, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error §1011(1)—Findings on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Where there is a conflict in the evidence, the Supreme Court will not disturb the finding of fact touching which the conflict exists.

2. Corporations §474—Evidence held to sustain finding wife as well as husband to secure note delivered corporate bonds belonging to children to bank with representation that they belonged to her.

In an action by a guardian against a bank to recover possession of corporate bonds, the property of minor children of a husband and wife whose note was secured by pledge of the bonds, evidence held to sustain a finding that the wife, as well as the husband, signed the note and participated in the delivery of the bonds to the bank, with the representation they belonged to the wife.

3. Banks and banking §150—Overdraft of joint account is binding debt regardless of who drew the checks.

Where a bank account stood in the joint names of the husband and the wife, an overdraft was the joint debt of both husband and wife, even though all of the checks except one or two had been drawn by the husband.

4. Bills and notes §94(1)—Antecedent debt is good consideration.

An existing debt is sufficient consideration for a note or other commercial instrument, whether the debt is an open account or one resting on an implied contract, or whether it is evidenced by an instrument of indebtedness which is surrendered for the new instrument.

5. Evidence §597—Testimony to best of witness' recollection supports finding.

Testimony by an officer of the bank to the best of his recollection supports a finding in accordance with the testimony, notwithstanding positive testimony to the contrary.

6. Corporations §474—Pledges of corporate bonds held bona fide holder for value.

Where corporate bonds were pledged by a husband to secure a note executed by himself and his wife to cover an overdraft of their joint account, the bank could rely on the husband's statement that the bonds were the property of his wife which she had received from an aunt back East, and became a bona fide holder of the bonds upon their pledge without the necessity of making any further investigation as to the ownership.

7. Corporations §474 — Names of minors written on margin of pledged bonds held not constructive notice of ownership.

Where corporate bonds payable to bearer were pledged to a bank to secure a note executed by a husband and wife, the fact that the names of the minor children of the parties were written on the margins of the bonds, even if it came to the attention of the officers of the bank, did not establish lack of good faith on the part of the bank from taking the bonds on the strength of the absolute representation by the husband that they belonged to his wife.

8. Bills and notes §337—Knowledge of facts putting on inquiry does not defeat good faith.

Mere knowledge of facts sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry, without actual knowledge, or mere suspicion of an infirmity or defect of title, does not prevent the transferee from being a holder in good faith unless the circumstances indicate that the failure to make inquiry arise from a suspicion that it would disclose a vice or defect in the instrument.

9. Corporations §472 — Bonds showing on face they are secured by mortgage are not negotiable.

Bonds issued by a corporation payable to bearer, but showing on their face that they are secured by a mortgage on real estate, were not negotiable under the law as it existed prior to 1915.

10. Corporations §473—Purchaser of non-negotiable bonds acquires only title of his seller.

Where the bonds of a corporation were nonnegotiable, a purchaser of them, even though he acted in good faith and paid value, acquired only the title of his seller.

11. Constitutional law §190—Statute cannot make previously issued instruments negotiable.

The act of August 8, 1915,¹ which was enacted after the issuance of corporate bonds which at the time of issuance were not negotiable, but before the transfer of the bonds in controversy, could not make the bonds negotiable.

ble, which would be in effect the making of a contract for the parties by the Legislature, though, if the bonds were negotiable when issued, their negotiation would depend upon the law in force at the time of indorsement.

12. Evidence 80(1)—Law of foreign state is presumed to be the same as domestic state.

In the absence of proof as to the law of a foreign state, it must be presumed to be the same as that of the state of the suit.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmett Seawell, Judge.

Action by Lenora S. Popp, as guardian of the persons and estates of Alida Newell Popp and another, against the Exchange Bank to recover possession of personal property. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Edward A. O'Brien and W. W. Bedford, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Wallace L. Ware and R. L. Thompson, both of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

SHURTLEFF, J. The plaintiff and appellant, as guardian of the persons and estates of Alida Newell Popp and Mary Elizabeth Popp, her minor children, brought this action against the defendant bank for the possession of three bonds of the Adirondack Electric Power Corporation, alleged to be the property of said minors, and wrongfully in the possession of defendant.

The defendant in its answer admitted that the bonds were in its possession, but denied they were owned by said minors or that such possession was wrongful, alleging upon information and belief that they were the property of the said Lenora S. Popp and J. Popp, her husband, who is not a party to the action, and were delivered to defendant by said Lenora S. Popp and J. Popp as collateral security for the payment of their joint and several note to the defendant for the sum of $2,400, dated July 13, 1916. Upon these issues the case was tried without a jury, and the court found that said note was on July 13, 1916, for a valuable consideration, executed and delivered by the said Lenora S. Popp and J. Popp to defendant, and that no part of the principal sum of said note had been paid; that upon said July 13, 1916, the said Lenora S. Popp and J. Popp, as a part of the same transaction, including the execution and delivery of said promissory note and agreement which accompanied the same and embodied the terms upon which said bonds were deposited with defendant as collateral, delivered to defendant at its banking house in the city of Santa Rosa, Cal., said three bonds, to be held by defendant "according to the terms and conditions of said collateral agreement," to wit, to secure the payment of said promissory note, "then and there representing to the officers and agents of said defendant, Exchange Bank, and inducing them to believe that said bonds belonged to and were the property of the said plaintiff, Lenora S. Popp, and her husband; that defendant accepted said bonds in good faith as security for the payment of said promissory note, * * * in the belief that said representation was true and without knowledge of or reason to suspect that it was not true." The court further found that said bonds had come into the hands of said Lenora S. Popp as a gift to said minors from an aunt, and were by said Lenora S. Popp placed in the custody of her husband and the father of said minors, and were not and never have been the property of said Lenora S. Popp or J. Popp; that said Alida Newell Popp was and is the owner of two of said bonds, and said Mary Elizabeth Popp was and is the owner of one of said bonds; "that defendant had no knowledge of the true ownership of said bonds or either of them, and had no reason to believe that said Lenora S. Popp and J. Popp were not the owners thereof and were without authority to pledge or sell the same; the defendant bank is the lawful holder of each of said bonds as security and as a pledge for the payment of said promissory note, together with interest thereon; that said bonds and each of them were negotiable instruments, payable to bearer in money only, and without any condition not certain of fulfillment for value, and were pledged as security * * * to defendant before maturity, in due course, and without fraud on the part of defendant." The conclusions of law were in accordance with the findings, and, among other things, ordered that plaintiff, as such guardian, had the right to redeem the bonds upon payment to defendant of the amount remaining due on said promissory note. Plaintiff in due time moved for a new trial, which motion was denied. Judgment was entered accordingly in favor of defendant, from which judgment plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The first point which plaintiff makes for reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings, the specific attack being that there is no evidence in support of the finding "that Lenora S. Popp, for valuable consideration, executed the note and collateral agreement, that she executed it at the banking house of respondent bank, or that she made any representations to any of the officials of said bank." We have carefully reviewed the record and find ample evidence to support the finding. To be sure, there is present a conflict in the evidence, but where that is so this court will not disturb the finding of fact touching which the conflict exists.

[2] An extended and detailed recital of the evidence sustaining the findings specifically assailed would be of little profit. Suffice it to say that during the period commencing in December, 1915, and extending to the date of the execution by the plaintiff and her husband of the note involved here, the account of the plaintiff and J. Popp with the defendant bank was in a continuous state of overdraft, and on the 13th day of July, 1916, the date of said note, this overdraft amounted to $2,400, and it was to cover said amount that the note was executed and collateral deposited. The bank officials were pressing Mr. Popp to take care of this obligation, and notified him, so he testifies, that it would not cash any more of his checks. The cashier of the defendant testifies that he told Mr. Popp that "something had to be done; we [defendant] couldn't let this thing run any longer." It was this attitude of the bank that brought about the execution of the note and the delivery as collateral of the bonds, and at which time plaintiff had not been appointed guardian of the persons or estates of her minor children, she having been appointed in the month of April, 1919.

[3] The account was in the names of the plaintiff, Lenora S. Popp, and J. Popp, and was opened with money belonging to plaintiff, by the deposit of checks payable to her. She thinks she never drew any checks against the account, and, in any event, not more than one or two; nevertheless the overdraft was in law as much her indebtedness as that of her husband, and it is the law of this state that a pre-existing debt is a valuable consideration. Schluter v. Harvey, 65 Cal. 158, 3 Pac. 659; Frey v. Clifford, 44 Cal. 335; Stroud v. Thomas, 139 Cal. 274, 72 Pac. 1008, 96 Am. St. Rep. 111.

[4] In Tiedeman on Commercial Paper, § 164, it is said:

"It has been generally held that an existing debt is a sufficient consideration for a note or other commercial instrument. This is true whether the existing debt is an open account or one resting on an implied contract, or whether it is evidenced by an instrument of indebtedness, which is surrendered, for the new instrument."

Plaintiff admits that she knew that her husband, J. Popp, was indebted to the defendant, but did not know to what extent. When J. Popp delivered the bonds to the defendant, he stated to the officer who received them that they were bonds "my wife * * * got back from the East," and that they "belonged to his wife." The note and collateral agreement were signed by plaintiff and her husband, J. Popp, but both testify positively that they were signed at the Popp residence, and not at the place of business of the defendant.

[5] The officer of the bank who had charge of the transaction testifies that to the best of his recollection they were signed by both Popp and his wife at the defendant's banking house. The court found in accordance with the latter testimony, which appellant contends does not sustain such finding. With this we cannot agree, but in any event the decisive question was: Were the instruments actually signed by Popp and his wife? If they were, the place of signing was immaterial, except, perhaps as a matter of testing the accuracy of the memory of the witnesses. While plaintiff admits the verity of her signature to the note and collateral agreement she asserts, and in that she is corroborated by her husband, that she signed both writings without reading either of them, and so signed upon the representation made to her by her husband that they were "merely copies of statements." Be that as it may, she intrusted the note, collateral agreement, and bonds to her husband J. Popp, who delivered them to the defendant, which received them in good faith, in due course, and with an entire want of knowledge, constructive or otherwise, of any fact which would impeach either writing or any element of the transaction. The defendant insisted that Lenora S. Popp should sign the note and accompanying agreement that was part of the consideration upon which it extended the credit and accepted the bonds as collateral. Mr. Popp describes the delivery as follows:

"I handed him [cashier] the bonds. He says, 'What is that?' I said, 'Three bonds; I thought maybe you hold for security for the present so I can continue in business.'"

What precedes and there is other evidence to the same effect, supports the findings of the court that Lenora S. Popp executed said note and collateral agreement for a valuable consideration.

[6] The appellant's next contention is that the defendant bank is not a bona fide holder in good faith or for value of the pledged bonds. Much of what precedes is applicable to this phase of the case. The claim is made that the desperate financial condition of Popp, which had existed for months prior to the date of the note, the repeated unsuccessful attempts of the defendant to adjust the account, and the sudden appearance of the bonds tendered and accepted as collateral, coupled with Mr. Popp's declaration that they belonged to his wife, and the additional circumstance that on the margin on the outside of two of said bonds is written in ink "Alida Newell Popp," and on the margin on the outside of one of said bonds is written in ink "Mary Elizabeth Popp," should have prompted the defendant, indeed cast upon it the duty, to make "some investigation as to the true condition of the ownership of the bonds." The record discloses that the defendant did make "some" investigation, but, aside from that, we find no reason for holding that, under the conditions and facts as they then existed, the defendant or its officers were obligated to canvass the title to these bonds with greater detail than they did. They had no reason whatever to distrust Popp or to disbelieve or doubt his statements. Further questioning of him would have elicited nothing in contradiction of his declaration that his wife owned them and that she got them back East from an aunt. This was a reasonable explanation of the ownership and their possession by him. It might also be regarded as a satisfactory apology for his failing to earlier offer them as security. The fact that the bonds were in Popp's possession, and were received by the bank from him, when taken with the recital in the collateral agreement, signed by Mrs. Popp, that they were deposited with defendant "as collateral security" for the payment of said note, justified the bank in believing, as the record discloses it did, that the bonds were so deposited with the knowledge and consent of Mrs. Popp. Not a word was said by Popp in reference to his minor children owning the bonds, and naught was said or done indicating that Popp was wrongfully hypothecating them. None of the officials of defendant knew or had reason to suspect that Popp had fraudulently removed them from the safe deposit box where the Popp's claimed they were kept, and which was unknown to defendant. Moreover, Mr. Le Baron, an official of defendant, testified, which was manifestly accepted as true by the trial court, that Mrs. and Mr. Popp "came in with the bonds and executed this note for the purpose of taking up that overdraft which we were trying to wipe out." He was asked:

"Did they hand you the bonds—these three $1,000 Adirondack bonds? A. Surely. Q. At that time and place did John Popp and Lenora S. Popp execute that note and collateral agreement? A. They did."

So far as notice, actual or constructive, "arising from the relationship of the parties or circumstances attending the transaction," is concerned, the facts are decidedly with the bank. As has been said, the makers and pledgers were husband and wife; the account was in their joint names, and the indebtedness that of both of them; the initial deposit consisted of money belonging to the wife, against which she permitted her husband to check ad libitum, without, so far as appears, at any time requiring him to account, or ever inquiring of the bank the status of such account. Under these circumstances, it cannot be said the officials of defendant were not justified in accepting as true, and relying upon, the representations of J. Popp.

[7] It remains to inquire if the names of the minor children, written on the margin of the bonds, constituted notice, actual or constructive, to the bank that the children owned them, or notice sufficient to cast upon it the duty of making further investigation touching such ownership. The attention of no one connected with the bank was called to said names thereon at the time the bonds were pledged, and the representative of defendant, who received them, testified that he had no recollection of having seen the names at the time the bonds were deposited, although he could not "swear" they were not there. But, even though the officials of the bank had seen these names on the bonds, in view of the fact, as we shall presently point out, that they passed by delivery without indorsement, and of Mr. Popp's unequivocal statement that his wife owned them, upon which they were justified in relying, we hold that failure to make further inquiry touching their ownership would not have established a lack of good faith, or prevented defendant from being a holder for value in due course.

[8] "The well-settled rule at present, except as already noted (not necessary to repeat here), is that mere knowledge of facts sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry, without actual knowledge, or mere suspicion of an infirmity or defect of title, does not preclude the transferee from occupying the position of a holder in due course, unless the circumstances or suspicions are so cogent and obvious that to remain passive would amount to bad faith." 8 Corpus Juris, p. 501. But plaintiff states, referring to the same volume of Corpus Juris, p. 711, that this rule is subject to the qualification that, "where the circumstances are such as to justify the conclusion that the failure to make inquiry arose from a suspicion that inquiry would disclose a vice or defect in the instrument or transaction, such indorsee is charged with knowledge." The answer to this is that there is no finding in the present case bringing it within this exception, and, if there was such a finding, it would be pure conjecture, for we discover nothing in the evidence indicating that the bank officials were intentionally omitting to pursue information through fear they might unearth something touching the ownership of the bonds in question which would compel them to reject them as security, or, if accepted, would, in the event of its being disclosed, defeat the pledge.

[9] The next contention of the plaintiff is that the bonds in question are not negotiable. We think this proposition must be sustained. The bonds were issued apparently in the state of New York on January 1, 1912. They are payable to the bearer, or to the registered holder in case the bonds be registered, and on their face they show that they are secured by a mortgage or trust deed upon real property, and they become due on January 1, 1962. The record does not show that they were ever registered. They are precisely similar in all respects to the bonds under consideration in Kohn v. Sacramento, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 1, 141 Pac. 626, and Crocker National Bank v. Byrne, 178 Cal. 329, 173 Pac. 752. In each of those cases bonds of that description were held to be nonnegotiable under the law of California in force in 1912, and the proposition must be considered as settled.

[10] The result is that the defendant cannot protect itself upon the rule, applying to negotiable instruments only, that where the holder thereof has by delivering the instrument to a third person clothed him with an apparent title thereto, and such third person disposes of it to an innocent purchaser, such purchaser obtains title as against the true owner, although the person to whom it was delivered had no authority to make a sale thereof. Chase v. Whitmore, 68 Cal. 547, 9 Pac. 942. It may be possible that, as the owners of these bonds were minors, it could not be said that they had clothed their parents with apparent authority to dispose of the bonds, even if they were negotiable. But that question we need not determine, for, as the bonds were not negotiable, the rule cannot apply in any event to this case. The rule applicable here is that the seller of property can transfer to the buyer no better title than he has himself, and, if at the time of the transfer he had no title, the purchaser, although buying in good faith and for full value, obtains no title. Crocker Nat. Bank v. Byrne, supra, 178 Cal. 332, 173 Pac. 752.

[11] The respondent concedes that the bonds were not negotiable, under the aforesaid decisions, at the time they were issued, and he relies on the fact that the Legislature by an act which took effect August 8, 1915, amended our Code in relation to negotiable instruments so as to make bonds such as these negotiable. If that act could have had the effect to change the character of the bonds in that particular, undoubtedly the point would be well taken and the bonds would have been clothed, at the time they were transferred to the defendant, in 1916, with all the characteristics of negotiable instruments. But it is well established that the Legislature cannot by an act subsequent to the execution of a contract change its legal effect in any material particular. In section 871, vol. 1, of Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, that author says:

"The law in force at the time the contract is made must apply to it with respect to its interpretation and effect; otherwise the Legislature would itself make a contract for the parties." (Italics ours.)

This proposition is established by the decisions in Cook v. Mutual Insurance Co., 53 Ala. 37; Bloodgood v. Cammack, 5 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 276; and Bowlby v. Kline, 28 Ind. App. 662, 63 N. E. 723. The statements in 8 Corpus Juris, at sections 173 and 184, of the article on Bills and Notes, to the effect that the contract made by an indorsement or transfer of an instrument is governed by the law in force at the time such indorsement is made, refers wholly to indorsements or transfers of instruments which are in fact negotiabile. The entire text of the sections refers to instruments which are negotiable. The cases cited in support of these sections show that the subject treated was the effect of the contract of indorsement, and not the character or effect of the instrument transferred or indorsed.

[12] The bonds were apparently executed in the state of New York. There was no proof or finding with respect to the law of New York on the subject of negotiable instruments of this character. Consequently, under the well-settled rule, we must assume that the law of that state on the subject is the same as the law of California. It seems to be settled that the law of the place of the execution of the contract determines its character and effect. But, as the question is not before us, we need not express any opinion on the subject. That question will have to remain open for future determination in case upon a new trial the evidence may show a different law in New York from that which prevails here. For these reasons we are of the opinion that the defendant, under the facts found, had no title to the bonds in controversy, and that the plaintiff should have had judgment.

The judgment is reversed.

O'FARRELL v. SONOMA COUNTY et al.
(S. F. 9968.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1922.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 24, 1922.)

1. Counties $\S$ 178—County board must spend bond money in accordance with order calling bond election.

Where the order of the county board of supervisors calling an election for the purpose of voting bonds for the construction of roads specified the road to be constructed, the length thereof, and the amount to be expended, the board had no authority to construct the road in portions or to expend the money only on a portion of the road, in view of Pol. Code, $\S\S$ 2643, 4088, authorizing the issuance of county bonds for roads pursuant to an order of the supervisors ratified at a subsequent election, and providing that the revenue derived shall be applied only for the purpose specified in the order.

2. Counties $\S$ 178—Order calling election to vote bonds and ratification by electors held to constitute a contract.

An order of the county board of supervisors calling an election to vote bonds to build roads, and the ratification of the order by the electors, constituted a contract between the state and the individuals whose property was affected which could not be altered by one of the parties alone.

Lawlor and Sloane, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action by Cathal O'Farrell against the County of Sonoma and H. F. Doss and others, constituting the Supervisors of the county. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. W. McCaughey and Vincent Surr, both of San Francisco, and J. A. Barham, of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

Geo. W. Hoyle, Dist. Atty., of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to obtain an injunction regarding the making of unlawful contracts and the unlawful expenditure of the proceeds of certain county bonds. The defendants appeared and filed a general demurrer. The demurrer was sustained. The plaintiff declined to amend, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendants for their costs. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment.

In his verified complaint the plaintiff incorporates copies of certain records, and in the interest of simplicity, in stating the substance of the allegations we will make no distinction as to the plaintiff's allegations and the facts contained in the exhibits. In this manner we may state that the plaintiff alleges that he is the owner of property taxed and subject to be taxed to pay the bonds hereinafter referred to; that the individuals named as defendants are the supervisors of Sonoma county; that on the 16th day of April, 1919, the board of supervisors of Sonoma county adopted a resolution and order:

"Whereas, public necessity and convenience demand the building and construction of certain highways in Sonoma county; and

"Whereas, there are no funds of the county of Sonoma available for said purpose; and

"Whereas, it is necessary that a bonded indebtedness for the said purpose be incurred and created by the said county of Sonoma"

"Now, therefore, be it resolved and ordered by the board of supervisors of the county of Sonoma, at a regular meeting of the said board of supervisors held in the county of Sonoma, on the 16th day of April, 1919, all of the members of said board being present at such meeting and voting thereat in favor of this order, that the question of the issuance of bonds for the incurring of an indebtedness of one million six hundred and forty thousand dollars for the purpose of building and constructing highways in said Sonoma county, be submitted to the qualified electors of the county of Sonoma, state of California, at a special election to be held throughout Sonoma county on the 24th day of May, 1919; the said bonded indebtedness to be incurred for the purpose of building and constructing the highways described as follows:

"Sebastopol to Freestone.

"Beginning at a point in the present Sebastopol-Freestone Road, 1.1 mile westerly from the limits of the town of Sebastopol; said point at the end of the present oil road; thence along the present road to its intersection with the present Freestone-Valley Ford Road.

"Distance 4.0 miles, $85,000.00."

Then follow certain other formal matters concerning the election, and the resolution contains:

"Notice of County Bond Election. Notice is hereby given, etc. * * * The said bonded indebtedness is to be incurred for the purpose of building and constructing the following described highways in Sonoma county, to wit: Sebastopol to Freestone."

Then follow the description, the distance, and the pro rata amount for the above road and the similar data regarding other roads; that the election was duly held on the 24th day of May, 1919; that on May 28, 1919, the returns all being in and the same being canvassed, the defendant board declared the proposition carried, and ordered the issuance of said bonds; that on the 11th day of June, 1919, the defendant board ordered the publication of notice of sale of said bonds; that thereafter said bonds were sold for the amount of principal and accrued interest, and a premium of $39,500; that on the 6th day of August, 1919, the county engineer and surveyor was directed to make plans and specifications for the said road from Sebastopol to Freestone; "that thereafter said county surveyor prepared, and on March 23, 1921, filed with said county clerk plans, specifications and estimates of a portion only of said Sebastopol-Freestone four-mile road showing said portion as section A, being of the length of 10,208 feet, to wit, 1.93 miles, and calling for an estimated expenditure thereon of $81,500, but did not and has not filed any plans, specifications, or estimates whatever of, or for, the remaining 2.07 miles of said Sebastopol-Freestone four-mile road. * * *

That the fact is that in said road from Sebastopol to Freestone there are four hills requiring grading and drainage, and three of said hills are in section A, and the O'Farrell hill, the largest by far of said hills, is not in said section A, cannot possibly be graded and drained with the small amount of money, if any, that will remain applicable thereto after the building and construction of said section A, if done according to the plans and specifications filed as aforesaid. That on the 23d day of March, 1921, the defendant board adopted the above-mentioned plans and specifications and directed the clerk to advertise for bids. That on the 25th day of March, 1921, the clerk did so advertise for bids; that said bids have been received; that the board threatens to and will, unless restrained, open the bids so invited, accept the lowest bid and will enter into a contract with the lowest bidder. That the plaintiff and many others will be irreparably damaged, etc., wherefore plaintiff prays judgment."

The complaint was filed April 11, 1921. Thereafter the plaintiff filed a supplemental complaint in which it is alleged that on the 12th day of April, 1921, the defendant board opened the bids, and that the lowest responsible bid for the construction of section A, 1.93 miles, was $72,840.60; that the cost of constructing the rest of the road, 2.07 miles, will exceed the cost of constructing section A.

The statute (Pol. Code, § 4088) under which the bonds were issued, among other things, provides:

"Any county * * * may incur * * * a bonded indebtedness for * * * the purpose of * * * constructing roads. * * * Such indebtedness shall be * * * incurred in the following manner, to wit: The board of supervisors thereof shall by order specify the purpose for which the indebtedness is to be incurred. * * * [Then follows itemized procedure regarding issuance of bonds and the levy of a tax.] Such tax, when collected, shall be paid into the treasury of the county, and used solely to pay the interest and principal of said bonds as they respectively become due. The revenue derived from the sale of said bonds shall be applied to the purpose specified in the order of the board, and no other. Should there be any surplus, it shall be applied towards the payment of said bonds. The board of supervisors of any county can contract a bonded indebtedness for county purposes only as in this title provided. * * *"

The plaintiff contends that under the foregoing facts the board of supervisors had the jurisdiction to ask for bids for the construction of the road, Sebastopol to Freestone, as an entity, and if the bids were too high that the board was not entitled to proceed without further authority from the electors. The defendants contend that a board of supervisors has discretionary power to spend the entire $85,000 on any part or portion of said road as to the board seems meet and proper.

[1, 2] We think that "discretionary powers" are a false issue in this case. When the defendant board was contemplating a bond issue on the 16th day of April, 1919, it had the statutory right to make its order just as broad, and just as narrow, and just as specific as it was willing to be bound by, so long as the provisions of the statute were complied with. At that time it could have asked generally for the consent of the electors to issue bonds in the sum of $1,640,000, for constructing roads in Sonoma county, but it did not do so; on the contrary, it specified road by road, name by name, and length by length, of each piece of road that was to be constructed. When, in the order, it specified Sebastopol to Freestone, four miles, designating the point of beginning and the point of the ending, any question of discretion as to division or subdivision into sections was, as to these elements, exercised once and for all and as a finality. When thereafter, pursuant to that order, the defendant board published a notice to the electors in exact accord with its order, every elector had the right to assume that the statement contained in the order to the effect that a road would be constructed from Sebastopol to Freestone meant the entire distance between those two points—not one end, or the other end, or any part or portion, but the whole. The electors are presumed to have known the law and to have known that by the provisions of subdivision 11 of section 2643 of the Political Code, road work, costing more than $1,000, may be done and performed only after notice duly given calling for bids. The electors must have also known that ordinarily a board of supervisors has many discretionary powers; but, nothing to the contrary appearing the electors had the right to assume that after the election the board of supervisors would call for bids for the construction of a road four miles in length between Sebastopol and Freestone as described in its order and costing not to exceed $85,000. The order calling the election and the ratification of that order by the electors constituted a contract between the state and the individuals whose property was thereby affected. Peery v. City of Los Angeles (Cal.) 203 Pac. 992. After the contract had been made, it could not be altered by one of the parties, only, but by all of the parties thereto. When by its order, duly accepted by the vote of the electors, the length of the road had been specifically defined, its terminals specifically located, and the cost of the whole established, these elements became a part of the contract. As to them the board, acting alone, could not redivide the contract. Neither could it directly expend the moneys on only a portion of the road. What it could not do directly it could not do indirectly. Such fact is of the utmost importance to the interested parties. It is the only hold the taxpayers have for specifically enforcing the contract as made by them. The very gist of the plaintiff's complaint is that the defendant board has not asked for, and has not obtained, a bid for constructing the whole road. For this reason the plaintiff may complain. If the defendant board has the statutory right to let contracts to build said road in sections, then, as the defendant argues, all of the funds may be spent on one mile in the discretion of the board. But the board may not let the contracts piecemeal. It has waived its right to do so. The foregoing views are fully sustained by the principles announced in Jenkins v. Williams, 14 Cal. App. 89, 111 Pac. 116. The only difference between the instant case and that case is that the instant case involves roads, whereas the Jenkins Case involved bridges. Both cases rest on the same section of the same statute. No one can read that decision without being impressed that the board of supervisors of Sacramento county could not have used the moneys voted for a "new steel bridge over Cosumnes river at Bridgehouse, Sacramento county" for the purpose of building one-half of a bridge, or one pier for a proposed bridge, or anything else or otherwise, except an entity—a bridge, whether large, small or otherwise. Cases quite closely in point, in other jurisdictions, are in accord with the case last cited. Marteeney v. Louth, 197 Ill. App. 106, 115-116; Haws v. County Court, 86 W. Va. 650, 104 S. E. 119, 121; Whitner v. Woodruff, 68 Fla. 465, 67 South. 110, 111; Pine v. Baker, 76 Okl. 62, 184 Pac. 445, 451; Thompson v. Pierce County, 113 Wash. 237, 193 Pac. 706, 707; Carson v. Road Improvement Dist. No. 2, 150 Ark. 379, 234 S. W. 257.

We think that the demurrer should have been overruled and that the defendants should have been required to answer, and that the case should have been heard on its merits.

The judgment is reversed.

The foregoing opinion heretofore rendered herein by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 2, is hereby adopted as the opinion of this court.

GERVASONI et al. v. CITY OF PETALUMA et al. (S. F. 9867.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 11, 1922.)

1. Public lands ☞132—Evidence held to establish bona fide occupancy by grantee of town-site lands.

Upon the issue of whether a grantee was an undisputed occupant of land in the city of Petaluma acquired by deed in 1868 from the town trustees under authority in St. 1867-68, p. 298, enacted to carry out an act of Congress approved March 1, 1867, granting to municipal authorities a trust to convey land "in the bona fide occupancy of parties," and where the city now claims an easement for a street across grantee's lot, but the deed contained a recital that the grantee was a bona fide occupant, evidence considered, and held sufficient to support a finding for grantee.

2. Estoppel ☞62(4)—Assessment of property not estoppel to claim land a street.

Proceeding for improvements and assessment and collection of assessments upon certain lands does not estop a city from claiming such assessed land to be a street.

3. Public lands ☞132—Actual occupancy by town-site grantee not disproved by official map showing street across grantee's property.

Grantee acquired land in Petaluma by deed in 1868 from the town trustees acting under authority of St. 1867-68, p. 298, enacted to carry out an act of Congress approved March 1, 1867, granting a trust to municipal authorities to convey United States lands where "in the bona fide occupancy of parties." Congressional act approved in 1864 provided for survey and platting of Petaluma, pursuant to which the trustees approved and recorded the "Stratton" map, which delineated a street as traversing grantee's land. In contesting grantee's occupancy at time deed was given the city asserted the existence of this street. Held that, although the land description was by reference to lot numbers upon this map, the rights of the occupants with reference to a street platted, but not otherwise shown to exist, were not affected by the acts providing for the map, since there was authority to represent only those streets actually existing, and a new layout was not permissible without consent of the occupants.

4. Public lands ☞132—Grantee of town-site lands held not to admit correct delineation of streets upon map showing lot numbers by which his property was conveyed.

Grantee acquired land in the city of Petaluma by deed in 1868 from the town trustees acting under authority of St. 1867-68, p. 298, enacted to carry out act of Congress approved March 1, 1867, granting a trust to municipal authorities to convey lands where "in the bona fide occupancy of parties." Congressional act approved in 1864 provided for survey and platting of Petaluma, pursuant to which the trustees approved and recorded the "Stratton" map, which delineated a street as traversing grantee's land. Held, that the city, in contesting grantee's occupancy at time deed was given, could not prevail in asserting that acceptance of deed referring to courses and lot numbers shown on the Stratton map bound grantee as an admission of the correct delineation of the street, especially where the deed expressly recited that grantee was in exclusive occupancy, as this recital raised an inference that the entire lot was conveyed.

5. Trial ☞412—Objection to admission of deeds waived where objecting counsel stated chain of title did not require investigation.

Objection to admission of deeds showing chain of title in an action to quiet title was waived where objecting counsel, answering a question of the court whether there was anything that would require investigation of the deeds, stated, "I think there is a complete chain of title."

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmett Seawell, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Charles Gervasoni and others against the City of Petaluma and others. Judgment rendered, from which defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. J. Dole, of Petaluma, for appellants.

F. A. Meyer, of Petaluma, and T. J. Geary, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This action is one to quiet title to certain property in the city of Petaluma, to which the plaintiffs claim ownership in fee simple, but which title the defendant city of Petaluma denies, and further sets up an easement and right of way for passage through, over, and across the said property as a public street. The trial court found in the main in the plaintiffs' favor, adjudging them to be the owners of the frontage claimed by them upon Main street in said city, but reserving to the city certain easements in the rear portion of the property covering what is known as "Water street." The defendants have appealed from the judgment.

As to the main facts in the case there is no material dispute. The city of Petaluma had its beginning during or possibly prior to the year 1850, when a number of settlers collected on the westerly side of Petaluma creek, or river, at a point at or near the head of navigation of the said stream. The land at that point was unsurveyed, and therefore unoccupied, government land, the title to which was vested in the United States. A town grew up at this point, roadways and streets were located according to convenience and by user, and property occupied by the settlers became of more or less value, and not a few transfers were made. For more than a decade there was no other title in the occupants of the property thus acquired and transferred than the possessory title of those who had settled thereon or their successors. Prior to 1860 there appears to have been a map of the town known as the "Brewster map," but it does not appear to have been found or offered in evidence in this case. In the year 1858 the town of Petaluma was incorporated by a special act of the Legislature, which defined the exterior limits of said town, but which did not embrace any details as to its interior lots, blocks, or streets. Stats. 1858, p. 140. In the year 1860 a survey and map known as the "Eliason map" was made by order of the board of trustees of the town, which purported to show its lots and streets as they then existed on the ground, and which survey and map, after some minor changes had been made by order of that official body, was accepted and filed as an official map of said town. In 1864 (13 Stat. 343) an act of Congress was adopted providing for a survey of the town of Petaluma, which act embodied a method for acquiring title to the lands held by bona fide occupants at the time of the adoption of said act. This act was amended in certain particulars a year later. (13 Stat. 529). The survey provided for in said act was made and a map drafted and adopted and known as the "Stratton map." This map was much more detailed as to the size and description of the lots and width and location of the streets delineated thereon than was the Eliason map, from which it also differed in certain other particulars to be hereafter noted. The Stratton map was approved and certified by the trustees of the said town and was filed for record in the recorder's office of the county of Sonoma as and for an official map of Petaluma, December 30, 1865. On March 1, 1867, an act of Congress was approved providing:

"That all the right and title to the land situated within the corporate limits of the towns of * * * Petaluma, in the state of California, as defined in the acts of the Legislature of that state incorporating said towns, be, and the same [is] hereby relinquished and granted to the corporate authorities of said towns and their successors, in trust, for and with authority to convey so much of said land as is in the bona fide occupancy of parties, upon the passage of this act, by themselves or tenants, to such parties: Provided, that this grant shall not extend to any reservation of the United States nor prejudice any adverse right or claim, if such exist, to said land or any part thereof, nor preclude a judicial examination and adjustment thereof." (14 Stat. 418).

In the following year the state Legislature adopted an act authorizing the trustees of the town or city of Petaluma to execute the trust provided for in the foregoing act of Congress by the execution and delivery of deeds to the persons entitled thereto under said congressional act. This act contained a proviso:

"That in all cases of dispute or contest the parties or persons disputing or contesting shall settle and determine their respective rights in the courts of this state; and the said trustees shall, in no case of dispute or contest, make, execute or deliver a deed to either disputant or contestant until a final determination of the rights of the parties in the courts as herein provided." Stats. 1867-68, p. 298.

In the meantime, and commencing, as we have seen, early in 1850, the influx of settlers upon the town site of Petaluma had been going on. Among these early settlers coming in about the year 1850 were Capt. Tom Baylis and David Flogdell and his wife, Honora. The two men were intimate friends and probably partners. They built and for a time conducted together upon a portion of the property they had settled upon the Pioneer Hotel, which, according to tradition, bore the more intimate appellation of "Tom and Dave's." At the early date of their arrival and appropriation of the properties they occupied there were no streets, but the Pioneer Hotel, according to the quite exact identification of several early settlers, stood upon or near the corner of an indefinitely outlined passageway leading down to tide-water, where boats were accustomed to land. That this passageway had not, as late as 1860, acquired the definiteness or character of a public street would seem to be fairly inferable from the fact that it is not laid out or delineated as such upon the Eliason map as accepted and approved by the trustees of the town in that year, and from which it appears that English street, of which it would otherwise have been the elongation, terminated at the west line of Main street, and that the property across which said passageway ran appears thereon as lots 8 and 9 of block B, and is not shown to be traversed by any road, passageway or street. After a time the firm of Baylis & Flogdell was dissolved, and they divided up their properties, Baylis taking the lower or southerly lot, while the lot upon which the Pioneer Hotel stood was retained by Flogdell, who continued to conduct the hotel, while Capt. Baylis retained the shipping business which had grown up at the landing place below. Flogdell died in the early '60's, and his widow, Honora, succeeded to the hotel property. Some controversies, more or less traditional, seem to have arisen between Capt. Baylis and the widow of his former associate over the passageway which ran across their properties down to the landing place, but these disputes were finally settled by the marriage of Capt. Baylis and the widow, Honora, at a date in the middle '60's not precisely fixed. Capt. Baylis seems also to have departed this life upon some date prior to 1868, since it appears that Honora Baylis was his widow at an early date in the latter year. On April 14, 1868, the board of trustees of the town or city of Petaluma, acting under the authority of the act of Congress of 1867 above referred to, and also and by authority of the act of the Legislature of 1868 empowering them to execute the trust with which they had been invested by the congressional act of the previous year, executed a deed to Honora Baylis, purporting to grant to her a lot "commencing on the east line of Main street at the southeast corner of lot 353; thence southerly along the easterly side of Main street 80 feet; thence at right angles to Petaluma creek; thence northerly up said creek to a point at the continuation of the southerly line of said lot 353; thence following the southerly line of lot 353 westerly to Main street and the place of beginning." The number of the lot given as lot 353 in the foregoing description refers apparently to the lot designated by that number upon the Stratton map, and the tract of land covered by the foregoing description would, as to a portion thereof, include the 50-foot frontage of lot 352½ as shown upon said map, and would also, and in addition thereto, embrace about 30 feet of the land which was designated on said map as a continuation of English street down to Petaluma creek.

This deed contains the following significant recital:

"Said party of the second part having fully complied with all of the provisions of said ordinances of said board of trustees, and her claim to said premises having been fully approved by them, the said Honora Baylis having been a bona fide occupant of said premises on the 1st day of March, A. D. 1867, by herself and tenants and agents, as will appear by the proofs on file with said trustees."

Shortly after this deed had been executed and delivered to her, Honora Baylis entered into a transaction between herself and the administrator of her deceased husband, Capt. Thomas F. Baylis, wherein the parties thereto undertook to deal with the passageway across their respective properties. Honora Baylis conveyed to said administrator an easement over a strip of 11 feet along the southerly line of her tract of land as described in her deed just received from the trustees of said town or city, extending from Main street to Petaluma creek, which strip of land was to be held by the grantee and his successors "as a perpetual easement for a passageway." Of even date with said deed the administrator conveyed to Honora Baylis an easement on a strip of 11 feet in width along the northerly line of the lands of the estate of Baylis adjacent to the strip conveyed by Honora Baylis to him, and which was also to serve "as a perpetual easement for a passageway." By these two transfers a right of way for an alleyway 22 feet wide was evidently created for the benefit, at least, of the occupants of these adjoining properties. The Pioneer Hotel building, together with a number of other structures in its vicinity, was destroyed by fire some time in the late '60's, and the property remained, except as to some small shacks which appear to have been placed upon portions of it, for several years untenanted. In the year 1871 Honora Baylis subdivided her said property into three lots, which she sold to different parties, who went into possession of their respective portions, erecting buildings and engaging in business thereon. The person who thus purchased the most southerly of these lots from Honora Baylis transferred the same by mesne conveyances to William Sexton, who became the owner thereof in about 1875 and erected a building thereon. This building, however, instead of being confined to the limits of the lot, as described in his deed, was so erected as to cover the northerly portion of the 11-foot strip which Honora Baylis had theretofore conveyed to the estate of her deceased husband, Capt. Thomas F. Baylis as her portion of the adjacent passageway, thus leaving the said passageway or alley but 11 feet wide, and said structure has ever since stood upon that spot and ever since been occupied under a claim of exclusive right by the successors in interest of said Sexton, who are the plaintiffs herein During all of these years the evidence shows that the passageway from Main street down to the landing of Petaluma creek was used by various persons for the purpose of gaining access to said landing with their teams and produce. As to many of these they were persons bringing their produce to the landing where Capt. Baylis and his associate, Flogdell, carried on their shipping business prior to the division of their interests in about 1864. Such user at first straggled over an indefinite extent across the properties of Baylis and Flogdell, and later was confined to the 22-foot strip defined by the deeds passing between Honora Baylis and the administrator of Capt. Baylis' estate, and later still further confined to the southerly 11 feet of said strip by the fact of the erection of the structure last referred to upon the northerly 11 feet thereof. As to the public user or the right to use the 11-foot alleyway, to which width it has been thus limited since about the year 1875, no question arises in this case; the issues herein being confined to the portion of the lot the title to which was claimed by the plaintiffs' predecessors to have been acquired by Honora Baylis by virtue of the deed of the same to her by the trustees of the town of Petaluma in about 1868.

The defendants upon this appeal make the following contentions: (1) That the deed of the trustees of the town of Petaluma to Honora Baylis, which forms the foundation of the respondents' title to the premises in dispute, was and is void; (2) that the defendants' motion for nonsuit should have been granted; (3) that the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiffs' complaint should have been sustained; (4) that the court committed certain errors in law during the trial, to be hereafter noted; (5) that the findings do not support the judgment; (6) that the decision is against law.

[1, 2] As to the appellants' contention that the deed to Honora Baylis was and is void, this rests chiefly for its support upon the claim that Honora Baylis was not a bona fide and undisputed occupant of said premises at the time of the execution of said deed so as to be entitled thereto under the terms of the act of Congress granting the town site of the town of Petaluma and of the act of the Legislature authorizing the trustees of said town to make grants of lots therein to the persons entitled thereto under said congressional act. The question as to whether Honora Baylis was such an occupant of the premises in question as to be entitled to such deed is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court, and the trial court determined it adversely to the appellants' contention by its general finding that the plaintiffs, as the successors in interest and title of Honora Baylis, were the owners of the property. There is ample evidence to justify this finding; and, while there is some evidence of travel over and across this piece of land by persons going down to the landing with their produce in the earlier days of the town's history, there was no evidence that such travel and use of the rather ill-defined passageway over this property at that time was carried on by the public under any claim of right or under circumstances showing a dedication of the property to the uses of a public street. On the contrary, there is some very direct evidence showing that such was not the case, as, for example, the Eliason map made by order of the town trustees in 1860 and adopted after some changes as the official map of the town, which map shows English street as terminating at the west line of Main street, which delineates the property in question as being lots 8 and 9 in block B of said map, with no street or alley or passageway indicated as intersecting the same. Again, the trustees of said town were authorized by the act of Congress and the state Legislature to execute conveyances only to those who were in the bona fide and undisturbed possession of the property for which deeds were applied. The deed to Honora Baylis by said trustees contained the recital above quoted and from which it would appear that the said trustees, before making said deed, investigated the question of the right of Honora Baylis thereto and of the fact that she was the undisputed occupant of the premises to which she sought a deed and that proofs of her right thereto as such occupant were on file. It is not necessary to go so far as to hold that the town of Petaluma was bound by this recital; it is enough to say that it furnishes very cogent evidence as to the truth of the facts recited. There is also some evidence showing that the municipality recognized the title of the successors of Honora Baylis to the property it had conveyed to her by the institution of proceedings for making street improvements along Main street and by the collection of assessments levied against the property now claimed to be a public street for the purpose of making said street improvements. These matters also, while not binding as in the nature of an estoppel, furnish some evidence of acquiescence on the part of the city in the claim of ownership of the premises asserted by the successors of Honora Baylis holding under the aforesaid conveyance of the premises from the trustees of the municipality to her.

[3, 4] The appellant further urges in support of his contention that the deed to Honora Baylis was invalid in so far as it purported to convey the premises now claimed to be a public street, for the reason that said deed to her was made after the resurvey of the lands of the town under the act of Congress of 1864 and the making and adoption of the Stratton map, upon which map said lands were plotted as an extension of English street to tidewater. The appellant further urges that the fact that the description of the property conveyed in the Baylis deed refers by number to one of the lots delineated on the Stratton map binds the party taking said deed to a recognition of the correctness of the Stratton map in so far as it purports to delineate a street as traversing said property. Neither of these contentions is sound. This court had occasion in the early case of Jones v. City of Petaluma, 36 Cal. 230, to pass upon the effect of the acts of Congress of 1864 and 1867 in relation to the lands of the town or city of Petaluma in the actual occupancy of bona fide settlers thereon, and upon the effect of the making of this very survey and map under said acts. A public square had been delineated upon said map, and it was the claim of certain of the parties to the above case that at the time of the passage of said acts and the making of said map they were in the bona fide occupancy of lands forming a portion of said public square as the same appears upon said map. In disposing of this claim this court held that the rights of such occupants could not be affected by the terms of said acts having reference to the making of a survey or map of the town. In the case of Aleman v. City of Petaluma, 38 Cal. 553, the same subject was presented with particular reference to the delineation upon said map of a certain street claimed to have been at the time in the bona fide occupancy of private persons, and this court said with respect to such claim:

"The map which they were authorized to make was a map representing the existing streets, alleys, and squares, and such others as the occupants of the property might consent to. But it was not within the contemplation of the act that the persons getting up a map of an existing town might wholly disregard the former plan, lay out new streets, alleys, and squares, upon property before then devoted to private use, without the consent of the occupants. Such a power, in the hands of a few persons proceeding to secure the benefits of the act of July 1, 1864, to an already existing town, would have been liable to the grossest abuses, and destructive of the private rights which the act was mainly designed to foster."

A like rule has quite generally been adhered to in other jurisdictions in cases where similar conditions were presented. Scully v. Squier, 13 Idaho, 417, 90 Pac. 573, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183; Parchen v. Ashby, 5 Mont. 68, 1 Pac. 204; Ashby v. Hall, 119 U. S. 526, 7 Sup. Ct. 308, 30 L. Ed. 469. Nor is the fact that the grantee in the Baylis deed took said conveyance with a description, which in certain of its courses referred to a lot by its number as shown upon the Stratton map, to be held as binding said grantee to an admission of the correctness of said map otherwise than as to the location of said lot. The inference arising on the face of said description would rather be otherwise, since the officials of said town, with said map before them showing the apparent existence of a street across a portion of the property they were purporting to convey to the grantee, nevertheless conveyed the same, and in their said conveyance expressly recited that the said grantee was in the exclusive and bona fide occupancy of the premises covered by said description and was entitled to a deed thereto notwithstanding the delineations of said map showing that a portion of said premises was a public street.

The foregoing conclusions dispose of the several contentions of the appellant in so far as they relate to the sufficiency of the complaint and of the evidence educed in support of its averments as against a motion for nonsuit.

[5] It remains to deal briefly with certain alleged errors of law claimed to have been committed during the trial of the cause. The first group of these refers to the defendants' objections to the admission in evidence of the deed to Honora Baylis on account of the infirmities above disposed of, and also to the admission in evidence of the other deeds to her successors in the chain of title. As to these later instruments any objection which the defendants might have had to their admission on the ground of defects in their description or in their execution would seem to have been waived by the following colloquy between the trial court and counsel for the defendants after the admission in evidence of the Baylis deed, viz.:

"The Court: Is there any alleged break in the present title of the owner coming down to the city of Petaluma, providing the city of Petaluma could or did convey in the manner plaintiff claims. There is nothing that would require an investigation of those deeds is there?"

"Mr. Dole: I think there is a complete chain of title from the city of Petaluma down."

The remaining objections to the rulings of the trial court are merely stated, but not seriously supported by argument, nor by any citation of authority, and do not appear to present any points worthy of discussion in detail or sufficiently important to justify a reversal of the case. We find no sufficient error in this record to warrant such reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

REAUGH et al. v. CUDAHY PACKING CO.
et al. (L. A. 7049.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 27, 1922.)

1. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 165—Inferences favorable to plaintiff must be adopted on motion for nonsuit.

Motion for nonsuit is in effect a demurrer to the evidence supporting plaintiff's case, which presents to the trial court a question of law, and for the purpose of the motion assumes the truth of all evidence educed by plaintiff, and upon this motion it is the duty of the court to adopt only those reasonable inferences fairly deducible from the evidence which are most favorable to plaintiff.

2. Municipal corporations $\hookrightarrow$ 705(5) — Motor vehicle driver may be negligent though not exceeding speed prescribed by statute.

Motor Vehicle Act, St. 1919, p. 220, § 22, providing that vehicles shall be driven "at a rate of speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of the highway," and such as not to endanger any persons, is a statutory reiteration of the rule that drivers shall be watchful in anticipation of the presence of others at places such as crossings, where other vehicles and pedestrians are constantly passing, and in such situations the rate of speed may be negligent although not exceeding that prescribed as lawful by other provisions of the statute.

3. Evidence $\hookrightarrow$ 14 — South Main street and Eighth street, Los Angeles, judicially noticed as busy thoroughfares.

It may be accepted as a matter of judicial knowledge that South Main street and Eighth street in Los Angeles are busy thoroughfares and are usually congested with pedestrians and vehicular travel at 1:20 in the afternoon.

4. Municipal corporations $\hookrightarrow$ 706(6)—Evidence held to raise jury question as to negligence of motor vehicle driver.

Question as to defendant's negligence in view of Motor Vehicle Act, St. 1919, p. 220, § 22, providing for the careful operation of motor vehicles at a rate of speed safe with regard to traffic and use of the highway, for exceeding the speed of 10 miles per hour and driving within 6 feet of a street car when passing it, as prohibited by section 20, subdivision O, held for the jury.

5. Municipal corporations $\hookrightarrow$ 706(7)—Plaintiff, struck by automobile while passing in front of street car, held not negligent as a matter of law.

Plaintiff, who was crossing towards the west in front of a south-bound street car which was about to stop at a street intersection, and was struck by defendant's automobile, within 2 feet of and passing the street car, held not negligent as a matter of law.

6. Municipal corporations $\hookrightarrow$ 705(10)—Pedestrians not bound to stop, look, and listen when about to cross busy thoroughfare.

Notwithstanding the view may be obstructed, there is no positive duty upon pedestrians about to cross busy thoroughfares to stop, look, and listen at a crossing which is the regular stopping place, for street cars, nor is this duty imposed while pedestrians are proceeding across the street in front of cars at their regular stopping places, especially where they may rely upon automobiles not being driven within 6 feet alongside the cars, as provided by Motor Vehicle Act, St. 1919, p. 217, § 20, subd. O.

7. Negligence $\hookrightarrow$ 136(9)—Contributory negligence question of law, when there is but one inference.

Contributory negligence is a question of law only when the court is impelled to say that from the facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Henry T. Reaugh and Hattie L. Reaugh against the Cudahy Packing Company and F. T. Wells. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Frank J. Lavan, of Culver City, and George L. Greer, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. In this action for damages for personal injuries the plaintiffs, husband and wife, appeal from a judgment of nonsuit entered in favor of the defendants. The motion for a nonsuit was made and granted upon the grounds that the evidence educed in support of the plaintiffs' case failed to show negligence on the part of the defendants, and did show contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff Hattie L. Reaugh, the injured party, who will be hereinafter referred to as the plaintiff.

The established facts of the plaintiff's case substantially stated are these: At about the hour of 1:20 in the afternoon of October 23, 1920, the plaintiff was struck and seriously injured by a Dodge roadster automobile owned by the defendant the Cudahy Packing Company, and driven by the defendant Wells, who at the time of the accident was agent and employee of the defendant company. Immediately preceding the accident plaintiff was in the act of crossing South Main street in the city of Los Angeles at its intersection with Eighth street, and as she stepped from the easterly curb of South Main street she observed approaching a south-bound electric street car. Upon reaching the middle of the street plaintiff stopped and waited until the street car came to a stop, and then started to cross the tracks, passing in front of the standing street car approximately 10 feet from its front end. The place where the street car came to a stop was its usual stopping place, and it was usually stopped there for the purpose of permitting pedestrians to cross the street. Plaintiff's left foot had projected across the outer or westerly rail of the street car track, her right foot still being within the space between the two rails, when the automobile driven by the defendant Wells "bore down upon her." The left front wheel of the automobile caught and pinned down plaintiff's left foot, and at the same instant she was struck on the left side of her body by the left front fender of the automobile, and violently thrown backwards to the pavement. At the time plaintiff stood in the middle of the street waiting for the street car to stop, the automobile in question was observed by a witness to the accident to be at a distance of between 100 and 150 feet behind the street car, and traveling at the rate of 25 or 30 miles per hour in the same direction with the street car. The street car was slowing down, but the automobile continued to travel at the speed just stated until it approached to within 10 or 15 feet of the street car, when it slowed down to about 15 miles an hour, and then swung to the right of the street car just sufficiently to make a clearance, and continued its course alongside the street car at a speed of 12 or 15 miles an hour. The front part of the automobile cleared the front steps of the street car by about 2 feet. The rear part of the automobile was further away from the street car, that is to say, the front part of the automobile when it passed the front steps of the street car, was closer to the rail than the rear end of the automobile, which was between 3 and 4 feet of the rail. The brakes of the street car had been applied, and the car itself was almost at a complete stop when the automobile swung to the right and the car was standing still when the automobile, between 2 and 3 feet from the car and 10 feet from the street curb, and still traveling at a speed of 12 or 15 miles an hour, passed the front steps of the street car. The automobile did not slow down its speed below 12 or 15 miles an hour until after it collided with plaintiff. Other pedestrians were present and passing on the street crossing where the plaintiff was struck, and while plaintiff was proceeding across the tracks in front of the standing car she "was looking all around," but because the automobile came so quickly she did not notice its approach until it struck her.

The Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. of 1919, pp. 191 to 217, subd. O, § 20) provides that—

When "passing any * * * street car while passengers are alighting from or boarding the same, vehicles shall be operated or driven on the right hand side of such cars and at a rate of speed not exceeding 10 miles an hour and no portion thereof * * * shall come within six feet of the running board or steps of such cars, and shall at all times be operated with due care and caution so that the safety of passengers shall be assured."

It was a stipulated fact in the plaintiff's case that the distance from the west curb of South Main street to the nearest street car rail is 18 feet and 2 inches. The trial court was evidently of the opinion that the negligence complained of was predicated primarily upon a violation of the Motor Vehicle Act in driving the automobile alongside a standing street car closer than 6 feet and faster than 10 miles an hour, and accordingly held the defendants free from actionable negligence in the absence of any evidence showing that the street car had fully stopped, and that passengers were alighting therefrom at the time the automobile swung to the right of and passed the street car. The plaintiff's case, however, as presented in the amended complaint, did not proceed entirely upon the theory that the injuries to her resulted from the "unlawful manner" in which the automobile was operated, but alleged as well that the accident and the injuries to the plaintiff were the result of the "careless, negligent, and reckless * * *" operation of the automobile by the defendant Wells.

[1] The motion for a nonsuit being in effect but a demurrer to the evidence received in support of the plaintiff's case, presented for the decision of the trial court purely a question of law, and, therefore, for the purpose of the motion, assumed the truth of all the evidence adduced in support of the plaintiff's case. This is the settled and generally well-understood rule, and, taking such evidence as true, it was the duty of the trial court, without regard to the conflicts, if any, appearing therein, to adopt only those inferences, reasonable, of course, fairly deducible therefrom, which were most favorable to the plaintiff. The evidence bearing immediately upon the happening of the accident, as hereinabove outlined, is stated according to its fair and reasonable tendency, and viewing it, as must be done for the purpose of testing the effectiveness of a motion for nonsuit, in the light of inferences most favorable to plaintiff's case, we are constrained to hold that it clearly created a prima facie case of negligence against the defendants.

[2] Conceding, as is contended, that the Motor Vehicle Act, concerning the operation and control of vehicles approaching and passing standing street cars, unloading or receiving passengers, was intended solely for the benefit of passengers, and not pedestrians, and that, therefore, it cannot be said, in the absence of a showing that the street car in question had come to a complete stop and that passengers were alighting therefrom or about to board the same at the time the automobile swung to the right, that defendant Wells was not guilty of negligence per se in passing the street car in question closer than 6 feet and faster than 10 miles an hour. It may also be conceded that the rate of speed at which the defendant Wells was traveling when passing the street car was not in excess of the 15 miles an hour rate provided and permitted by other provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. of 1919, p. 220, § 22), and that therefore actionable negligence cannot be predicated upon a violation of the statute in that particular. But it will be noted that the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. of 1919, p. 220, § 22) also provides that—

“Any person operating or driving a motor or other vehicle on the public highways shall operate or drive the same in a careful and prudent manner and at a rate of speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of the highway, and no person shall operate or drive a motor vehicle or other vehicle on a public highway at such a rate of speed as to endanger the life or limb of any person or the safety of any property.”

This is but a reiteration of the rule, in statutory form, which has always been in force without regard to a statutory promulgation to the effect that drivers or operators of vehicles, and more particularly motor vehicles, must be specially watchful in anticipation of the presence of others at places where other vehicles are constantly passing, and where men, women, and children are liable to be crossing, such as corners at the intersections of streets or other similar places or situations where people are likely to fail to observe an approaching automobile. 2 R. C. L. 1184, § 19.

So, therefore, even though the statutory limitation of speed has not been exceeded, the rate of speed at which an automobile may be traveling may be held under some circumstances to be negligent. That is to say, the operator of an automobile is not necessarily exempt from liability for injuries to other persons occurring in a public street by showing simply that at the time of the accident he was running at a rate of speed allowed by law. He still remains bound to anticipate that he may meet persons at any point of the street, and he must, in order to avoid a charge of negligence, keep a proper lookout for them and keep his machine under such control as will enable him to avoid a collision with another person using proper care and caution, and if the situation requires he must slow up and stop. Kessler v. Washburn, 157 Ill. App. 532; Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., 180 Cal. 32, 179 Pac. 203, 15 A. L. R. 401.

[3] Although not shown in evidence, it may be accepted as a matter of judicial and general knowledge, as it doubtless was by the court below as a fact in the case that both South Main street and Eighth street, in the city of Los Angeles, are business thoroughfares which, at the hour at which the accident in question occurred, are usually congested with pedestrians and vehicular travel of all kinds. Varcoe v. Lee, 180 Cal. 338, 181 Pac. 223, and Fifth Ave. Coach Co. v. New

[4] The place of the accident, at the intersection of a busy street in the downtown business section, the time of its occurrence, 1:20 in the afternoon of Saturday; the custom of stopping the street car at the point of the accident to permit pedestrians to pass—are all circumstances which make the question of the negligence of the defendants one of fact and not of law which should have been submitted to the jury for deliberation.

[5] It is further contended by respondents that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to exercise a proper degree of care for her own safety. In this behalf it is argued that plaintiff, as a matter of law, was in duty bound to look towards the north to see if any automobile was approaching, and, further, that had she so looked she necessarily must have seen respondent's on-coming car unless her view was obstructed. That is to say, it is insisted if she could have seen the approaching automobile and did not she was negligent, and that if her view was obstructed she was negligent, as a matter of law, in leaving a place of safety and attempting to cross the street.

There is no evidence showing as a matter of law that plaintiff could have seen the machine on her right, or that she heedlessly or carelessly stepped into the path of the moving automobile. There was nothing to warn her that the automobile would turn in toward the car track immediately upon passing the car. She had not passed clear of the car rails, concededly under the circumstances a place of safety, and while she could without effort have seen the traffic to her left, from which source there was no danger, her view to the right must of necessity have been obstructed by the standing car, making it extremely difficult, if not impossible, for her to have observed a vehicle approaching, as was defendant's automobile, in such close proximity to the car. Even had she seen the approaching automobile, she could not have avoided being struck, for the machine, less than 20 feet away and traveling at the rate of 22 feet a second, would have been upon her before she could draw back after first sighting it.

[6] It was not negligence as a matter of law under the circumstances of this case on the part of Mrs. Reaugh to attempt to cross the street merely because her view to the right was obstructed by the street car. To require a pedestrian to refrain from crossing a busy street intersection in the business section of a large city during a rush hour until the street is free from obstructions would be to require more than ordinary care, and to impose upon such pedestrian the degree of care applicable in all its strictness only to travelers at a railroad crossing in looking out for approaching trains. That such a degree of care was imposed upon pedestrians was negated in Mann v. Scott, 180 Cal. 550, 182 Pac. 281, wherein the rules of law with regard to the respective rights and obligations of persons using the public streets were considered by this court, and it was there held that there was no positive duty on the part of pedestrians about to cross a street to stop, look and listen, and that the question of negligence, under the usual rule of ordinary care that devolved on pedestrians, must be examined and applied in the light of all the attending circumstances. From the position of the defendant's automobile with reference to its proximity to the street car shortly before striking the plaintiff, coupled with the fact that plaintiff, having been partly within the space between the two rails just before she was struck, could scarcely have advanced her left foot a distance of 3 feet beyond the outer rail, it is a fair inference that the automobile just before it struck the plaintiff was swinging in toward and closer to the car tracks, thereby lessening the distance between the auto and the rails. Another of the attending circumstances of the instant case was the usual practice of stopping street cars at that particular point to permit pedestrians to pass. There was no reason for plaintiff to anticipate that an automobile would suddenly emerge from a concealed position, going at the rate of 15 miles an hour. McMullen v. Davenport, 44 Cal. App. 695, 186 Pac. 796. On the contrary, plaintiff was justified in assuming that the street car had stopped for the purpose of permitting passengers to board the same or alight therefrom, and that therefore motor vehicles traveling to the right of and in the same direction of the street car would, in keeping with the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, be driven not closer than 6 feet from the running board or steps of such car. Mann v. Scott, supra. If the defendant Wells had been driving the automobile in question at the prescribed distance of 6 feet from the street car, as plaintiff had a right to assume in view of all the attending circumstances, there would, of course, have been no accident, for it is apparent that in such a situation the defendant could not have failed to observe the plaintiff, and she would have had ample opportunity to have seen and avoided the on-coming automobile.

[7] Contributory negligence is a question of law only when the court is impelled to say that from the facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his injury. Zibbell v. S. P. Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513; Wing v. Western Pacific, 41 Cal. App. 251, 182 Pac. 969; Bailey v. Market St. Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 320, 328, 42 Pac. 914.

Under the evidence stated the question of the negligence of the defendant and that of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff were clearly questions of fact for the determination of the jury. The motion for a nonsuit was therefore improperly granted.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

BIGELOW et al. v. MERZ.

(Civ. 4211; S. F. 9976.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 5, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 3, 1922.)

1. Waters and water courses ☞100—Riparian owner is limited to reasonable use of stream arising on his land.

The fact that the stream in controversy is a small one rising from springs on the lands of one of the parties does not give the owner of the land on which it rises any greater riparian rights than he would have in the case of other streams, if there is a water course flowing through a defined channel, but he is limited to a reasonable use thereof, having due regard to the rights of other riparian owners farther down the stream.

2. Waters and water courses ☞87—Testimony that defendant's diversion prevented water from reaching plaintiff authorized denial of nonsuit in suit for injunction.

In an action between riparian owners, defendant's motion for nonsuit was properly denied, notwithstanding his evidence that more water was flowing in the stream below the lowest point at which he diverted any therefrom than farther up, where plaintiff testified that no water flowed through his land when defendant was diverting it above, but a sufficient supply reached him when defendant was not diverting it.

3. Waters and water courses ☞87—Reservation in apportionment of water, giving riparian owners right to bring subsequent proceedings, held not erroneous.

In a suit to enjoin the unreasonable use of water by an upper riparian owner, where the court found plaintiffs were entitled to a portion of the water, but that the evidence did not establish the facts on which an apportionment could be based, a reservation in the decree giving either party the right to institute subsequent proceedings for apportionment of water was not erroneous, as casting a cloud on defendant's title, since it merely stated what would have been the legal effect of the decree, in the absence of such reservation.

4. Appeal and error ☞1071(5)—Findings on issues immaterial to judgment are not prejudicial.

In an action to enjoin the unreasonable use of water by an upper riparian owner, findings by the trial court that at times defendant diverted the whole of the water, and fixing the amount of the water used by plaintiff, if erroneous because not supported by evidence, were immaterial to a decree establishing plaintiff's right to a reasonable portion of the water, but not fixing the apportionment.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

5. Trial $\Leftarrow$ 388(3)—Formal findings need not accompany denial of nonsuit after trial to the court.

Where a cause is tried to the court and a motion for nonsuit is made at the close of plaintiff's evidence, on which decision is postponed for further consideration, and it is not decided until after defendant's evidence has been introduced, formal findings of fact are not necessary to a decision of the motion under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 632, 633.

6. Judgment $\Leftarrow$ 23—Mere announcement or order for judgment for defendant can be disregarded, and the judgment rendered for plaintiff.

Where no formal judgment was rendered, but the court merely announced, as shown by the minutes, that judgment would be given for defendant that plaintiffs take nothing by their suit, the court was at liberty thereafter to disregard the informal announcement or order, and render judgment for plaintiffs without formally setting aside the announcement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action by Guy J. K. Bigelow and others against G. Merz, to enjoin interference with flow of water. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. Z. Blakeman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

R. M. Barrett, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought to enjoin the defendant from interfering with the flow of water from his land to that of the plaintiffs. The complaint set forth that the plaintiffs and the defendant were the owners of lands riparian to a stream of water having its source in springs situated upon certain described land and upon the land of the defendant, and flowing thence down to and upon the plaintiffs' lands; that said plaintiffs had for a number of years used a specified amount of the water of said stream for domestic purposes and for irrigation, and that it was necessary that they have the continued use of said water; that the defendant had diverted the whole thereof for his own purposes, and prayed for an injunction against him to prevent such diversion. The prayer of the complaint also contained a demand that the court apportion the waters of said stream among the parties to the action. The answer denied the material allegations of the complaint with certain exceptions, and set forth that the water diverted by the defendant came entirely from springs arising upon his own land, and that the only water which reached the plaintiffs after the run-off of the winter rains had ceased was such as the defendant permitted occasionally to escape from his dams constructed to impound the waters of said springs. It also set up the claim that the right to the use of the water flowing from said springs belonged solely to the defendant as the owner of the land upon which they arose, and that no other person whatever had a right to the use of any of said water save and except and only to the extent that the defendant permitted any of it to escape from his said land, and claimed the right also to prevent such escape.

The court found that there was a creek flowing through the lands of the defendant and the plaintiffs, taking its source from seepage and percolating waters and in springs located on defendant's land, and flowing thence in a well-defined water course on, to, and through the lands of the plaintiffs; that the lands or portions of them of all the parties to the suit are riparian to said stream, and that each of said parties is entitled to a reasonable share of the water thereof for household and domestic purposes, for watering stock and for irrigation. It further found that the defendant had by means of dams, reservoirs, and a system of pipes diverted and appropriated the full flow of said water, but had not used the whole thereof for household or domestic purposes or for watering stock or irrigating land, permitting some to go to waste. Among the findings of the court is one to the effect that—

"The evidence introduced at the trial is insufficient to enable the court to determine the extent of the riparian rights of each of the parties to said action, and by reason of such insufficiency of evidence the question of determining the proportions of water to which each party is entitled is left open as an undetermined issue, which may hereafter be determined in a proceeding brought by either or any of the parties to this action, or the successor in interest of such party or parties, for such purpose."

As a conclusion of law the court decreed that each of the parties to the action is a riparian owner in and to the waters of said creek, and entitled to an undetermined portion thereof, and that neither party take judgment against the other for costs.

The defendant appeals, and makes several contentions in support thereof, the first of which relates to the action of the court upon a motion for nonsuit which the defendant made at the conclusion of the plaintiffs' case. The motion was not immediately acted upon, but was taken under advisement, and at a time some months before the filing of the findings of fact above referred to the court made an order, which was entered in its minutes, that "Judgment be, and the same is hereby given the defendant, plaintiffs to take nothing by action." It is contended by the appellant that this order was in effect the granting of his motion for nonsuit, and that the court had no jurisdiction thereafter to make findings of fact in conflict with said order without first vacating it on notice to the defendant.

This order did not purport in terms to be a disposition of defendant's motion for nonsuit, but an order for judgment in his favor. But, since there was a trial the court was required, in the absence of a waiver by the parties, to give its decision in writing and file the same with the clerk. Code Civ. Proc., § 632. Such decision, setting forth separately the facts found and the conclusions of law, forms the basis of the judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 633); and until rendered in accordance with those sections of the Code there is no authority for entering judgment. Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 486, 26 Pac. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491; Delger v. Jacobs, 19 Cal. App. 197, 207, 125 Pac. 258. Being an order for judgment merely, it was not final nor binding; and the decision in writing subsequently filed with the clerk, being inconsistent with such order, superseded it.

It is next contended by the appellant that the motion for nonsuit should have been granted. The grounds advanced for this contention are: First, that the evidence, as he contends, shows that the only water diverted by him in the summer time was used on his own land for beneficial purposes, and was from the springs and creek which arose within and on his own land; and, second, that more water flowed in the creek past the lowest point of diversion by defendant than flowed at any point above, and the water flowing past said lowest point of diversion was not obstructed or interfered with by the defendant, but flowed on down the course of the creek toward plaintiffs' lands.

[1] As to the first ground, it is based upon the assumption that, since the source of the water was upon defendant's own land, he had the right to use the whole of it for beneficial purposes; and this idea is reproduced in his argument that his rights with regard to said water were not riparian in character, nor could the plaintiffs have any riparian rights therein. The contention is seriously advanced that a landowner cannot be riparian to a stream which has its source within and upon his land; and is attempted to be supported by the following quotations from decisions of the Supreme Court:

"The right of a riparian proprietor in or to the waters of a stream flowing through or along his land is not * * * right of ownership in or to those waters." Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 77, 41 Pac. 18, 30 L. R. A. 390.

A riparian proprietor has no "title or ownership in the water of a stream before it reaches his land," and has "no title to the water except as it passed in front of his land and constituted a stream." Duckworth v. Watsonville, 150 Cal. 525, 89 Pac. 338.

"It is held by * * * all the better authorities that the right of the riparian owner to the natural flow of the stream by or across his land, in its accustomed channel, is an incident to his estate." Benton v. Johncox, 17 Wash. 277, 49 Pac. 495, 39 L. R. A. 107, 61 Am. St. Rep. 912.

"All riparian owners through or by the side of whose land a stream naturally flows may enjoy the privilege of using it." Kinney on Irrigation and Water Rights (2d Ed.) vol. 1, § 455.

It is obvious that these citations do not support the contention of the appellant, and, indeed, the rule is otherwise.

"Water in a spring is water in a water course, however small, if it runs in a defined channel with a tendency to regularity." 1 Wiel, Water Rights (3d Ed.) § 336.

"Under the common law, each riparian proprietor had a right to ordinary use for domestic purposes of water flowing in a defined stream past or through his land. In the case of Geddeis v. Parish, 1 Wash. 587, 21 Pac. 314, the Supreme Court of Washington Territory held that a lower riparian owner was entitled to, and could exercise, this right, even though the waters of such stream originated in a spring upon the land of the person seeking to divert them from the natural channel." Nielson v. Sponer, 46 Wash. 14, 89 Pac. 155, 123 Am. St. Rep. 910.

"If the stream flows at its source by the operation of nature, that is, if it is a natural stream, the rights and liabilities of the party owning the land at its source are the same as those of the proprietors in the course below." Broom's Legal Maxims (8th Ed.) p. 297.

As to both such owners those rights must be exercised with due regard to the rights of others, and the situation is one to which has been applied the maxim: Enjoy your own property in such a manner as not to injure that of another person; "sic utere tuo," etc. This rule, so far from being departed from, has been extended in California to percolating waters. Cohen v. La Canada Land, etc., Co., 142 Cal. 437, 76 Pac. 47. The claim, therefore, of the appellant to a paramount and exclusive right is untenable.

[2] The second point made by the appellant under his contention that his motion for nonsuit should have been granted, namely, that the evidence showed that more water flowed in the creek past the lowest point of diversion by the defendant than flowed in the creek at any point above, has little significance, in view of the testimony of plaintiff Bigelow tending to show that when the defendant was not diverting the water it reached his land, and he was able to procure an ample supply, but that when the defendant's dams and diverting pipes were in full operation no water reached him. Upon the motion for nonsuit the court of necessity accepted this testimony as true, together with its legitimate inferences.

[3] A further point is made by the appellant that the judgment is not in accord with or supported by the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issues. This objection has reference to a provision of the judgment to the effect that—

"Either or any of the parties hereto or his or her successor in interest may hereafter bring and maintain an action or proceeding for the purpose of determining the quantity or proportion of water that such party or parties are legally entitled to use for beneficial and useful purposes."

The occasion of this provision of the judgment was the demand contained in the prayer of the complaint that the court apportion the waters of the stream among the parties to the action. It is urged that the effect of this provision is to cloud and tie up indefinitely the title to the defendant's land. We see little merit in this contention. We do not perceive how it gives to any of the parties any right which they would not have had if such provision had been omitted from the judgment. In effect the court merely denied part of the relief sought, namely, a specific apportionment of the water basing its denial upon lack of facts necessary to enable it to make such apportionment. It found the issues in favor of the plaintiffs. Those issues were the ownership of land by each of the parties to the action riparian to a certain stream of water, and the necessity and convenience for each of them to use a reasonable portion of such water. If in the subsequent exercise by any of the parties of the rights confirmed or given by such decree it should become necessary to seek a specific apportionment, the right to such relief would spring from the fact of riparian ownership, and would necessarily exist independent of the clause of the decree reserving such right. If this be so, reservation of that right in terms does not cloud the defendant's title to his land. A similar provision in a decree adjudging riparian rights was upheld in Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 58 Pac. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158; Coleman v. Le Franc, 137 Cal. 214, 69 Pac. 1011; Strong v. Baldwin, 154 Cal. 150, 97 Pac. 178, 129 Am. St. Rep. 149.

[4] Finally, complaint is made by the appellant that material parts of the findings are not supported by the evidence, citing as examples the finding that at a given time the defendant diverted the whole of the water of the creek in question to his own uses, and also a finding as to the amount of said water used by the plaintiff Bigelow. Assuming this criticism by the appellant to be justified, it avails him nothing, since the judgment actually entered does not depend upon such findings. The judgment determines only that the lands of the plaintiffs and defendant are riparian, and that each has a right to a reasonable use of the stream. The findings attacked are immaterial to the judgment actually entered; and therefore, if erroneous, would afford no ground for reversal. Zihn v. Zihn, 153 Cal. 405, 95 Pac. 868.

Judgment affirmed.

Opinion of the Supreme Court in Bank.
Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for rehearing in the Supreme Court is denied.

[5] In so far as the opinion of the District Court of Appeal may seem to imply that, when a motion for a nonsuit is submitted to the court at the close of the plaintiff's evidence and a decision thereon is postponed for further consideration, and it is not decided until after the defendant's evidence has been introduced, formal findings are necessary to accomplish a decision of such motion, we cannot approve of it. It is true that a formal judgment against the plaintiff must be entered, but no findings are necessary.

[6] In the present case, however, no such judgment was entered, and the announcement which the minutes indicate that the court made prior to its final decision in the case cannot be considered as a judgment on the motion for nonsuit, nor as anything more than a mere announcement or order. Never having been entered as a judgment, the court was at liberty to disregard it and render a judgment contrary thereto.

PEOPLE v. WHITESIDE. (Cr. 873.)

1. False pretenses —34—Allegation held to charge that defendant received money.

In an indictment for obtaining money by false pretenses, an allegation that another was induced to pay over and deliver to defendant $3,000 in money meant that defendant received the money.

2. Criminal law —370, 371(3)—Evidence of similar false representation held admissible to show knowledge and intent.

Evidence of similar false representations made by defendant to the same person for the purpose of obtaining property, or to others shortly before or after the representations for which defendant was on trial, is admissible to prove either defendant's knowledge of their falsity, or a criminal intent, or both, and in a false pretenses prosecution evidence of similar statements made to the publisher of a newspaper two months after the transactions charged in the indictment was admissible.

3. Criminal law —1036(5)—Objection that evidence given without objection was hearsay cannot first be urged on appeal.

In a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, where witness stated that his account was debited with a check for $3,000 which he had given defendant and produced the check and showed that it was indorsed by defendant and was marked as paid, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 20, it might be presumed that the check had been paid from the bank account of the witness, which testimony having been given without objection, defendant cannot urge first on appeal that it was hearsay.

4. False pretenses —9—Reliance on representations need not be sole cause of parting with money.

In a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, though the evidence must show beyond a reasonable doubt that the witness believed the representations were true and relied upon them, such representations need not be shown to have been the sole cause of parting with his money.

5. False pretenses —14—Proof of offense complete when shown that witness parted with money.

The proof of the offense is complete when it has been shown that the prosecuting witness was induced to part with his money or property in reliance upon fraudulent representations of defendant, and it was not a defense to show that the victims had sold stock received by them.

6. False pretenses —49(1)—Corroboration may be of similar statements made to others.

In view of Pen. Code, § 1110, requiring, in trials for cheating by false pretenses, proof by two witnesses, on corroboration, the corroboration may consist of statements made to others similar in character to the fraudulent ones relied upon by the witness.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

B. D. Whiteside was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Muhleman & Crump and Ford & Bodkin, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Lorrin Andrews, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CRAIG, J. The defendant was convicted on three counts of an information, each of which charged obtaining money by false pretenses. He was the president and manager of the Montebello Oil Company No. 1. Soon after he became acquainted with John R. Crowley and his wife, defendant told them that he had three oil wells at Montebello; that his first well was giving 5,000 barrels a day and that he had two other wells about to come in; that the Union and Standard Oil Companies were piping the first well off for him; that all there was for him to do was to check it up every week or month; that his oil was of the finest grade in all California. On June 10th the Crowleys sold a lease and furniture of an apartment house, which they owned, to the defendant. On June 20th defendant requested the Crowleys to come to his office. This was on a Sunday. He told them that he appreciated the sale of the lease to him, and that he wanted to do something nice for them; that a friend in the East had sent him 3,000 shares of stock in an oil company; that the well had run one week, giving 3,000 barrels a day; that he had capped it; that his friend did not know that the oil well was flowing; that, if the Crowleys wanted the stock, the defendant would let them have it at cost; that the defendant could go out on the street and obtain $6,000 for it, but that he wanted to do them a favor. Crowley stated that he had no money except what he had received for the lease, and that he wanted to keep that to buy an apartment house. Defendant said that he would let them have an apartment house after July 10th, and that while they were waiting they could make $10,000 by buying the oil stock. Crowley said that he knew nothing about oil stock, to which the defendant replied that he was 62 years old and had never wronged any one; that he and his wife were living only to help others; that he had all the wealth he needed. Crowley gave the defendant his check for $3,000 on the Security Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles and received a certificate of stock from the defendant. Later, on the 9th of July, Whiteside asked Crowley to turn over the stock to him, saying that he could sell it for a lot of money. On the following day defendant called at Crowley's house and was given the stock. At this time he gave Crowley $200 in cash and a note for $2,800, stating that the note was security for the stock, and that he could get lots more money for it by sending the stock back to Iowa, but that it would take six or seven days before his agent in Iowa could return the stock or the money. Crowley never received his money, nor the return of his stock, although he later demanded an accounting of Whiteside, but was told that he (Crowley) had no interest in the company and would have to go to court to get his money. The principal facts testified to by witnesses for the people were disputed by the defendant. There was substantial evidence to show that the defendant's representations to the effect that Montebello oil well No. 1 had flowed 5,000 barrels were false; that neither the Union nor Standard Oil Companies ever piped any of the oil from defendant's wells or made any arrangement to do so; that such oil as flowed from defendant's well No. 1 was intermingled with water and mud and was not the finest in California, but, on the contrary, was of a low gravity.

Concerning the charge set forth in the second and third counts of the information, it appears that defendant stated to Godfrey and Berkeley that oil well No. 1 was a gusher; that, if he should remove the steel cap from the well, the whole valley in which the well was situated would be flooded with oil; that the well had a 3,000-barrel capacity per day when first brought in and would settle down into at least 2,000 barrels; that the oil was of high gravity and had been contracted for and sold to the Standard and Union Oil Companies; and that the Standard Oil Company was to pipe the oil off. Godfrey testified that, basing his action upon these representations, he gave the defendant a check for $600 on the Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles, which was subsequently indorsed by defendant, paid, and debited to Godfrey's account. Berkeley heard the same statements and gave a check for the sum of $400 on the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, which he testified was indorsed by Whiteside and also paid and debited against Berkeley's account. Both received stock in Montebello Oil Company No. 1 for their checks. In addition to the falsity of the representations already mentioned, it appears that the well referred to never did more than run over the surface two or three inches with water, oil, and mud. The defendant controverted the material parts of the testimony given against him, and especially that he had made the representations of fact concerning the transaction with Crowley. He testified that he did not sell the stock, but had merely borrowed $3,000 from Crowley which he had offered to repay, but that Crowley did not want the money.

[1] It is claimed that appellant's objection to the introduction of evidence in support of the first and third counts should have been sustained. The objection was based on the ground that these counts failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. The part of the first count of the information which is under criticism in this regard reads as follows:

"That the said John R. Crowley * * * was induced * * * to pay over and deliver to the said B. D. Whiteside $3,000 in money."

There is no direct allegation in this count that John R. Crowley actually paid over and delivered $3,000 or anything else to B. D. Whiteside, or that Whiteside obtained anything from Crowley. It is obvious that, regardless of the false pretenses which the defendant may have made which were persuasive enough to have amounted to an inducement to Crowley to pay over and deliver money, no crime was committed unless Crowley in fact paid the money over and delivered it to the defendant.

In each of the cases cited by the people to sustain the pleading in question there is a positive allegation that property was obtained by the defendant. In People v. Griesheimer, 176 Cal. 48, 167 Pac. 522, the language used was "did then and there deliver." In People v. Flowers (Cal. App.) 201 Pac. 468, it was, that was "paid to appellant the sum of $130." In People v. Haas, 28 Cal. App. 182, 151 Pac. 672, it was "did sell and dispose of." A good pleader would not fail to make a direct allegation in charging an offense of this nature that property was in fact obtained by the defendant. However, in State v. Brown, 143 Wis. 405, 127 N. W. 956, an indictment containing similar language was held sufficient against an attack upon the same ground as in the case at bar. In that case the language was "did * * * induce said Marinette county to pay." It was there held that these words would, in their ordinary acceptance, be held to mean that the defendant obtained the money. The same may be said of the words used in the instant case. They convey the meaning that Whiteside received the money charged to have been obtained by false pretenses. The evidence shows clearly that he did receive it, and that his case was not prejudiced by the lack of directness in the pleading. Therefore we conclude that as to this ground the judgment must be sustained. What we have said as to the first count applies also to count No. 3 in so far as the objection to the introduction of evidence is concerned.

[2] The witness Stivers, the editor of a newspaper published in Montebello, was permitted to testify that in August, 1920, two months after the transactions charged in the various counts of the indictment had taken place, the defendant came to the office of the paper and said that "he had a perfectly dry hole producing pure oil"; that he gave the gravity as 30 or 32 gravity and said that the well would run around 2,000 barrels a day. It is claimed that the trial court erred in admitting this evidence over the objection of the defendant because of the remoteness in point of time of the conversation from the acts for the commission of which the defendant was convicted. While the cases in other jurisdictions are not uniform, the better rule would seem to be that the admission of evidence of similar representations is not to be determined so much by the time they were made as by their relevancy and tendency to show criminal intent and guilty knowledge in the making of the pretenses upon which the prosecution is predicated. People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 472, 98 Pac. 194; People v. Emmons, 13 Cal. App. 497, 110 Pac. 151. In these and other California cases, where proof of similar offenses has been upheld, the element of time has been given no particular consideration. Of course, proof may be made also of other false representations than those made in connection with the crime under investigation where they tend to establish a plan and scheme to defraud, thus also involving proof of guilty knowledge and criminal intent. The general rule is stated in 16 Corpus Juris, § 1162, as follows:

"Evidence of similar false representations made by defendant to the same person for the purpose of obtaining property, or to others shortly before or after the representations for which defendant is on trial, is admissible to prove either defendant's knowledge of their falsity or a criminal intent, or both."

In the instant case the statements testified to by Stivers might fairly be regarded as additional evidence of a general scheme to defraud anyone who might be directly or indirectly induced to buy stock. It might also be reasonably inferred that, if defendant made these statements to Stivers which were shown to be false and at a time when he must have been aware of their falsity, the statements made to Crowley, Godfrey, and Berkeley were also made with knowledge of their falsity and with an intent to defraud. Such an inference might fairly have been drawn by the jury. Therefore proof of the statement made to Stivers was relevant to issues necessarily involved in the decision of each of the charges contained in the information in the instant case. If viewed with respect to its relevancy as tending to show that the facts constituting the charge contained in the information were a part of a scheme to defraud the public as distinguished from a single individual, it was not necessary, in order that Stivers' testimony be admissible, that an attempt be shown to have been made to sell him any stock or that the evidence, if accepted as true, should tend to show the commission of an offense like in character to the one charged. State v. Briggs, 74 Kan. 377, 86 Pac. 447, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 281, 10 Ann. Cas. 904.

[3] Appellant's third contention is clearly untenable. Crowley testified that he had an account at the Security Trust & Savings Bank; that the account was debited with the check for $3,000 which he had given Whiteside. The check was produced and showed that it was indorsed "B. D. Whiteside," and was marked on the back as paid. From this it might be presumed that the check had been paid from the bank account of Crowley. Such a result would be expected from the ordinary course of business. Section 1963, Code Civ. Proc. subd. 20. Crowley's testimony that his account was debited with the check was given without objection. Appellant now insists that this was hearsay and should have been disregarded by the jury and must be excluded by this court in reviewing the matter on appeal. If the evidence in this regard was hearsay, counsel for the defendant had every opportunity to bring the fact out on cross-examination. Crowley's testimony that his account was debited with the check is uncontradicted and unimpeached, and therefore the jury had the right to conclude that Whiteside received the money as alleged in the information, and that he secured it by cashing the check given him by Crowley. People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 473, 98 Pac. 194. The testimony of Godfrey and Berkeley in support of this phase of the charges, as set forth in the second and third counts, is substantially the same as that of Crowley.

[4] Appellant insists that there is absolutely no testimony that Crowley was induced to part with his property by reason of any pretenses set forth in count No. 1 of the information. It is true that this prosecuting witness did not testify directly that he relied upon any particular representation which he said Whiteside made to him, nor did he name any such statement of Whiteside as the inducement which impelled him to part with his money. But he did testify that Whiteside had said concerning the well of Montebello Oil Company No. 1 that he had had it running for one week, and that it flowed 3,000 barrels of oil a day, and that he had capped it. The witness also recited that "we," meaning Mrs. Crowley and himself, told the defendant that they had never owned any oil stock, and that this was practically all the money they had, and they did not want anything that was not perfectly good; that defendant said he could get $6,000 for the stock on the street, but wanted to do something nice for the Crowleys. As claimed by appellant, there was also talk about the resale of the stock and the purchase of an apartment house by the Crowleys from the defendant, he having given them an assurance that they could make $10,000 by buying the stock while waiting for the apartment house, and that he would sell it to them even though they did not have a cent to pay on it. Although the evidence must show beyond a reasonable doubt that the prosecuting witness believed the representations were true and relied upon them, such representations need not be shown to have been the sole cause of his parting with his money. This and the question as to what representation or consideration influenced his action is one for the jury. Underhill on Criminal Evidence (2d Ed.) § 442. In the instant case the evidence warranted the jury in concluding that the complaining witness believed the representations made by White-side and was thereby induced to deliver to him the check, which was later cashed.

[5] Appellant's contention that, because Godfrey and Berkeley resold their stock, they were not injured, and that therefore the offense charged was not shown to have been committed, is squarely met by People v. Bryant, 119 Cal. 595, 51 Pac. 960. In that decision the principle is clearly stated that the proof of the offense is complete when it is shown that the prosecuting witness is induced to part with his money or property in reliance upon the fraudulent pretenses of the accused.

[6] Appellant next contends that the testimony of Godfrey is not sustained because it was not corroborated as required by section 1110 of the Penal Code. This corroboration may consist, as it did in the instant case, of statements made to others similar in character to the fraudulent ones relied upon by the prosecuting witness. People v. Wymer (Cal. App.) 199 Pac. 815. The witnesses Crowley, Mrs. Crowley, Stivers, and Manners all testified to such corroborative statements which we think are sufficient to comply with the requirements of section 1110 of the Penal Code.

No error of a prejudicial character appearing to have been committed in the trial of the case, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MACKEY et al. (Cr. 869.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California. June 16, 1922.)

1. Criminal law § 823(9)—Instruction on unexplained possession of property held not erroneous, in view of other instructions.

In a prosecution for larceny, an instruction as to unexplained possession of stolen property as a circumstance of guilt held not erroneous, in view of the other instructions given.

2. Criminal law § 456, 465—Witnesses § 327—Question as to whether witness was subject to delusions held improper.

In a prosecution for larceny, a question asked the divorced wife of a witness for the prosecution as to whether she had noticed during their married life that her husband was subject to delusions was improper, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, providing how witnesses may be impeached, and section 1870, subd. 10, providing that the court may receive opinions as to the sanity of a person if the reason for the opinion is given, and where the witnesses had been separated for 2½ years.

3. Witnesses § 345(4)—Record showing where witness had pleaded guilty to a felony held inadmissible after passing through probation period.

Under Pen. Code, § 1203, providing that a person convicted of a felony may be placed on probation, and shall be released from all penalties and disabilities after fulfilling the conditions of the probation, the record of conviction of such a person is inadmissible as impeaching evidence under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, when acting as a witness in another action after passing through the probationary period.

4. Criminal law § 1186(4)—Refusal to permit witness to give version of conversation between defendant and another regarding purchase of the property stolen held error.

In a prosecution for the theft of calves, the refusal to permit a witness to give his version of a conversation he overheard between defendant and another person after defendant had detailed the conversation, which conversation evidenced a contract for the purchase of the calves by defendant from the other person, was reversible error, notwithstanding Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

James Mackey and Albert Mackey were prosecuted for larceny. James Mackey was acquitted, and Albert Mackey was found guilty. From the judgment of conviction, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant Albert Mackey appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Harry W. Horton, of El Centro, and Ernest R. Utley, of Calexico, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Arthur W. Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. Defendants, who are brothers, were informed against together and were tried together for the larceny of 14 calves from the ranch of one Forsberg. Defendant James Mackey was acquitted of the charge, but defendant Albert Mackey was found guilty. The latter appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The stolen calves were in the possession of defendants at the time of their arrest, and at the trial appellant testified to a state of facts which, if the jury had believed him, would have amounted to a sufficient explanation of defendants' possession of the calves. The trial court gave to the jury the following instruction:

"The mere possession of stolen property, unexplained by the defendants, however soon after the taking, is not sufficient to justify a conviction; it is merely a guilty circumstance, which, taken in connection with other testimony, is to determine the question of guilt. Yet, if you believe from the evidence that the defendants were found in the possession of the property described in the evidence, or claiming to be the owner thereof, this is a circumstance tending in some degree to show guilt, but not sufficient, standing alone, and unsupported by other evidence, to warrant you in finding them guilty. There must be, in addition to proof of possession of property stolen, proof of corroborating circumstances tending of themselves to establish guilt. These corroborating circumstances may consist of acts or conduct or declarations of the defendant, or testimony of other witnesses, or any other circumstances tending to show the guilt of the defendants.

"If the jury believes from the evidence the property mentioned in evidence, to wit, 14 calves, were stolen, and was seen in the possession of the defendants shortly after being stolen, the failure of the defendants to satisfactorily account for such possession, or to show that such possession was honestly obtained, is a circumstance tending to show their guilt, and the defendants are bound to explain the possession in order to remove the effect of the possession as a circumstance to be considered in connection with other suspicious facts, if the evidence disclose any such."

[1] Except as to minor and unimportant details, this instruction is identical with one approved by this court in People v. Alba (Cal. App.) 199 Pac. 894, but appellant nevertheless contends that the giving of the instruction was error. It will be noted that, in the opinion in People v. Alba, a certain instruction D9 is referred to as in some degree clarifying the instruction in that case, which is practically a prototype of the instruction which we have quoted above as having been given in this case, the approval of the questioned instruction in People v. Alba being largely grounded on the fact that instruction D9 accompanied it. Appellant here contends that no instruction like D9 was given in the present case, and that is true; but an instruction did go to the jury in which they were told that—

"If all you find from the evidence here before you is that the defendants were found in possession of calves alleged and described in the information, you cannot find the defendants guilty of the charge here brought against them. The mere possession of stolen property is not sufficient to maintain a charge of grand larceny, but such possession, if in this case there is any evidence of such possession, must be corroborated by other evidence in some way connecting the defendants with the charge of larceny, sufficient to satisfy your minds beyond a reasonable doubt that they are guilty of the crime here brought against them, to wit, that of larceny, which, according to the Penal Code of the state of California, is the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading or driving away of personal property of another, and, unless you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that such evidence, if any such you find, is sufficient to corroborate the possession of stolen property, you cannot find the defendants guilty of the charge here brought against them."

When we come to consider the effect of the instruction to which exception is taken by appellant, we must view it in connection with the instruction just set forth above, as a matter of course. Taking the two together, it is apparent that the only cause for complaint on the part of appellant, if any there be, lies in the fact that the instruction to which objection is made contains in its first paragraph the words "unexplained by the defendants," and in its second the words, "the failure of the defendants to satisfactorily account for such possession, or to show that such possession was honestly obtained." Appellant contends that these two expressions amount to an instruction that appellant had actually failed to explain the possession of the calves by him. Undoubtedly, it were better if the trial court had framed the two expressions, respectively, thus:

"Unexplained by the defendants, if you find from the evidence that such possession has not been explained to your satisfaction," and "the failure of the defendants to satisfactorily account for such possession, or to show that such possession was honestly obtained, if it appears to you from the evidence that they have not satisfactorily accounted for such possession, or shown that such possession was honestly obtained."

Notwithstanding, however, that the assailed instruction was not as skillfully drawn as it might have been, we are not prepared to say that it was error to let it go to the jury in the form in which it was given. The jury was not actually told that appellant had failed to explain his possession of the calves. In truth, it was told in effect that, the defendants were "satisfactorily" to account for the possession to someone, and, a few lines further on in the instruction, that "the defendants are bound to explain the possession," etc., the italics being ours. All of these expressions as to an explanation of the possession must be construed together with instructions elsewhere given by the court. These were to the usual effect, that "It is the duty of the jury to decide whether the defendant be guilty or not guilty of the offense charged considering all the evidence submitted to you in the case"; that "it is your duty * * * to take into consideration all of the testimony given by the witnesses, and to weigh the same with care"; and that "the jury are the exclusive judges" of the credibility of witnesses. In addition to these stock expressions, the jury was instructed that—

"The interest of a defendant in the result of an action does not deprive him of the benefit of his own testimony. The law makes him a competent witness in his own behalf, and his testimony is entitled to consideration by you, the same as that of any other witness, and, in considering the defendant's testimony, you should be governed by the same rules that control you in weighing the testimony of other witnesses who have given testimony before you in this trial. A defendant in a criminal action is considered innocent until the prosecution establishes the contrary by convincing proof and beyond a reasonable doubt. His evidence is entitled to full credit when you believe that he has spoken the truth, and the evidence of such witness is sufficient proof to any fact to which you believe he has truthfully testified."

During the trial the defendants made a determined attempt to account by their testimony for the possession of the calves, as we have already observed. It was impossible for the jury not to have realized that this evidence showed an effort to make the "explanation" referred to in the instructions. Considering the several parts of the charge to the jury, which told its members of their functions as judges of the facts, and considering especially the instruction in which the jury was carefully and forcefully informed as to the attitude which it must hold toward the testimony of the defendants, it appears to us that its members must have understood clearly that the "explanation" was for their ears alone, and that the credence which was to be given it was for their exclusive judgment. We are convinced that the instruction of which complaint is made, despite the inaccuracies we have noticed in it, worked no prejudice to the rights of appellant, and that it was not error to give it, at least when all the instructions are taken together.

[2] Among the witnesses for the prosecution was one Leistikow. The divorced wife of this witness was called by the defense, and was asked if, during her married life with him, she had ever noticed that he was subject to "delusions—to see and tell things he never did see." An objection to the question was sustained, and the ruling is assigned as error. We can conceive of no theory upon which the question was proper. It was not an impeaching question, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, § 2051, providing how witnesses may be impeached. The query was not proper under subdivision 10 of section 1870 of the same Code, to the effect that on a trial the court may receive "the opinion of an intimate acquaintance respecting the mental sanity of a person, the reason for the opinion being given," as it did not call upon Mrs. Leistikow for an opinion respecting the "mental sanity" of her former husband. On the whole, the propounded inquiry was nothing but a call for the statement of a conclusion of the witness on the stand. Finally, it is to be noted that the question sought to elicit an answer concerning a state of facts existing, not at the time when Leistikow testified, but during the period of his married life with Mrs. Leistikow, the record showing that at the time of the trial the two had been separated for more than two and a half years.

[3] The next question to be considered is both novel and interesting. Ruston, the principal witness against appellant, had been charged with the commission of a felony, and had pleaded guilty to the charge. He had been admitted to probation, and his probationary period had been passed and he had been discharged prior to the trial of the present action. After his testimony against appellant had been received the defense offered in evidence the record in the case, in which he had entered a plea of guilty. This offer was made for the purpose of impeaching Ruston under the terms of the Code of Civil Procedure, § 2051, to the effect, in part, that a witness may be impeached by showing by "the record of the judgment that he had been convicted of a felony." Objection was made to the offer by the district attorney, and the objection was sustained. It is now contended that the ruling was erroneous.

It is provided in paragraph (5) of section 1203 of the Penal Code that, as to "every defendant who has fulfilled the conditions of his probation for the entire period thereof," "the court shall thereupon dismiss the accusation or information against such defendant, who shall thereafter be released from all penalties and disabilities resulting from the offense or crime of which he has been convicted." This legislative mandate seems somewhat akin to the common-law rule under which one who has been pardoned through the exercise of executive clemency for the commission of a criminal offense is made a "new man," the effect of a pardon being, among other things, as stated in an early case, "to remove from the offender that disability to testify as a witness in a court of justice which, by the rule of the common law, was consequent upon his conviction of a felony." People v. Bowen, 43 Cal. 439, 13 Am. Rep. 148. We have long ago departed from the rule referred to in this quotation—that is, the rule of the common law which rendered convicted felons incompetent as witnesses. This departure has been taken in many jurisdictions in this country, including our own, and the rule has been displaced with great uniformity by one allowing proof of the conviction of such persons as affecting their credibility when they are offered as witnesses. The question now to be determined is: Does section 1203, Penal Code, set aside the right to so impeach such a witness where, after conviction, he has been admitted to probation and has passed through the probationary period? If we look to the case of pardons for an analogy in answering this question we find that the granting of that executive clemency does not destroy the right thus to impeach. Undoubtedly the general rule is that, although the grant of a pardon makes a "new man" of the pardoned individual, his manhood is not revived to the extent that he may not be confronted with the record of his conviction whenever he testifies as a witness. Despite the pardon he is still a convicted felon whenever the right to impeach him as such is brought in question. 28 R. C. L. tit. "Witnesses," § 212; note to Rittenberg v. Smith, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 215. This, however, is far from settling the present question. The language which we have above taken from section 1203 is so strong and direct that it may destroy the right to impeach convicted felons who have been discharged after probation, notwithstanding that the exercise of the pardoning power in a given case does not have that effect. The bearing of section 1203 upon the present question turns upon the construction to be given to two words in it. Is a convicted felon's liability to impeachment by the production of the record against him to be regarded either as a "penalty" or as a "disability"? Webster defines the word "penalty" in part, as:

"Penal retribution; * * * the suffering in person, rights, or property which is annexed by law or judicial decision to the commission of a crime or public offense; * * * disadvantage, loss, or hardship due to some action, esp. to a transgression or error."

That lexicographer gives the following definition of "disability," quoting it in full:

"State of being disabled; deprivation or want of ability; absence of competent physical, intellectual, or moral power, means, fitness, or the like; an instance of such want or deprivation. Disabilities to perform what was covenanted.—Milton. Chatham refused to see him, pleading his disability.—Baneroft. Want of legal qualification to do a thing; legal incapacity, incompetency, or disqualification; also, an instance or cause of such incapacity."

If these two key words of section 1203 were to be taken alone, as thus defined, the liability of a convicted person to be impeached as a witness by the production of the record made against him probably could not be regarded as a disability, although that liability might justly be regarded as a penalty; but they are not to be taken alone. The two words are together to be given a broad and far-reaching construction, because the Legislature has coupled with their use the mandate that, where a convicted felon who has been admitted to probation has passed the period of probation, "the court shall thereupon dismiss the accusation or information against such defendant." Of course, after a dismissal in such a situation, the defendant involved, if not still a convicted felon, remains in a practical sense one who has been convicted of a felony. We cannot avoid the conclusion, however, that the Legislature intended in a legal sense, by directing a dismissal under such circumstances, to wipe out absolutely the entire proceeding in question in a given case, and to place the defendant in the position which he would have occupied in all respects as a citizen if no accusation or information had ever been presented against him. Such is the legal effect of the dismissal of a criminal charge before conviction, and we are convinced that the lawmaking body intended, by section 1203, that the same effect should attend a dismissal after conviction. This view seems the more just when we consider the introductory portion of section 1203, the italics being ours:

"After plea or verdict of guilty, where discretion is conferred upon the court as to the extent of the punishment, the court, upon oral suggestions of either party, or of its own motion, that there are circumstances which may properly be taken into view, either in aggravation or mitigation of the punishment, may in its discretion refer the same to the probation officer, directing said probation officer to investigate, and to report, recommending either for or against release upon probation, at a specified time."

On the whole, we conclude that the Legislature intended by the enactment of section 1203 that no convicted person discharged after probation thenceforth should be regarded as one possessed of the degree of turpitude likely to affect his credibility as a witness. The trial court did not err in excluding the record against Ruston.

Ruston was not present at the trial in the superior court, the testimony above referred to as given by him having been presented to the jury by means of a reading of the transcript of his testimony before the committing magistrate. At the trial appellant objected to the presentation of Ruston's testimony in that form, and now complains of its admission as error, the point made being that the district attorney failed to use due diligence in procuring the personal attendance of Ruston at the trial. That officer presented much testimony going to show the efforts pursued by him in an endeavor to locate and to serve subpoena upon the missing witness, and we have carefully read it all. Without reciting the contents of the record on the subject, we state our conclusion that sufficient diligence in the premises was shown, and that the trial court did not err in allowing the reading to the jury of Ruston's testimony given at the preliminary hearing.

[4] Having now considered all the points made by appellant which are likely to arise upon a new trial, with the exception of the one question which requires a reversal of the judgment, we now approach a discussion of that question. It is presented by a complaint which appellant makes of a palpable error committed by the trial court. Appellant when on the witness stand detailed a conversation between himself and Ruston which occurred on a certain day at the former's ranch. This conversation evidenced a contract for the purchase by appellant from Ruston of the calves which defendants were charged with having stolen, it therefore being directly explanatory of the possession of the calves by defendants at the time of their arrest, and, if believed by the jury, establishing the innocence of both defendants. Appellant also testified that the conversation occurred in the presence of one Wiley Johnson. The latter was called to the stand and testified that he was at the ranch on the day on which appellant had sworn that the conversation with Ruston took place. Johnson was then asked if he had overheard a conversation concerning calves between appellant and Ruston at the time and place which had been fixed by the former in his testimony, and he answered that he had. He was then asked to state the conversation. To this question the district attorney made the utterly untenable objection that it called for hearsay, and that appellant himself could testify to the conversation, "but no other person can testify to what he heard," and the objection was sustained. The Attorney General seeks to avoid the effect of this manifest error by asserting the claim, on two grounds, that the rights of appellant were not prejudiced by the ruling. The first of these grounds is that Johnson was permitted to testify that he had overheard the conversation between appellant and Ruston, although he was not allowed specifically to detail it, the jury thus being left to understand that Johnson vouched for the conversation as sworn to by appellant. We cannot adopt this view. In the first place, Johnson did not say that he had heard the conversation stated by appellant. Taking question and answer together, his only statement was that he overheard "a conversation concerning calves" between Ruston and appellant. Whether this was the same conversation detailed by appellant could only have been determined by the jury after Johnson had been permitted to give his version of it. This would seem to conclude the point, but it may be remarked further that, if the jury understood Johnson's answer to adopt the conversation as stated by appellant, the ruling of the court in effect told them to disregard anything coming from Johnson as to the subject-matter of it. This erroneous view was presented to the jury three times by the trial judge, the question having arisen twice when Johnson was on the witness stand at different times, and in the third instance when the father of appellant was a witness, and was apparently about to detail the conversation between Ruston and his son.

As a second ground upon which to avoid the effect of the error of the trial court in excluding Johnson's testimony as to the subject-matter of the conversation between appellant and Ruston the Attorney General points to section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, providing that no judgment shall be set aside or new trial granted "unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." In view of this contention of the Attorney General, we have read carefully the voluminous record made in the trial of the case. After that reading we cannot uphold the contention. There was a sharp conflict on practically every material point in the evidence. Both defendants denied strenuously that they had committed the crime with which they were charged, and they denied specifically the various items of evidence offered to fasten the offense upon them. Aside from some slight testimony by Leistikow, the only direct evidence of appellant's guilt was the testimony of Ruston, who, be it known, was originally charged jointly with the Mackeys with the theft of the calves, the charge against him having been dismissed before the preliminary hearing. Ruston's reputation for veracity was impeached by several witnesses. The credibility of Leistikow was assailed in the same manner, and by an equal number of witnesses. On the face of the record a perfect alibi was established as to both defendants by at least four witnesses, this evidence being substantially corroborated by a fifth witness as to some of its features. Although there was but little difference in the evidence as to the two defendants, the testimony of Ruston being equally incriminating as to both, defendant James Mackey was acquitted, while appellant was convicted. After declaring appellant's guilt, the verdict contained the statement: "The jury ask leniency."

Both of the defendants appear to have been men of business standing in Imperial Valley, where the theft of the calves occurred. They owned a dairy in the valley at which from 90 to 105 cows were being milked at the time of the theft with which they were charged. No attempt was made to impeach their veracity. Under all these circumstances, it is quite possible that an acquittal of appellant might have resulted if he had been allowed the benefit of the corroboration of Wiley Johnson as to the conversation he had detailed as having occurred between Ruston and himself. As far as the record discloses, Johnson was a disinterested witness, and his testimony, if given, might very well have turned the tide in favor of appellant. We must say, as a final consideration in disposing of this question, that a reading of the record in the cause leaves us with grave doubts as to the guilt of appellant. The jury may have had good cause to view the question differently, as they had the opportunity of observing the appearance and demeanor of the various witnesses in giving their testimony. This opportunity is, of course, denied us. We can view the evidence only as the pages of the typewritten record present it to us, and can determine the effect of the constitutional question upon that view alone as a basis. We are of the opinion that the case of the people is not aided by the provisions of section 4½ of article 6.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are reversed, and the cause is remanded.

WALKER et al. v. MATHEWS. (Civ. 2403.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 21, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐773(4)—Failure of appellant to file brief will be deemed an abandonment.

The failure of appellant to file a brief or otherwise present an argument in support of the appeal will be deemed an abandonment of the appeal, and the judgment appealed from will be affirmed.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1126—Where appellant files no brief, respondent may submit case on the record.

Where appellant fails to file a brief, that respondent failed to move to dismiss the appeal after notice given, did not affect his right to submit the case on the record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by A. T. Walker and Edward Keenan, doing business under the firm name and style of Walker & Keenan, against William Mathews. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

L. H. Hughes, of Quincy, for appellants.

J. J. Henderson, of Sacramento, and M. C. Kerr, of Quincy, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiffs brought this action to recover from the defendant certain personal property, or for judgment in the sum of $700, the alleged value thereof, the complaint charging that the defendant wrongfully obtained and likewise still retains the possession of certain cooking and kitchen utensils, consisting of a range, dishes, knives, forks, "counter tools," cash register, and "all restaurant equipment formerly used in the operation of a restaurant and lunch counter," the property of plaintiffs. The defendant, by answer, denied the allegations of the complaint, and, by way of special defense, alleged that the said property belonged to him: that the plaintiffs had wrongfully deprived him of its possession, and still wrongfully withhold possession thereof from him; that the property, when so wrongfully taken from his possession, was used by him in the carrying on of a restaurant, and that the wrongful acts of plaintiffs in so taking from him and detaining said property had caused him to suffer damage in the sum of $500. He asked for a judgment restoring to him the possession of said property, or, in lieu thereof, for the sum of $700, the alleged value thereof, and for damages in the sum of $500.

It appears that the property had been in the possession of the defendant and used by him for the purpose of carrying on the restaurant business as alleged in his answer and that the plaintiffs on bringing this action in claim and delivery by the aid of the sheriff took possession of the property.

The jury by whom the cause was tried awarded a verdict to the defendant by the terms of which the plaintiffs were to return to defendant said property or pay to defendant the sum of $700, found to be the value thereof, and also awarded defendant $250 as damages. Judgment was entered accordingly.

On the 12th day of May, 1921, the plaintiffs served and filed a notice of appeal from said judgment, and on August 21, 1921, the record on appeal was filed in this court. The appellants have filed no briefs in support of their appeal, although on November 30, 1921, they were given, by stipulation with the attorney for the defendant, until the 15th day of December, 1921, within which to file an opening brief, said stipulation having been committed to writing and so filed in this court. Nor did the appellants make any appearance by counsel or otherwise when the cause was regularly called for hearing and argument at the June term of this court, although due notice of the time fixed for such hearing and argument was given the attorney of record for the appellants. Therefore, when the cause was called for hearing at the time stated, the attorney for the defendant submitted the case upon the record.

[1, 2] The failure to file a brief or otherwise present an argument in support of the appeal must be construed as an abandonment of the appeal by the appellants, in which case we are justified in affirming the judgment. Counsel for the defendant could have accomplished practically the same result by a motion to dismiss the appeal on notice given (rule 2, subdivision 4, and rule 5, Supreme and District Courts of Appeal [176 Pac. viii, ix]), but, not having pursued this course, he was authorized to take the course adopted by him, viz. submit the case upon the record.

While, under the circumstances stated, we are not required to examine the record in search of prejudicial errors, or to ascertain whether the record is free from such errors, we have done so, nevertheless, with the result that we have found no substantial ground for complaint against the manner in which the cause was tried by the court below. In other words, we have found no prejudicial error.

The judgment appealed from is accordingly affirmed.

BENSON et al. v. KERN COUNTY.
(Civ. 3849.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 16, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 14, 1922.)

Highways 113(4)—Evidence held to show that county road contract was canceled by mutual agreement.

In an action by a road contractor against a county for eliminating a portion of the contract before the work was completed, evidence held to show that the uncompleted portion was eliminated in pursuance to a mutual agreement of the parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by George S. Benson and others, copartners doing business under the firm name of George S. Benson & Sons, against the County of Kern. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

E. T. Sherer and Emmet H. Wilson, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. R. Dorsey, Dist. Atty., and R. B. Lambert, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Bakersfield, and T. M. McNamara, of Taft, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action to recover damages for the breach of a contract entered into between plaintiffs and defendant whereby plaintiffs engaged to construct a certain highway for defendant. Judgment went for the latter, and plaintiffs appeal.

The contract between the parties provided for the building of nearly eleven miles of road. Appellants had entered upon the performance of the work, had fully completed more than four miles of the road, and had done the preliminary work of clearing the land throughout the remainder of the distance, when the uncompleted portion of the highway was "eliminated" from the contract. Notice of this elimination was given orally to appellant, according to some of the testimony, by the engineer and certain members of the highway commission of respondent, and appellants were by the engineer, according to his own testimony, ordered to "shut down" the work under the contract. Later, on December 6, 1917, the clerk of the board of supervisors of respondent wrote appellants that on that day the board had by resolution "eliminated that portion of the work provided for by contract and specifications" which had not been completed, the portion thus "eliminated" being particularly described in the letter. The notice to shut down work on the uncompleted part of the highway and the elimination of that part of it from the contract constitute the principal breach of which appellants complain. There is also an allegation in the complaint to the effect that appellants were damaged in a certain amount by reason of respondent's delay for a specified number of days in furnishing a quantity of broken stone and screenings to be used in the work and agreed by respondent to be furnished by it therefor. This allegation apparently refers to materials used in constructing the completed portion of the road, but as the trial court found the averment to be untrue and as the finding is not assailed by appellant, we shall consider the action as if it were one commenced to recover damages alone for what we have termed the principal breach of the contract.

It was alleged in the answer, and found by the trial court, that the elimination of the uncompleted portion of the highway from the contract was made pursuant to a mutual agreement of the parties to that end. Appellant contends that the court's finding on this subject is not supported by the evidence, and, as we view the case, the determination of the appeal depends upon the solution of this question alone. One of the members of the board of supervisors of respondent testified, in part:

"I had a conversation with the plaintiffs in this case concerning the contract now before the court. I do not remember the exact date, but it was some time during the fall of 1917. The conversation was with Mr. Paul Benson. * * * I cannot give the exact words. * * * As I understand, Mr. Benson's position was that if they were compelled by the county to complete the entire contract, there was a doubt whether there would be funds enough to pay them. * * * I cannot give the exact language, but Mr. Benson was attempting to ascertain from me what the disposition of the board of supervisors of the county would be toward settling the contract in full, and they got me to admit in my judgment there wouldn't be money to pay them. * * *

"The Court: Q. Do you mean * * * Mr. Benson asked you what would be the attitude of the board of supervisors? A. Yes, sir. Q. He said he thought there was not funds? A. And I agreed with him. * * * He stated that it would interfere with his business for the county to compel him to carry out the contract when it was a general rumor that there wouldn't be funds enough to settle for the work if he did it, and then he went to ask me some questions as to what the board thought about that, and then afterwards he took up with me the question of [if (?)] it, the contract, a portion of it was eliminated, then what would the board of supervisors do toward paying him for the necessary work to complete what he called the long haul of the contract. * * * I had several conversations with the same gentleman concerning this contract. The second conversation was in the office and he introduced his father. We talked along the same lines somewhat at that time, and I recall another time that he was in the board of supervisors' room, not where we were in formal session, but we were all up there, I mean the board of supervisors. * * * Mr. Claude Benson brought his father in and introduced him. * * * I had another conversation about the contract in question in the supervisors' room. I think all of the members of the board of supervisors were there. * * * The conversation that was had in the presence of these supervisors was in reference to the amount which would be right to be paid Mr. Benson for the excess cost of the work which was completed. The substance of the conversation was that the board of supervisors would be willing to pay this additional cost if there was money enough in the fund to pay it and the district attorney would advise us it was a legal charge against the county. By the extra work I mean that Mr. Benson explained to me that owing to the other work that he had been expecting to do, the entire contract, and also owing to the fact that the pieces that he was to complete were further away from his hauling point, that it would cost more than the average if he had the entire contract, and that it wasn't fair to ask him to do the hard end of the contract and have the easy or lowest average eliminated. I agreed with him on that point, and I assured him that I was satisfied that the board of supervisors wouldn't insist upon his completing the entire contract as long as there was doubt as to being enough money in the fund to pay for it if completed. * * * At the particular time in my office Mr. Benson stated that there was doubt as to whether there was money enough to pay for the entire contract if it was completed. * * * I have related all that I can recall at this time of the conversation I had with Claude Benson, one of the plaintiffs in this action, concerning the contracts in question. I do not recall any other reason being stated in any of these conversations with Claude Benson why he and his partners desired to be relieved from the contract except what I have stated. He desired to be relieved of it owing to the condition of the funds. I have no recollection of any proceedings in the matter except the resolution passed eliminating that portion of the work."

This testimony was all given on direct examination, and it was followed by a cross-examination which served to strengthen the witness' story as to the conversations between him and Claude Benson. We reproduce but two of the statements of the witness on cross-examination:

"I know we both [he and Benson] agreed in regard to the fairness of canceling the contract instead of demanding that they go on, and also as to the fairness of his being paid the right figure for the work he had completed and was going to complete in order to use up the material on the ground as I understood it. * * * I do not think he [Benson] put it in the manner that the highway commission had eliminated it, but putting it rather as a suggestion that the contract would be partially cancelled and after I agreed with him either at that time or at subsequent meetings, why, we went on and discussed the amount of what would be fair to him in the matter of payment for the part that he had completed."

This testimony was substantially corroborated by a witness who was a member of the highway commission of respondent during the year 1917, as he testified to similar conversations with one or more of appellants. Among other things, this witness said, on cross-examination:

"I cannot fix the various dates upon which I had conversations with Benson & Sons concerning this contract because there were so many of them. Whenever Benson & Sons came into the office that matter would be talked of. The substance of the conversation with Benson & Sons regarding the elimination of a portion of the work to be done under that contract was that under the existing conditions of the supposed shortage of funds and the trouble we had had in supplying the material, their desire was that we come to an agreement to conclude the contract or the part that was already under construction, to finish that. As I understood at that time, the other portions of the road was to be left, that no further work was to be done."

On December 5, 1917, and after the time of the various conversations referred to by these two witnesses, appellants addressed to the highway commission of respondent a letter, the body of which was as follows:

"As you have eliminated that portion of our contract on the Wasco-McFarland road from station 0.30 to station 351.00 (except such portion as has already been completed), we ask for release on same in order that we may have our bond cancelled. Hoping you may see fit to grant the same, we are, respectfully. * * *"

There is apparently one feature of this communication which accords with the claim of appellants that the "elimination" was made unilaterally by respondent and that appellants were "ordered" to cease work under the contract by the engineer of the highway commission. That feature is exhibited in the opening words of the letter: "As you have eliminated that portion of our contract," etc. These words of the missive, however, may have been used because of the fact that in a sense respondent was primarily chargeable with the elimination through its failure to keep intact the fund referred to in the testimony of the two witnesses; but whatever the reason for their use, other deductions may be drawn from the letter—deductions entirely consistent with the claim of respondent that the contract, as to the uncompleted work, was abandoned through the mutual consent of the parties. Why, for instance, was the letter written before any formal action in the matter of "elimination" had been taken either by the highway commission or by the board of supervisors? Prior to December 5, 1917, nothing had developed on the subject except by way of oral communication between the parties. If appellants were opposed to the "elimination," why did they not say so in their letter? The communication is devoid of the slightest assertion that they were not agreeable to a cessation of the work under the contract. If they were not agreeable to such a termination of the obligations of the contract on both sides, why did they ask so submissively "for a release on same in order that we may have our bond for that portion cancelled"? If the arrangement had not been satisfactory to them, their natural course would have been to keep the bond in force, as well as to preserve in every respect an attitude indicating that they not only stood ready and willing to complete the work, but that they insisted on the right to do so.

On the receipt of the letter from appellants, on December 6, 1917, the highway commission transmitted it to the board of supervisors with the recommendation "that the request be granted by your board." On the same day the latter body adopted the resolution referred to in the letter of its secretary, already mentioned, which in terms, it will be remembered, eliminated the uncompleted work from the contract. The resolution recited, by way of preamble, the receipt of appellants' letter by the highway commission, and also the fact that the commission had recommended that appellants' request be granted.

We cannot but conclude that the record discloses ample evidence to support the finding to which objection is made.

Judgment affirmed.

SNELL v. TASHJIAN. (Civ. 2476.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 22, 1922.)

1. Landlord and tenant — 223(5)—Cross-complaint held properly dismissed.

In an action for rent under a two-year lease of a vineyard, a cross-complaint, alleging that during the first year the plaintiff lessor prosecuted an action of unlawful detainer against defendant lessee for recovery of possession of the vineyard without just and probable cause, for the purpose of harassing and annoying defendant and unjustly depriving him of the premises, was properly dismissed.

2. Appeal and error — 1071(5)—Finding that lessee of vineyard voluntarily sold crop and suffered no damage held immaterial in view of other findings.

In an action for the second year's rent of a two-year lease of a vineyard, where it was found that the lessee executed a lease with knowledge that the first year's crop was contracted to be sold to a raisin company, a finding that the lessee voluntarily sold the crop and suffered no damage thereby was immaterial, since the lessee could not complain of any burden which he voluntarily assumed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by E. C. Snell against Harry Tashjian. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Farnsworth, McClure & Burke, of Visalia, for appellant.

Leroy G. Smith, of Dinuba, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff leased his vineyard to the defendant for a term of two years. The rental for the first year was paid, and this action was brought to recover that of the second year.

By way of counterclaim the defendant alleged that prior to the execution of the lease the plaintiff had contracted with the California Associated Raisin Company to sell "all of the raisins raised and produced on said vineyard" during the first year of the lease term; that defendant had no knowledge of such contract at the time the lease was executed; that by reason of such contract the defendant was compelled to sell his 1920 crop of raisins to the said company, to his loss in the sum of $4,000. By cross-complaint the defendant alleged that during the year 1920 the plaintiff prosecuted an action of unlawful detainer against him for recovery of possession of the vineyard without just or probable cause, for the purpose of harassing and annoying him and unjustly depriving him of the premises.

[1] The court properly dismissed the cross-complaint. Clark v. Kelley, 163 Cal. 207, 124 Pac. 846.

The court found that the plaintiff did not enter into the alleged contract with the raisin company, but that his predecessor in interest had made the contract alleged; that at the time of the execution of the lease the defendant had knowledge of such contract; and that he voluntarily sold his crop of raisins to the said company.

Appellant contends that there is no evidence to support the finding that the defendant had knowledge of the raisin contract when the lease was executed. The evidence shows that the raisin company's sign was in a conspicuous place on the premises, and the plaintiff testified that during the negotiations leading up to the making of the lease the defendant said: "I will give you $7,000 for it, but I'd rather give you $8,000 if it wasn't in the association."

[2] Appellant urges that the evidence does not support the findings to the effect that the defendant voluntarily sold his crop of raisins to the raisin company, and that he suffered no damage by reason of such sale. These findings are immaterial by reason of the finding that the defendant entered into the lease with knowledge of the raisin contract which would bind him, if he was so bound, to sell his crop to the company. Appellant cannot complain of any burden which he knowingly assumed. No other points are raised by the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re WILKIE. (Civ. 2431.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 27, 1922.)

Aliens — 68—No appeal can be taken from a judgment denying citizenship.

Under Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, giving Congress power to establish uniform rules of naturalization, and Act Cong. June 29, 1906 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4351 et seq.), giving certain state courts jurisdiction of naturalization proceedings and making no provision for an appeal from such decisions, a refusal of citizenship to an alien by either a state or federal court cannot be reviewed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

In the matter of the application of Peter Jules Wilkie for naturalization. From an order denying petitioner's application to become naturalized citizen of the United States, the petitioner appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Hilton & Christensen, of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. T. Williams, T. J. Sheridan, and F. N. Littleton, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. The petitioner, a native of Scotland and a subject of Great Britain, appeals from an order or judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Sacramento denying his application to become a naturalized citizen of the United States.

The ground upon which the appeal is predicated is that the court below, in passing upon the evidence, abused its discretion in denying the application.

In limine the respondent, United States of America, through the United States district attorney for the Northern district of California, has filed a motion to dismiss the appeal upon the following grounds:

"First, that the court has no jurisdiction of said appeal; second, that the order attempted to be appealed from is not an appealable order; third, that under the acts of Congress, providing for the naturalization of aliens and authorizing a petition for naturalization to be heard by state courts of record, it is not contemplated or authorized that any appeal be taken from any order made by any state court or United States District Court in the premises."

The three grounds above stated involve practically the same proposition, to wit: That an order or judgment of any court, vested with jurisdiction to hear and determine such matters, denying the application of an alien to become, by proceedings in naturalization under the act of Congress of 1906 (chapter 3592, 34 Stats. at L. 596; U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 529 [U. S. Comp. St. § 4351 et seq.]), a citizen of the United States, is not an appealable order or judgment, and this by virtue of the fact that the said act of Congress does not authorize an appeal from such an order or judgment; that therefore there is no authorized means whereby an appellate court may be clothed with jurisdiction to review proceedings in naturalization which have culminated in an order or judgment either denying or allowing an application for citizenship.

The cases in which the act of Congress of June, 1906, has been considered and construed sustain the contention thus advanced by the respondent upon reasons which appear to be sound and quite impregnable.

Section 8, art. 1, of the federal Constitution provides that—

"The Congress shall have power * * * to establish a uniform rule of naturalization."

In obedience to the power thus expressly conferred upon the Congress, naturalization laws were enacted at a very early stage after the organization of the federal government by the adoption of the national Constitution, and have, as modified or amended from time to time in certain particulars, since remained in existence. Down to the time of the enactment of the act of Congress of 1906, and in a few instances even after the passage of that act, judgments of United States courts in naturalization proceedings have been reviewed by the appellate courts, and the right to such a review was never questioned, so far as we are contrariwise advised, until the decision in the case of U. S. v. Dolla, 177 Fed. 101, 100 C. C. A. 521, 21 Ann. Cas. 665. In that case the congressional legislation of 1906 authorizing the naturalization of aliens and prescribing the procedure in such proceedings, to which, it may here be suggested, new rules, designed for the more effectual safeguarding of the country against the admission of undesirable foreigners to the rights of citizenship therein, were added by said act, was elaborately reviewed. In said act of Congress no right of appeal from a judgment in citizenship proceedings was expressly granted or authorized, and it was held, in the case just mentioned, that the omission to provide in said act for an appeal in such proceedings was by the Congress thus extended, ex industria, to deny or foreclose such right. The reasoning of the court, in supporting its conclusion, is so forceful and so plainly unimpeachable, and the question to which it is addressed of such singular importance at the present time, that we may pardonably reproduce herein an extended excerpt from the court's opinion as follows:

"Under the naturalization law of June 29, 1906, the jurisdiction is conferred upon the courts, the petition for naturalization is to be filed addressed to the court, notice is to be given by posting, witnesses may be summoned, the United States are given the right to appear and oppose and call witnesses, every final hearing shall be had in open court before a judge or judges, and final orders are to be under the hand of the court and entered of record. Under the first naturalization act (Acts March 26, 1790, c. 3, 1 Stat. 103), jurisdiction was conferred upon state courts only, but since 1802 it has been extended to District and Circuit Courts of the United States. Naturalization has always been an act or judgment of a court, but never until the act of 1906 has it been suggested that the special proceedings authorized constituted a case, action, or cause that could be reviewed on writ of error under any judiciary act, state or federal. If, by the additional provisions and restrictions with which naturalization is guarded by the act of 1906, an application for naturalization is made a case within the meaning of section 6 of the Courts of Appeals Act of 1891, then it must follow that all applications for naturalization in all courts, state and federal, are reviewable by appeal or writ of error, as the several judiciary acts may read, at the suit of the rejected applicant or the United States. We may say, further, if naturalization proceedings under the act of 1906 constitute a 'case,' it is a case at law, not in equity nor in admiralty; and if such a case is reviewable under present laws it can only be on writ of error, and only errors of law appearing of record can be reviewed. It is unnecessary to point out that such review would be fruitless in all cases where the forms provided by the law are followed. Any review of naturalization proceedings in an appellate court, to be worth while, must be a review of the facts as well as law, and this can only be on appeal, and an appeal must be provided by statute. As the act of 1906 is silent with regard to any appeal or writ of error, while sedulous in placing guards and restrictions around the proceedings and fully protecting the United States by authorizing a suit to annul any certificate fraudulently obtained or improperly granted, it is not to be supposed it was the intention of the said act to make a reviewable case of every application for naturalization. The mischief to be remedied was not in that line, but was the hasty and improvident way in which many of the courts under the prior laws naturalized aliens without examination and proper proof. Naturalization of aliens is an act of grace, not right, and it is not necessarily a business of the courts. It is lodged in the courts for convenience, and, at the pleasure of Congress, can be taken entirely away and lodged in the Bureau of Commerce and Labor, which is now charged with supervision of the operations under the act, or with any executive officer, as is now lodged the right and power to determine whether certain aliens shall be permitted to come into the country at all. See Lee Lung v. Patterson, 186 U. S. 168, 22 Sup. Ct. 795, 46 L. Ed. 1108. If naturalization is a judicial act, it is because done by judges. We therefore conclude that the action and proceedings of the District Court on Abba Dolla's petition for naturalization did not constitute a 'case' within the meaning of the sixth section of the judiciary act of 1891, and this court is without jurisdiction to review the same."

In United States v. Neugebauer, 221 Fed. 938, 137 C. C. A. 508, the United States Circuit Court followed the above decision, and denied the right of appeal by the government from a judgment of the United States District Court admitting said Neugebauer to citizenship.

In United States v. Ness, 245 U. S. 319, 38 Sup. Ct. 118, 62 L. Ed. 324, the United States Supreme Court declared that an appeal will not lie in a naturalization proceeding. It is true that the question did not come before that court directly in that case, which was a suit to secure a decree canceling a certificate of naturalization issued to Ness by an Iowa state court upon the ground that the same was procured by fraudulent representations and means. However, the court took occasion to say in that case:

"Opposition to the granting of a petition for naturalization may prevail, because of objections to the competency or weight of evidence or the credibility of witnesses, or mere irregularities in procedure. A decision on such minor questions, at least of a state court of naturalization, is, though clearly erroneous, conclusive even as against the United States if it entered an appearance under section 11. For Congress did not see fit to provide for a direct review by writ of error or appeal. But where fraud or illegality is charged, the act affords, under section 15, a remedy by an independent suit 'in any court having jurisdiction to naturalize aliens in the judicial district in which the naturalized citizen may reside at the time of bringing the suit.' "

It will be interesting, as in confirmation of the view expressed in United States v. Dolla, supra, that provision for appeal was purposefully or designedly omitted from the naturalization act of 1906, to note the following brief history of the legislation in question as given in the footnotes of United States v. Ness, supra:

"The bill submitted by the Commission on Naturalization provided for such appellate proceedings, and its proposal was recommended to the House by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization as § 13 (Report of Feb. 6, 1906, p. 5); but after debate in the Committee of the Whole (40 Cong. Rec. pp. 7784-7787) was stricken from the bill. The bill proposed by the Commission and recommended by the House Committee contained in addition (as section 17) the provision for cancellation proceeding enacted as section 15."

But, while it is not denied by the petitioner here that the rule as confirmed by the more recent decisions construing the act of Congress of 1906 is that there is no appeal in citizenship proceedings had in the federal courts, it is nevertheless contended that the government, having invoked the aid of the state courts of general jurisdiction (which are courts of record, having seals) in the matter of the administration of naturalization laws, concedes to such state courts the right to follow their own procedure, and to the applicant before the state court (for naturalization) the guaranty of due process of law, which includes all the processes whereby a litigant citizen's rights may be finally and definitely determined. In other words, the claim is that (and we now appropriate petitioner's own language), "if the applicant is denied a fundamental right in proceedings which culminated in an opinion or judgment, the opinion or judgment is infected with the same infirmity and the method of review provided for such judgment is a part of due process of law." Hence, so it is argued, "the review provided by the state of California by appeal is a part of the due process of law."

It would seem that a sufficient answer to the contention thus stated is to be found in the language itself of the fourth subdivision of section 8 of article 1 of the federal Constitution that Congress shall have power "to establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization." This language, it seems to us, can mean nothing less than that the administration of the law or laws governing the naturalization of aliens must be uniform or the same in all the tribunals to which the Congress has specifically intrusted that duty; that is to say, the proceedings must be conducted, whether in a state or a federal court, according to the rules promulgated by the statute itself, and not according to the rules of procedure in state courts, where the proceedings are had before the latter court. But this proposition has been directly passed upon by the courts of several state jurisdictions, and by those courts it is held that, in committing to state courts of record the duty or the right of hearing applications for naturalization, Congress thus merely employed said courts as agencies through which the general government "is discharging one of its peculiar functions of national sovereignty." Eldredge v. Salt Lake Co., 37 Utah, 188, 106 Pac. 939; State v. Superior Court, 75 Wash. 239, 134 Pac. 916, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 425.

In the Utah Case just named, it is, among other things, said:

"It seems to us too obvious to require either argument or the citation of authorities that in naturalization proceedings the United States government exercises sovereign functions which exclusively belong to that government, and, further, that, in authorizing the state courts to act in such proceedings, the national government selects such courts and the clerks thereof as government agencies through whom said government is discharging one of its peculiar functions of national sovereignty. Whatever may have been the theory of some courts regarding the power of Congress to confer such authority upon the state courts in the past, the question is now settled that Congress has such power, and that state courts may constitutionally exercise the same when authorized by Congress to do so. Among other cases, we refer to the following: Levin v. United States, 128 Fed. 826, 63 C. C. A. 476; Robertson v. Baldwin, 165 U. S. 275, 17 Sup. Ct. 326, 41 L. Ed. 715; State v. Libby, 47 Wash. 481, 92 Pac. 350. The question as to whether the state courts continue or cease to be state courts while acting in naturalization cases, while interesting, is not material. It is enough for the present to know that in so doing such courts are merely agencies of the national government."

In the Washington Case it is said, quoting the syllabus:

"Under the Const. U. S., art. 1, § 8, giving Congress power to establish uniform rules of naturalization, and Act June 29, 1906, c. 3592, § 3, 34 Stat. 596 (U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 529), giving certain state courts jurisdiction of naturalization proceedings, the state courts, in exercising that jurisdiction, exercise it as a function of the national government, and the procedure is controlled by the laws enacted by Congress."

Again, it is said in that case:

"Under the federal naturalization law, there is no right of appeal from the decision of the court hearing the application, and therefore the state appellate courts cannot entertain appeals from such hearings in the state courts."

The above cases were decided after the enactment of the act of Congress of 1906 and deal entirely therewith.

The appellant cites the case of In re Naturalization of Bura, 5 Ohio App. 334, which also was decided subsequently to the enactment of the naturalization act of 1906, and which supports the position taken herein by him. In that case the court brushes away the arguments and the reasoning leading to the conclusion arrived at in the Washington and Utah cases above referred to and emphatically holds, as indicated in the syllabus, that—

"The Congress of the United States having by apt legislation conferred upon certain state courts the power to admit aliens to citizenship and to administer the naturalization laws of the country, sharing with such courts the jurisdiction of the federal courts over that subject, the power may be exercised according to the laws of procedure governing the state courts, as an incident to the power conferred, including any right of review to which an aggrieved party may be entitled by state law; and this although such right of review is withheld when naturalization laws are administered in the federal courts."

But, with due deference to the Ohio court, we think that, upon a reasonable degree of reflection, it will readily be perceived that the decisions in the Washington and Utah cases are crystallized from the sounder reasoning.

The theory upon which Congress excluded the right of appeal in naturalization proceedings evidently is that, since the matter of the naturalization of aliens is one of grace, and not of right, it would be sufficient to submit the question whether an alien shall or shall not be admitted to the rights of citizenship of this country to the exclusive decision of the courts to which the duty of hearing such applications is intrusted, allowing such courts a wide discretion in the determination of the matter and disallowing any review of such decisions by the higher courts, except where an independent suit may be brought, as authorized by the law itself, to set aside or cancel any certificate of naturalization which has been procured by fraudulent means.

Finally, it is to be observed that obviously there could be no uniformity in the administration of the naturalization laws, as is clearly contemplated by the federal Constitution respecting that subject, if from the judgment in the proceedings in one of the two forums to which the administration of the naturalization laws is assigned by the act of Congress of 1906 an appeal would lie, while in the other it would not. There is no conceivable reason why so unjust a discrimination should be imputed to the intention of Congress, nor why a construction should be given the act leading to such result. It is not for a moment to be supposed that Congress intended that neither aliens applying for naturalization in the state courts nor the government should be entitled in such proceedings to an appeal in the federal courts and allowed the same right in the state courts.

But it is unnecessary to pursue the discussion further. We are firmly of the opinion that it was not intended that a judgment in citizenship proceedings, whether in the state or the federal courts, should be subject to review by the courts of appeal.

Accordingly the motion of the respondent to dismiss the purported appeal in this case will be, and the same is hereby, granted.

POOLE v. CLOVER. (Civ. 2417.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 2, 1922.)

Animals §=50(4)—Animals driven away by wrongdoer not running "at large."

Under county ordinances penalizing one permitting domestic animals to run "at large" and authorizing constables to collect a fee for impounding such animals, an owner of animals driven off his premises by a wrongdoer is not liable for the fees to a constable who impounded them.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, At Large.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by David Poole against Isaac Clover. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Grant & Bailey, of Woodland, for appellant.

C. C. McDonald, of Woodland, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover possession of six head of horses. The answer alleges that—

At all times mentioned in the complaint the defendant was the constable of Woodland township; that the horses were by the owner "permitted to run and be at large and to go unrestrained and to pasture and graze upon the public highways within the boundaries of the said Woodland township, * * * contrary to the provisions of section 1 of * * * Ordinance No. 63 of Yolo county; that * * * the defendant, acting in his official capacity as constable of said Woodland township, took up and impounded the said domestic animals * * * under and by virtue of the provisions of said Ordinances No. 63 and No. 94 of Yolo county"; and that plaintiff refused to pay the "fees, expenses, and costs due the defendant by reason of the impounding of the said animals under the provisions of said Ordinance No. 94."

Section 1 of Ordinance No. 63 provides:

"No person or persons owning or having the care, custody, possession or control of any domestic animal of the species of horse, mule, donkey, cattle, sheep, goat, or swine, shall hereafter permit the same to run or be at large or to go unrestrained elsewhere than upon his own premises, or to permit the same to pasture or graze upon the public highways, within the corporate limits of the county of Yolo."

Section 2 provides:

"Any person violating any of the provisions of this ordinance shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by fine not exceeding one hundred and fifty dollars, and not less than fifteen dollars, or imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding ninety days, or by both such fine or imprisonment."

Ordinance No. 94 provides:

"It shall be lawful for, and the duty of, the constables of the various townships of Yolo county to take up and impound in a secure place any and all domestic animals running or being at large, or permitted to go unrestrained, or pasturing, or grazing upon the public highways of Yolo county in their respective townships, contrary to the provisions of Ordinance No. 63 of Yolo county; * * * and it shall be lawful for the constable of each of the aforesaid townships to collect from the owner or owners of each of the aforesaid animals so taken up or impounded the sum of $2 per head for each animal so taken up and impounded for his services in taking up and impounding the same, and in addition to the aforesaid sum each of the constables shall also be entitled to collect from the aforesaid owner or owners of each of the aforesaid animals so taken up and impounded the sum of 50 cents per head per day for his services in feeding and caring for the said domestic animals while in his keeping while impounded."

The ordinance further provides that the constable shall give notice of the taking up of such animals in the manner usually required in cases of estrays, and sell them, if not claimed by the owner, and the fees and charges paid within a prescribed time, and gives the constable a lien on the animals impounded for the amount of his fees and charges. The owner is permitted, at any time prior to the sale of the animals, to retake possession thereof upon payment of the accrued fees and charges.

At the trial the court sustained the defendant's objection to the plaintiff's attempt and offer to prove—"that the six head of horses in question were driven off the premises by servants of Mr. Conway, over whom the plaintiff in this action had no control; that they were driven off against the will and without the consent and without the knowledge of the plaintiff in the action; * * * that the plaintiff immediately tried to locate the horses for the purpose of recovery, and that he had absolutely no opportunity either at that time or any time subsequent to claim the horses before they got into the hands of the constable."

The question is thus presented whether under the terms of Ordinance No. 94 an owner without fault, whose domestic animals have been driven off his premises against his will and without his knowledge or consent and left to run at large upon a highway, is required to pay the fees and charges specified in the ordinance in order to recover such animals from an officer who has impounded them.

Ordinances 94 and 63 must be construed together. The latter is made a part of the former as fully as if it were set forth at length therein. The latter, only, makes it unlawful for the animals named to run at large or graze upon the highways. Ordinance 94 authorizes the constable to impound animals only when they are at large or upon the highway "contrary to the provisions of Ordinance No. 63." The constable must look to the latter ordinance to ascertain whether the animals are upon the highway under such circumstances as to justify him in impounding them under the authority of the former.

The provisions of Ordinances 63 and 94 are similar to those of the statute of 1874, which provided that—

No stock of any kind shall be "allowed to pasture upon any public highway, and it shall be the duty of all roadmasters and deputy roadmasters, within their respective districts, to take up all animals found pasturing upon the public highways."

In Thompson v. Corpstein, 52 Cal. 653, in reversing the judgment of the trial court, it is said:

"The court below found that the plaintiff's cattle had been driven from the plaintiff's land to Wolf creek upon the Stephen's creek road for the purpose of being watered, and while there in charge of a herder, who seems to have fallen asleep for the moment, were found pasturing upon both sides of the road. There is no pretense that the plaintiff or the herder intended that the cattle should pasture upon the road. That they were found eating the grass there was owing solely to the accident of the herder falling asleep for the moment while in charge of the cattle. Had he fallen down in a fit, or been disabled by a sudden attack of disease, the same consequence might and probably would have ensued, but we do not think that in the one case more than in the other, the cattle would be subject to proceedings under the act."

There is no difference in principle between that case and this, except that it may be said that the herder there was negligent in falling asleep, while here the plaintiff offered to prove that he was wholly without fault. Thompson v. Corpstein seems to be the only case in this state directly in point on the question under consideration, and must be held to be controlling. In other jurisdictions the decisions are conflicting. The terms "at large" and "permitting animals to run at large" have often been defined in cases arising under penal statutes and those involving questions of negligence or contributory negligence. In such cases it has generally been held sufficient for the party charged to show that he was without fault. Gentry v. Little, 16 Ky. Law Rep. 26; Evans v. Holman, 202 Mo. 284, 100 S. W. 624; Ball Ranch Co. v. Hendrickson, 50 Mont. 220, 146 Pac. 278; Railroad Co. v. Stephenson, 24 Ohio St. 48; Howrigan v. Bakersfield, 79 Vt. 249, 64 Atl. 1130, 9 Ann. Cas. 282; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Seiders, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 568, 110 S. W. 997; Willis v. Gerking, 109 Wash. 382, 186 Pac. 1064. In a number of states, where statutes or ordinances made it the duty of officers to impound cattle found running at large, it has been held to be no defense, as against fees and charges for impounding such animals, to show that the owner was without fault. Swander v. Wakefield, 84 Ill. App. 426; Gentry v. Little, supra; Bruce v. White, 4 Gray (Mass.) 345; McVey v. Barker, 92 Mo. App. 498; Peck v. Liesmann, 142 Mo. App. 476, 127 S. W. 107; City of Paris v. Hale, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 386, 35 S. W. 333. In Evans v. Holman, supra, the first section of the ordinance provided that—

"Whoever shall permit his domestic animals to run at large within the city limits, shall, upon conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and fined in any sum not exceeding $100."

The second section provided that—

"It shall be the duty of the city marshal to take up any and all * * * domestic animals found running at large within the city limits and securely impound the same * * * and keep said animals in said pound until sold or redeemed" in accordance with the terms of the ordinance.

The court said:

"In order to authorize the imposition of a penalty for permitting the animals to run at large * * * it must appear that such running at large * * * was with the knowledge or consent of the owner. In other words, that he in fact permitted such animal or animals to run at large."

It was held, however, that—

Where animals were impounded under authority of the second section of the ordinance, "where no penalty is imposed upon the owner, it is of no consequence how the animals came to be at large, whether with the knowledge, consent or permission of the owner."

In Sloan v. Hubbard, 34 Ohio St. 583, the first section of the act made it unlawful for owners of animals "to suffer the same to run at large in any public road or highway." Section 4 provided that in a prosecution for the penalty prescribed by the first section it should be a defense to show that the "animal was at large without the knowledge of the owner or keeper, and without his fault." Section 6 made it the duty of the officers therein named "to take up and confine any animals mentioned in the act, found at large contrary to its provisions." Since ignorance of the fact that the animals were at large was expressly made a defense under the fourth section and not under the sixth, it was held that it was not the intent to make want of knowledge a defense in a case arising under the sixth section. See, also, Burdett v. Allen, 35 W. Va. 347, 13 S. E. 1012, 14 L. R. A. 337.

In Beeson v. Tice, 17 Ind. App. 83, 45 N. E. 614, 46 N. E. 154, the case of Thompson v. Corpstein, supra, is cited and followed. In Wolf v. Nicholson, 1 Ind. App. 222, 27 N. E. 505, where animals were impounded under a statute authorizing them to be taken up when "found running at large upon the roads," it is held that—

"Animals which escape from an inclosure * * * cannot be regarded as animals running at large where owner endeavors to recover them when he learns of their escape."

In Stephenson v. Ferguson, 4 Ind. App. 230, 30 N. E. 714, under a statute requiring "road supervisors to cause animals running at large * * * to be impounded," the supervisor impounded certain animals. "Some unknown person or persons, without the knowledge or consent of the appellant, * * * threw down a portion of the fence by which the pasture was inclosed, and thereby released the cattle." The owner immediately went in search of them, and found them the next morning in the supervisor's possession. The supervisor refused to give them up except on payment of $12 as his charges. The court held that the supervisor could not so hold the cattle where the owner was not at fault. In Carolina-Florida Planting Co. v. Malge, 64 Fla. 234, 60 South. 346, animals were taken up under a statute making it "unlawful for any live stock to run at large," and providing that "any person may take up and impound any live stock running at large," and collect from the owner certain charges and sell the live stock taken up where the owner fails to pay such charges. It was held that "a mere accidental or unknown escape of cattle does not make them 'running at large' within the statute."

Respondent correctly states that the ordinance should be construed with reference to the object intended to be accomplished. It is also true, as said in Dorris v. McKamy, 40 Cal. App. 267, 180 Pac. 645, that "the word 'permit' is a word of considerable elasticity." But, construing the two ordinances together, nothing contained in Ordnance 94 indicates an intent to authorize the constable to impound any animals except such as are at large or upon the highways in violation of penal Ordinance No. 63. If the constable has authority to hold plaintiff's animals under the circumstances which plaintiff offered to prove in this case, then he may so hold animals under similar circumstances in all cases. It is not unusual for owners to confine several thousand sheep in a single field, securely fenced. If, under such circumstances, some miscreant at night and without the knowledge of the owner should tear down the fence and drive the sheep upon the highway and leave them there, would the constable have authority to impound them under the provisions of the ordinance and hold them until the owner paid $2 a head and other charges for the constable's services in taking them up and caring for them? If so, then the provisions of the ordinance authorizing the impounding of animals would, in many cases, be more penal than the penal section. It cannot be presumed that the supervisors intended any such consequences.

It is not necessary to decide whether an ordinance would be valid which required animals running at large or grazing upon the highways, irrespective of the owner's fault, to be impounded and held until payment of reasonable charges therefor. It is sufficient to say that such does not appear to have been the intent in the passage of the ordinances in question here.

The judgment is reversed.

CARLSEN v. DIEHL. (Civ. 4201.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California, May 22, 1922.)

1. Municipal corporations ☞705(10)—Last clear chance rule not applicable where truck injured plaintiff after front end thereof had passed him in safety.

Where plaintiff was injured by the rear wheels of a truck after the front end of the truck had passed him in safety, his peril was not one which was apparent to the driver of the truck, so that the doctrine of last clear chance, which requires knowledge of the peril, cannot apply.

2. Municipal corporations ☞705(10)—Person working in street but not compelled to do so must exercise care of pedestrian.

The rule, that a person who is required to do his work in the street need not exercise the same diligence to avoid accident as pedestrians or others who use the streets merely as a medium of passage, does not apply where plaintiff was working in the street loading a truck at the time he was injured, but was not compelled by the nature of his work to be in the street.

3. Municipal corporations ☞706(3)—Res ipsa loquitur does not apply to street accident where inference of negligence was not necessary.

The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, the effect of which is to lighten the burden of proof resting upon the plaintiff by permitting the jury to indulge in a presumption that the defendant was negligent, does not apply in an action for injuries to a person in a street where there was direct testimony as to the cause of the accident, or where the facts would permit an inference that it was due to a cause other than defendant's negligence as reasonably as that it was due to negligence.

4. Master and servant ☞349—Compensation Act at time of accident governs.

Where the accident to an employee happened before the amendment to the Workmen's Compensation Act in 1917 took effect, the rights of the employee to recover against a third person whose negligence caused the injury, notwithstanding recovery of compensation from his employer, is governed by the provisions of Workmen's Compensation Act 1913, § 31, which prohibited any evidence as to the amount of compensation paid.

5. Master and servant ☞400—Under Compensation Act prior to amendment, employer and insurer were necessary parties to action against third person.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act 1913, § 31, making a claim for compensation an assignment to the employer of the right to recover damages from a third person, the employer and the insurance carrier were necessary parties to an action by the employee against such third person after compensation had been paid, and, if they refused to join as plaintiffs, they should be joined as defendants.

6. Appeal and error ☞977(1)—New trial ☞6—Ruling on motion for a new trial is largely within trial court's discretion.

The granting or refusing of a new trial is largely within the discretion of the trial court, and its ruling will not be reversed unless the discretion has been abused.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by Thomas Carlsen against Fred W. Diehl to recover damages for personal injuries. From an order granting a new trial after verdict for the plaintiff, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Donald McKisick, of Sacramento, and J. J. Dunne, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by Thomas Carlsen, plaintiff, from an order granting a new trial. The action was instituted by Carlsen to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him while engaged in loading a truck near the driveway of the entrance to what is known as the Oakland Harbor ferry. This ferry is used for the purpose of transporting vehicles and passengers across San Francisco bay. The entrance on the western side of the bay is south of the Ferry building in San Francisco, access to the ferry slip being from East street. On the left side of said drive leading to the slip is a ticket office of the company operating the ferry, and in front of said ticket office is a scale. The testimony indicates that the truck of the defendant herein, operated by one William B. Robertson, stopped opposite the scale, Robertson procured a ticket, and proceeded to drive toward the boat. To the left or north of the driveway stood a wagon of the Union Transfer Company which the plaintiff and another were loading. The automobile truck of the defendant (respondent) in moving from its place upon or opposite the scale proceeded toward the boat along the extreme northerly part of the driveway, and in doing so approached and passed the truck which the plaintiff was engaged in loading. There is a sharp conflict in the evidence as to the precise location of this truck, the plaintiff contending that the loading point was approximately ten feet north of the driveway, and defendant insisting that the distance was only four or five feet. In any event in driving toward the ferry slip the truck came in close proximity to the plaintiff; the front end of the truck passed him, and, as testified by its driver:

"I felt the back of my truck come down with a thud, and I looked around to the rear part of my truck, and I saw that Mr. Carlsen had just been run over."

Testimony was adduced in behalf of plaintiff to the effect that the course taken by the truck was at an angle toward the plaintiff instead of in a direct line to the ferry slip; also, that its driver had stated that his truck skidded. On the other hand, the driver, as a witness, testified that the truck did not skid, and, on the contrary, imputed any change in the relative positions of the plaintiff and the moving truck to a movement by plaintiff. He said:

"I saw the shoe mark, a side shoe mark like that, of his big toe and the heel where it had slipped out, extending about two feet."

It is uncontradicted that the front end of the truck passed Carlsen and did not interfere in anywise with his movements loading the transfer wagon. This being so, and it appearing that Robertson was driving at an angle toward the boat it is hard to realize that the accident could have happened in any other way than by the rear wheels of the truck skidding to the north, or Carlsen slipping backward (to the south), as, obviously, if the truck continued in the course testified to, the rear wheels would be in a more southerly position than those in front.

In this connection it might be well to consider the contention of the respondent, made in support of the action of the trial court in granting his motion for a new trial, that the instruction to the jury on the doctrine of the "last clear chance" was prejudicial error.

The instruction complained of was to the effect that even if the plaintiff was negligent, "still, if you find that the collision referred to in the testimony might have been prevented by the use of ordinary care upon the part of Robertson, and if you find that Robertson did not exercise such care, but carelessly caused the collision to occur, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff and against the defendant herein. The principle applicable here is that even if you find that the plaintiff was negligent on the occasion in question, still if Robertson in the exercise of ordinary care had the last clear chance to avoid the collision, but did not avail himself of that chance, then such negligence of the plaintiff would not excuse the defendant." Respondent claims that this instruction entirely deprived the defendant of his defense of contributory negligence, and fails to include elements essential to the application of the doctrine it attempts to define.

While this instruction, as one dealing with the situation of a person having the last clear chance to avoid an unintentional injury to another, is far from satisfactory—the first part of it being correct only if entirely subordinated to the later explanatory language—the principal cause for criticism on the part of the respondent is, we think, that the state of the evidence did not justify the giving of it; and being given, the jury was apt to conclude from it that any negligence on the part of the defendant would warrant a verdict against him.

[1] In the instant case it appears from the testimony that Robertson, the driver of the truck, was shielded by a cab; that the head end, including the front wheels, had passed Carlsen, and, according to Robertson's version of the accident, the first he knew that anything was wrong was by feeling a thud. Since the front wheels of the truck passed Carlsen without injuring him, there was no ground for apprehending that the rear wheels would not do likewise. The peril, therefore, from which the plaintiff suffered, namely, being struck by the rear wheels of the truck, was not one which can properly be said to have been apparent to its driver. To charge a person, upon the doctrine of last clear chance, with responsibility for injuring another whose own negligence proximately contributes to such injury, a knowledge of the impending danger is essential. In the case of Wallis v. Southern Pacific Co.,

184 Cal. 662, 195 Pac. 408, 15 A. L. R. 117, it was said that—

"The defendant must not only be aware of the danger in time to avert it, but must also know or have reason to believe that the plaintiff is oblivious of the danger, and is in a position where he cannot extricate himself from it"—citing Arnold v. S. F. O. T. Rys., 175 Cal. 1, 164 Pac. 793; Basham v. S. P. Co., 176 Cal. 320, 168 Pac. 359; Young v. S. P. Co., 182 Cal. 369, 190 Pac. 36.

The case of Wallis v. S. P. Co., supra (184 Cal. 672, 195 Pac. 408, 15 A. L. R. 117), holds that if there is not sufficient evidence to justify submitting an instruction on the last clear chance to the jury, it is reversible error.

In a later case (Read v. Pacific Elec. Co., 185 Cal. 520, 197 Pac. 791), where a motion for a new trial was granted by the trial court without specifying any particular ground as the basis upon which it was made, the court stated the rule to be, in substance, that—

"Although it appears that the contributory negligence of the decedent was one of the proximate causes of his death, yet, if the defendant's agents having charge of the instrumentality which caused the death perceived that the decedent, by his own negligence, had placed himself in a position of peril from which he probably could not escape, and after perceiving his perilous position failed to exercise ordinary care and prudence to avoid injuring the decedent * * * the plaintiff could recover."

[2] Respondent makes the claim also that the court's instruction to the jury on the question of degree of care required of plaintiff was erroneous. The instruction complained of reads as follows:

"I charge you that the rights of a person whose duties require him to be in places used by vehicles, with respect to such vehicles, cannot be determined by the same rules applicable to pedestrians who have no occupation requiring their presence in such places; not that such person is bound to exercise any less care, but because the care to be exercised must be determined from a different standpoint. In such cases his care or want of care is a fact to be determined from all the circumstances surrounding him at the time; but he is not called upon to exercise the same degree of diligence in avoiding accidents as pedestrians or others who use the place merely as a medium of locomotion; and such a person is not bound to neglect his work in order to avoid injury due to the want of ordinary care on the part of operators of vehicles. If therefore, you find from the evidence before you that Mr. Carlsen, the plaintiff in this action, was a person whose duties required him to be in places used by vehicles, then I charge you that the rules which I have just referred to would be applicable to him, and that you should weigh and consider the same in arriving at your verdict in this cause."

The evident effect of this instruction was to give to the party injured the benefit of the well-settled rule that a person compelled by the nature of his work to be at a particular place is to be held free from negligence. Appellant insists that the instant case is not the same as that of a pedestrian, and that he should not be called upon to exercise the same diligence to avoid accidents as pedestrians or others who use the streets merely as a medium of passage. To support this view he cites King v. Green, 7 Cal. App. 473, 94 Pac. 777.

We are of the opinion that the rule does not extend to a person in the situation of the appellant, and that the case cited is against his contention. Carlsen was not forced to work in that particular spot; and the placing of responsibility for an injury to a person working alongside a driveway, when said person is not compelled to be there, should be a matter for the jury to decide by applying the ordinary rule as to negligence. As was said in the case last cited:

"Negligence is a comparative and not a positive term, and its use is relative whether applied to the negligence of the defendant or that of the plaintiff. For this reason in most cases it becomes a question of fact for the jury to determine who was negligent under the circumstances of the case. * * * It was for the jury to determine what would have been the conduct of a person of ordinary prudence under the circumstances of the case, as well as to determine whether or not the facts showed negligence."

Under these circumstances we do not feel that the rule should be extended to include persons working in a hazardous position, as in this case, with the permission of the owner of a public place, such as railroad stations and the like, and not forced to remain in a particular place as a matter of duty.

[3] The third point suggested by the respondent as a proper ground for the order of the court appealed from is the instruction by the court on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. The court gave to the jury the meaning of the Latin phrase and the definition as follows:

"When a thing which causes injury is shown to be under the management of defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from want of care."

The respondent's contention in this regard must be sustained. The facts of this case were not, we think, such as to make applicable the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, the effect of which is to lighten the burden of proof resting upon the plaintiff by permitting the jury to indulge in a presumption that the defendant was negligent. That presumption only arises, as was stated in the case of Tower v. Humboldt Transit Co., 176 Cal. 602, 169 Pac. 227, "where the occurrence is such as ordinarily does not happen without negligence on the part of the party charged, as, for example, in the case of the explosion of a boiler (Posey v. Scoville, 10 Fed. 140), or of a powder mill (Judson v. Giant Powder Co. [107 Cal. 549]), or the fall of a workman's tool from a building upon a person on the street (Dixon v. Pluns, 98 Cal. 384)." It does not apply where there is direct evidence of the cause, or where the facts are such that an inference that the mishap was due to a cause other than the defendant's negligence could be as reasonably drawn as that it was due to his negligence. 29 Cyc. 624. It was held in Tower v. Humboldt Transit Co., supra, that it should not be applied to a collision between a street car and a pedestrian; and while the plaintiff at the time of his injury was not a pedestrian his situation was similar. He had taken a position so close to passing vehicles that a very slight movement on his part would bring him in contact with them. And the fact that the front wheel of the defendant's truck had passed the plaintiff without coming in contact with him makes the case very similar to that of a collision between a vehicle and a pedestrian, since it increases the probability that the contact was due to a movement on the part of the person injured. The burden was on the plaintiff to show that his injury was occasioned by the defendant's negligence. This instruction permitted the jury to find against the defendant upon mere proof of the injury, and must therefore be regarded as erroneous and prejudicial.

[4] Much is said in the briefs on both sides with regard to the necessary parties to the action. It appears that suit was brought in the name of the plaintiff alone, although he had received compensation from his employer. The accident happened November 6, 1917. While the Workmen's Compensation Act was amended in 1917, the amendment did not become effective until January 1, 1918 (St. 1917, p. 831). Consequently the action should have been controlled by the provisions of section 31 of the act as it stood prior to such amendment (Stats. 1913, p. 295). Under that section as it read at that time the making of a lawful claim for compensation operated as an assignment to the employer of any right to recover damages which the injured employee or his personal representatives or other person had against any other party for injury or death. Any excess recovered was held for the benefit of the injured employee or other person entitled. The section also prohibited the putting in evidence in any action brought of any testimony relative to the amount of compensation paid. Nevertheless during the course of the trial it was brought out that plaintiff had received compensation and medical services, and the court gave an instruction to the effect that a lien was granted to those paying the compensation upon any judgment plaintiff might recover. Obviously this took the provisions of the act as amended in 1917 into consideration rather than the provisions in effect at the time of the injury. Inasmuch as the case will have to be retried, these matters can be given due consideration by the litigants and the trial court.

[5] The point is also raised as to the right of the plaintiff to sue alone and not make his employer or insurer parties plaintiff or defendant. Stackpole v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 181 Cal. 700, 186 Pac. 354, is on all fours with the present case. It was there held that the injured party could not sue directly if suitable objection were made, for the reason that the employer and insurer were necessary parties (italics ours). The plaintiff could have maintained the action jointly with the employer or insurance carrier; or, if they were not willing, he could have sued alone and joined them as defendants. Stackpole v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., supra. This condition is changed by the 1917 amendment, but such amendment has no bearing here.

[6] While the order of the court granting a new trial does not specify the particular ground thereof, the error of the court in giving the instructions adverted to may well have appeared to it to constitute a sufficient ground for such order; and if so, its action will not be disturbed by this court in view of the well settled rule that the granting or refusing of a new trial are matters largely within the discretion of the trial court, and that it is only when this discretion has been abused that an appellate court will reverse the order. Merralls v. S. P. Co., 182 Cal. 19, 22, 186 Pac. 778.

For the reasons given the order is affirmed.

BASSI v. SPRINGFIELD FIRE & MARINE INS. CO. (Civ. 4223.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 19, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 17, 1922.)

1. Evidence ⇨589—Court at liberty to accept testimony of insured when in conflict with that of insurer in making finding of fact.

The trial court was at liberty to accept the testimony of insured in conflict with that of insurer's agent, on which to base its finding that there was no new consideration to support the attempted modification of the policy and that insured did not at the time understand or agree to it.

2. Insurance ⇨144(1)—Mere forbearance to cancel policy not consideration for modification.

Mere forbearance by insurer to cancel policy upon discovery that iron-safe clause was not in policy, without a definite agreement by it not to cancel, would not be a sufficient consideration for modification of the policy to include an iron-safe clause.

3. Estoppel ⇨90(2)—Insured retaining policies after unauthorized modification not estopped to deny validity of modification.

That insured kept policies and failed to notify insurer that he would not accede to the provisions of a clause attached after the delivery of the policies did not estop him from denying the validity of the clause as an unauthorized modification of the policy, where it did not appear that insurer intended to serve notice of cancellation if insured refused to be bound by such clause.

4. Insurance ⇨144(1)—Fire insurance policy cannot be modified or changed by attachment of separate riders after delivery without insured's consent.

Under St. 1909, p. 404, a fire standard insurance policy cannot be modified, changed, or added to except by the attachments of separate riders before delivery of policy to insured, or afterwards, with his consent; and the insurer is not granted by such policies the right to change their provisions at will, without insured's consent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by A. C. Bassi against the Springfield Fire & Marine Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; SLOANE and WASTE, JJ., dissenting.

W. W. Hindman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Louis Lamy and Frank C. Weller, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against it for $15,000 upon two policies of fire insurance.

The facts, as found by the court, are: On November 28, 1920, and for more than four years prior thereto, the plaintiff was engaged in the business of selling and buying new and secondhand goods, wares, and merchandise, consisting of household goods, men's furnishings, etc., at the city of Calexico, county of Imperial, Cal. On March 6, 1920, the defendant issued and delivered to plaintiff a certain policy of fire insurance in the amount of $12,500, covering said stock of merchandise. On May 7, 1920, defendant issued and delivered to plaintiff another policy covering the same property and in the amount of $2,560. Plaintiff paid the respective premiums upon said policies as the policies were delivered to him. At the time of the issuance of said policies, and at the time of the fire which occurred later, the personal property covered by the said policies was contained in a certain brick building in the city of Calexico and said property was solely and exclusively owned by plaintiff and was of the value of more than $20,000. On November 28, 1920, said stock of goods was destroyed by a fire which originated in a building two doors north of plaintiff's said place of business.

The trial court also found that said fire and loss occasioned thereby were not caused through any fault, negligence, or fraud on the part of plaintiff, and that said plaintiff had done no act or thing to invalidate or cancel said policies of insurance; that preliminary proofs of loss were furnished to defendant in due form, and that on February 2, 1921, defendant notified plaintiff that it repudiated any liability on account of said insurance and refused to pay to plaintiff the amount of said policies.

The sole defense offered by defendant was that the plaintiff had not complied with what is termed the "iron-safe clause," alleged to have been a part of said policies. Said clause provides, in effect, that as a part of the consideration for the policy, the assured covenants and agrees to keep a set of books, showing a complete record of business transacted, together with an inventory of stock taken within 12 months prior to the date of any loss, and to keep said books and inventory securely locked in a fireproof safe at night and at all times when the building mentioned in the within policy is not actually open for business. Said clause also provides that, in case of loss, the assured agrees to produce such books and inventory, and, in the event of a failure to produce the same, the policy is to be null and void.

It may be admitted at the outset that the plaintiff did not comply with the provisions of this clause. The testimony shows that his inventory and books were customarily kept in a safe which actually proved to be fire proof. The fire occurred early Sunday morning. On the Saturday evening before the fire, plaintiff worked until very late in the evening on his books and accounts because he desired to collect as much money as possible so as to meet his outstanding obligations. When he left his office some time after 10 o'clock on Saturday night, he expected to return on Sunday morning and complete the work on his accounts and contracts. He therefore left the books on his roller top desk where he had been working, pulling down the top of the desk to cover them, instead of placing them in the safe as usual. The fire occurred very early the next morning and the books and accounts were destroyed. As to whether or not the inventory which plaintiff testified he had taken was sufficient is a question which need not concern us here, because it must be conceded that in one important particular, at least, the plaintiff did not comply with the conditions of said "iron-safe clause," in that he did not put his books and inventory into a fireproof safe. Under these facts, the record presents but one question, i. e. whether or not said "iron-safe clause" was a part of either or both of the policies upon which recovery was had.

Upon this issue, the trial court found, with reference to the $12,500 policy, that said "iron-safe clause" was not attached to said policy at the time the same was executed by defendant and delivered to plaintiff; that about a month or six weeks after the execution and delivery of said policy, defendant's agent called upon plaintiff at his place of business and attached said "iron-safe clause" to said policy, and that there was no new consideration passed between said parties, and that there was no consideration whatever to support the modification or attempted modification of said policy, and that plaintiff did not at the time understand the same or agree thereto.

Defendant's agent admitted the facts as found by the court regarding the condition of the policy when it was delivered by him to plaintiff, and his subsequent attempt, weeks later, to add the "iron-safe clause" rider to the policy. The only conflict in the testimony, with relation to the findings above, is as to whether or not plaintiff agreed to the attachment of the rider. On this point the plaintiff testified that at the time the policy was delivered to him he had had no conversation with defendant's agent concerning the attachment of any rider to the same; that some time later Mr. Grieves, defendant's agent, came to plaintiff's store and wanted to attach a clause to the policy, "and I handed him the policy and he attached the clause and I never looked at it." He also testified that Mr. Grieves told him he was attaching an iron-safe clause, but he did not know what that meant. Mr. Grieves, testifying for the defendant, stated that affer the policy had been delivered by him to plaintiff, the insurance company wrote a letter asking its agent to attach an "iron-safe clause" to this policy; that Grieves, accordingly, wrote up such an indorsement for the policy and took it to plaintiff, some weeks after the policy had been delivered; that said Grieves told plaintiff that the company required him to "keep the books in the safe, and that class of business was not liked by insurance companies, and that was the only way they would carry insurance"; that plaintiff objected at the time, and Grieves told him "that the company required it or they would not take care of the insurance," and thereupon plaintiff assented to it and Grieves attached said rider to the policy.

[1] Although this testimony supports appellant's position that the plaintiff agreed to the attachment of the rider, nevertheless the trial court was at liberty to accept the plaintiff's testimony where it was in conflict with that of defendant's agent, and to find, as we have recited, regarding the matter of the attachment of said "iron-safe clause" to said policy of insurance.

As to the second policy for $2,500, the court has found that at the time of its execution and delivery to plaintiff the said "iron-safe clause" was not a part thereof; that said clause was in fact never attached thereto; that several days after the delivery of said policy to plaintiff, defendant's agent forwarded by mail to plaintiff a rider containing said "iron-safe clause," and requested that plaintiff attach the same to his policy; that plaintiff refused to comply with said request and never attached same to his policy; that there was no consideration whatever for said attempted modification of said policy.

The agent of defendant admitted that said clause was not attached to said policy when it was delivered to plaintiff; that, later, he forwarded by mail to plaintiff a rider containing said clause and requested plaintiff, in a letter sent therewith, to attach same to his said policy. It is true that defendant introduced into evidence an affidavit made by plaintiff after the loss occurred, in which plaintiff said that he had intended to attach said rider to said policy but had overlooked doing so. This affidavit was written by defendant's insurance adjuster, and plaintiff signed same upon the solicitation of said adjuster and Grieves, the agent of defendant. In relation thereto plaintiff testified that the adjuster had asked him to sign this affidavit in order to make the policies uniform and to facilitate the settlement of the loss, and assured him that the loss would be settled. Under such circumstances, the statement therein is not conclusive upon the trial court, particularly in view of plaintiff's positive testimony at the trial that he never agreed to put this rider on his policy; that he read it and did not want to attach it, and that he put it in a pigeon hole in his desk. The trial court has found in accordance with this testimony and has concluded that this rider never became a part of the contract between plaintiff and defendant.

[2] But whether or not said clauses were physically attached to said policies, or whether or not plaintiff consented to accept them, are matters which are not decisive of this case. A mere nudum pactum cannot be enforced against plaintiff, and the really important question is whether or not there was any consideration to support this modification of the existing contracts between the parties. Appellant urges that the finding of the trial court that there was no consideration for the attachment by plaintiff of the riders in question to his policies is erroneous. It is urged that as the policies contained a clause permitting the defendant to cancel the same at any time by giving five days' written notice of cancellation to the insured, the defendant's failure to exercise this privilege at the time it became aware that the "iron-safe clause" had not been made a part of said policies was a consideration for the inclusion of said clauses in said policies. This argument overlooks the fact that defendant did not deprive itself of the privilege of cancellation secured to it by its policy, either in whole or in part or for any length of time. It entered into no agreement which precluded it from giving notice of cancellation to plaintiff at any time. It gave up no right or privilege. Its right to cancel the policies remained unimpaired, whether the clause in question was accepted by plaintiff or not. Under such circumstances, there was no mutuality to the alleged supplemental agreement between the parties. Mere forbearance to cancel the policy would not be a sufficient consideration without a definite agreement not to cancel. Shadburne v. Daly, 76 Cal. 355, 359, 18 Pac. 403; Estate of Thompson, 165 Cal. 296, 131 Pac. 1045.

Policies of insurance are written contracts between the parties and are governed by the same rules which are applicable to contracts generally. The principle of law applicable her is stated in the case of Main Street, etc., Co. v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 129 Cal. 301, 61 Pac. 937, wherein it is said:

"There can be no doubt of the principle contended for by the appellant that an agreement adding to the terms of an existing agreement between the same parties, and by which new and onerous terms are imposed upon one of the parties without any compensating advantage, requires a consideration to support it; though this, of course, may consist either in a new consideration or in some favorable modification of the original contract."

[3] Does then the principle of estoppel enter into the situation, as contended by appellant, and supply the want of a consideration? It is argued that because plaintiff kept the policies and did not notify the defendant that he would not accede to the "iron-safe clause," he is estopped to deny the validity of said clause.

But there is no evidence in the record that the defendant intended to serve upon plaintiff notice of cancellation of said policies in the event plaintiff did not consent to be bound by the "iron-safe clause," and no evidence that plaintiff's failure to notify defendant that he refused to be bound by said clause caused defendant to forego sending such notice. The person claiming the benefit of an estoppel must show that he was misled by conduct of the other party. Washington v. Black, 83 Cal. 290, 294, 23 Pac. 300. The party claiming estoppel must have relied upon conduct of the other and have been induced by it to do something which he would not otherwise have done. McCormick v. Orient Ins. Co., 86 Cal. 260, 263, 24 Pac. 1003. It is an essential element of estoppel by conduct that the party setting it up should have relied upon the conduct of the other and should have been induced thereby to do something which he otherwise would not have done. Barnhart v. Fulkerth, 93 Cal. 497, 29 Pac. 50; First Nat. Bank v. Maxwell, 123 Cal. 360, 55 Pac. 980, 69 Am. St. Rep. 64; Wheaton v. North British, etc., Ins. Co., 76 Cal. 415, 432, 18 Pac. 758, 9 Am. St. Rep. 216.

So far as this claim of appellant is concerned, the record is lacking in the essential proof that the failure of plaintiff to take some affirmative action in reference to the riders sent to him influenced the conduct of the defendant to its injury.

[4] Claim is made by appellant that the policies themselves grant to the insurer the right to change their provisions at will; that such a privilege is a part of the original consideration for the issuance of the policies. This claim is based upon the following: The policies sued on are in the standard form required by the Legislature of the state of California. Act approved March 18, 1909; Stats. 1909, p. 404. Each of said policies provides:

"This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions and those hereinafter stated, which are hereby specially referred to, and made part of this policy, together with such other provisions, agreements or conditions as may be indorsed hereon or added hereto."

Section 10 of said act, approved March 18, 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 404), provides:

"Except as herein otherwise provided, clauses may be attached to the standard form by separate riders in type larger than pica imposing specified duties and obligations upon the insured and limiting the liability of the insurer."

It is contended that, in view of this provision of the act establishing a standard form of insurance policy, the clause above quoted contained in the policies under consideration gave to the insurer the right, at any future time, and from time to time, to modify and change the policies and add new conditions thereto. Such a construction would strain the language used and would violate basic principles of contract law. It would leave no contract between the parties which would be of any value to the insured, because the insurer might, from time to time, add such provisions and conditions as would absolutely nullify all provisions beneficial to the insured. Furthermore, the provisions of section 10 of said act contemplate an "attachment" of separate riders. The policy becomes the property of the insured after delivery and the insurer could only "attach" riders thereto before delivery to him, or afterwards, with his consent. Said act clearly contemplates a physical attachment.

An insurance policy is subject to the same general rules as other contracts. The provision relied upon by the appellant clearly means that the policy is accepted by the insured subject to all the conditions and stipulations contained in the standard form of policy, and also subject to the provisions of any special riders or indorsements which are a part thereof "at the time he accepts the same." Any other construction would make the contract lacking in mutuality, by making it binding upon the insured, but subject to be changed about at will by the insurer. Such a construction is not warranted by the language employed nor by the general policy of the law to construe contracts, if possible, in a way that will render them valid and enforceable.

The cases cited by appellant in support of this contention are not in point here. They involve changes in by-laws of mutual benefit associations where the beneficiary agreed to be bound by the laws of the association and that the same might be changed from time to time. It was held that parties may contract in reference to laws of future enactment and may agree to be bound and affected by them as they would be if such laws were existing. The policies under consideration in those cases contained an express provision that the by-laws of the association might be changed from time to time. Such a provision clearly relates to the future and we find nothing in the language of the policies involved in the present case which is analogous thereto.

Under our conclusion that these riders never modified the terms of the policies because of the fact that they were supported by no new consideration, and plaintiff was not estopped to set up the want of consideration therefor, it becomes unnecessary for us to pass upon the further questions raised in the briefs, such as whether the provisions of said "iron-safe clause" constitute a warranty or a representation, and whether or not the record shows a substantial compliance therewith by the plaintiff. These matters become entirely immaterial if the plaintiff was never bound by the provisions of said "iron-safe clause."

The judgment is affirmed.

WALKER et al. v. SMITH et al. (Civ. 4204.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 19, 1922.)

1. Deeds $\S$ 211(4) — Substantial compliance with terms of certificates as to independent advice and explanation held shown.

Evidence in action to avoid an aged woman's deed of her farm to one of her children held to show substantial compliance with terms of certificates to the deed, that grantor was given independent advice and explanation of the effect of the deed, though as matter of law this was superfluous.

2. Deeds $\S$ 196(3) — Grantee in deed from mother held to have overcome presumption of undue influence.

Defendant, in action to avoid the deed to him of a farm by his aged mother, living with him alone, held to have overcome any presumption of undue influence cast on him by C. Code, $\S$ 2235, as to transactions between persons in trust relation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by Lillie M. Walker and others against A. L. Smith and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Olin L. Berry, of San Francisco, for appellants.

W. D. L. Held and Keith C. Eversole, both of Ukiah, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action brought by certain of the heirs of Ana J. Smith, deceased, to have declared fraudulent and void a deed made by said Ana J. Smith to her son A. L. Smith. A. L. Smith is the principal defendant; the rest of the defendants are heirs of the deceased, who refused to join as plaintiffs in the action. From a judgment in favor of the defendants the plaintiffs appeal.

The property over which this controversy arose consists of 160 acres situate in the county of Mendocino. Prior to March 9, 1902, Thomas Smith and Ana J. Smith, the parents of the parties to this action, resided on the property. Thomas Smith died on said date, leaving a will in which he devised to his daughters, Lillie M. Walker, Daisy C. Farley, Maggie J. Cobb, and his grandson Ernest L. Simpson, share and share alike, said land, reserving a life estate therein for Ana J. Smith, his wife, and providing a small cash bequest for the remaining children. The will was admitted to probate, and Ana J. Smith became vested with the title to the property; the probate court setting the same aside to her as a homestead. After the death of Thomas Smith all of the children, with the exception of A. L. Smith, married and left the ranch. A. L. Smith remained at home and took care of his mother, who was getting well along in years and unable to do any work, and also carried on the ranch. He remained with his mother practically all the time. On March 29, 1913, Ana J. Smith executed a deed in favor of A. L. Smith, which deed was recorded on April 2, 1913. Ana J. Smith died intestate December 13, 1915, and this action was filed March 18, 1918, to set aside the deed.

The circumstances surrounding the execution of the deed upon which the appellants rely to sustain their cause of action are with regard principally to certain certificates signed by the notary and the witnesses at the time of the execution of the deed and attached to it, and a declaration of the grantor incorporated in the deed. Said declaration is to the following effect:

"The grantor herein does hereby state and represent that in the execution of this deed she has had the independent advice of persons not interested therein, and that the execution and delivery of this deed is the result of her own volition, and that she understands the effect and result of her act in so doing, and understands fully that her execution and delivery thereof is irrevocable; that she has read this deed; that she is of sound mind and memory, and in this transaction she is not acting under any duress or influence of any kind whatever. By the acceptance hereof the grantee assumes the payment of the promissory note secured by mortgage recorded in Book 67 of Mtgs. p. 175."

The certificate of the notary was in the ordinary form, but with the following addition:

"At said time I did, without the presence of the grantee therein named and prior to the execution of this instrument, give to said grantor the benefit of a full, free and private preliminary conference, and did then and there fully explain to her the effect and result of the execution and delivery of said deed; that at said time the grantor was of sound mind and memory and not acting under the influence of any person whatever, but was acting solely of her own volition and fully understood the nature, effect and result of her act, and under such circumstances and at such time she did sign said deed and acknowledge the same before me as notary public."

A certificate of two witnesses to substantially the same effect as the certificate of the notary was appended to the deed.

It is the claim of the appellants that the very fact that these certificates were used, and the grantor's said declaration incorporated in the deed, affords a strong inference that the mental condition of the grantor was such as to raise a suspicion concerning her understanding of the transaction.

The testimony of A. L. Smith indicated that up to a few months before the deed was made he had no idea of becoming the owner of the ranch, and that the idea was finally brought home to him by his sister Mary E. Tracey. The ranch was evidently very dear to Ana J. Smith, for the record indicates that after returning to the ranch from a visit to one of her daughters in San Francisco in 1912 she did not again care to leave it.

It may be well at this point to examine briefly into the home life of the family and the intelligence of Ana J. Smith. Mrs. Smith was educated during the early years of her life in the Spanish language. After coming to California she entered Notre Dame College in San Jose, where she received further education for a year or so. Later she married Thomas Smith, and from about the year 1858—being at that time about 23 years of age—lived in Mendocino county upon the ranch here in question. There she lived her life and raised her family—five girls and two boys. Of this large family but one remained with the mother in her declining years, A. L. Smith. The record is vague as to the particular time the mother became too feeble and ill to do any work around the house, but suffice it to say that for a number of years prior to her death she was unable to do any work whatsoever. According to the statement of Daisy Farley, she was in 1912 so physically weak that she was unable to go to church and return without becoming exhausted; and later on she was subject to sinking spells immediately after eating. This witness and other of the plaintiffs told of certain delusions under which Ana J. Smith labored. Such being the case, we must of necessity take into consideration the effect of all this on a man having the responsibility and charge of the old lady, and in addition the burden of carrying on the ranch. It appears that in 1912 and 1913 the condition of Mrs. Smith was such that on account of her rheumatism it was necessary for her son A. L. Smith to wash her face, comb her hair, do the cooking and washing for both, the chores around the place, the housekeeping, and in addition put in a crop.

We have heretofore shown that Mrs. Smith was a woman of intelligence, educated in her native language, and possessing that extensive and practical experience and wisdom to be derived from raising a family of seven children. Even though it appeared that physically she was in a bad way, still, as plaintiff Farley testified, her mind was in a pretty good condition, excepting she would get alarmed at night. It is at this time that we first find the thought taking root in the mind of Mrs. Smith of deeding the property to her son A. L. Smith. Coming home from a visit to her daughter Mrs. Farley, in San Francisco, in company with her niece, Emily Tracey, she informed Emily that she intended to leave everything to A. L. Smith, giving as her reason that she was disgusted with the way she had been treated while away from home, and that she knew that with Louis (A. L. Smith) she would be perfectly happy the rest of her life. Whether the trip to San Francisco caused this attitude we do not know, but coming at this time it seems significant, especially in view of the fact that, according to the testimony of Mary Tracey, another daughter, the visit with Mrs. Farley was not entirely harmonious. However that may be, the fact remains that Mrs. Smith left her daughter Mrs. Farley and finished her visit to San Francisco with another daughter, Mrs. Tracey, returning to the ranch in June, 1912, accompanied by the latter's daughter.

We find a further expression of Mrs. Smith concerning her intention regarding the disposition of her ranch in February of the following year. It appears that Mary E. Tracey was at the ranch on a visit, and during a conversation with her mother learned that she was kindly disposed toward Louis, stating that he was so kind and considerate, and she wanted to leave the place to him; that she had lived there so long, and that he never urged her to sell as did the others. Mrs. Tracey, although one of the heirs, told her mother at that time that she would not object to such a course, and communicated the conversation to her brother Louis. He at first said that he did not wish to have the property, but later stated that it would be agreeable to him to receive it, and he spoke to his mother on the subject. She said it would be all right. Smith was a notary, but evidently wishing to prevent any taint attaching to the transaction, wrote to his attorney at the county seat, explained the circumstances, and shortly thereafter the deed with the certificates hereinbefore described were sent to him by said attorney ready for execution. Arrangements were made for two witnesses, neighbors, and for a notary, and on the 29th of May, 1913, the deed was executed; the grantee not being present at the time. So far there appears to have been a substantial compliance with the terms of the certificates: the notary read the deed in the presence of Mrs. Smith and the witnesses, and in this connection A. L. Smith likewise testified that he also read the deed to his mother. The deed being signed by Mrs. Smith, the notary took her acknowledgment, and the witnesses signed the prepared certificates.

The only contrary evidence appears from the witness Hathaway, who, after two or three statements that he insisted on knowing what the document was before he signed, testified that he asked Mrs. Smith if she wanted them to sign the document, and that she answered, "Yes." He also claimed that no one read the deed to her or told her what it was, which is contrary to the testimony of the notary and the other witness. We can only infer that the testimony of Hathaway was disbelieved by the trial court. The record shows that he was very evasive in many of his answers, and, moreover, his reputation for veracity was directly impeached by character witnesses.

[1] The principal contention of the appellants is that the grantor in the execution of the deed had no independent advice nor opportunity therefor, this claim being based upon the fact that, although the certificates recited that independent advice was given, still the effect of the execution of the document was not explained, which, it is argued, strengthens the suspicion attaching to the preparation and use of these certificates, and tends to show that the grantor did not understand the transaction, or was under undue influence.

Taking all the facts into consideration, we are of the opinion that the circumstances surrounding the execution of the deed were not such as to show fraud or undue influence; and, as to the use of the certificates, they were prepared by an attorney, to whom the task of drawing the conveyance was intrusted, with the idea of inviting the particular attention of all parties concerned to the nature of the transaction as being between a woman of advanced age and a son who was to benefit thereby. The deed was read to the grantor, and undoubtedly those present at the time gave to the certificates all the attention which they thought they required. The attorney who drew the certificates was not present, and as a consequence the performance of the conditions which he was disposed to insist upon may not have been as thorough as desired; but, as before stated, a review of the circumstances shows a substantial compliance with their terms. Of course, as a matter of law they were entirely superfluous. There was no attempt made by either of the parties to the deed to keep its execution a secret, and it was in fact soon known to some of the relatives, as of course immediately to the two witnesses and the notary. It was recorded a few days after its execution. There is also evidence to the effect that at least one of the plaintiffs knew of the deed, and it was testified by A. L. Smith that he was informed by that person that an attempt would be made to set it aside.

[2] Appellants make the further contention that, the grantee being a son, a confidential relation existed between the parties to the deed, throwing the burden upon him to prove that its execution was entirely free from undue influence. They cite numerous cases to sustain the theory that one who holds a confidential relation towards another may not take advantage of that relation for his own benefit, or deal with the other on terms of his own making, and that any transaction with the other by which he benefits will be presumed to have resulted from an undue exercise of the influence arising from the existence of such relationship.

The rule relied upon by the appellants as laid down in the cases cited must be conceded, and is well established. For the purpose of this case, then, we must concede that the burden was on the defendant A. L. Smith to show that the deed was not the result of his undue influence over his mother, and thus overcome the presumption of undue influence cast upon such a transaction by the provisions of section 2235 of the Civil Code.

The case of Broadbudd v. James, 13 Cal. App. 464, 110 Pac. 158, is precisely applicable to the facts of this case. Except that the property was deeded to a daughter, and that the parties seeking to set aside the deed were children of the grantee's sister, instead of sisters and brothers, the case is on all fours with the instant case. In that case the grantor lacked but a few days of being 100 years of age, and according to the evidence was less intelligent than Ana J. Smith. She was also hard of hearing, infirm, stone blind, and a cripple. It would seem that in the Broadbudd Case the validity of the deed was more doubtful than here. However, the following language in that case applies to this case:

"The position of respondents in relation to the voluntary character of the transfer is equally impregnable. The testimony of the defendants and of the three witnesses, who were present at the execution of the deed, justifies the conclusion of the court that the grantor was free from undue or any improper influence of the grantee or any other person. The evident affection that existed between mother and daughter, the kindly and continued ministrations of the latter to the comfort and happiness of the former, and the declaration of the grantor as to her reason for making the deed are all significant circumstances tending to rebut any unfavorable inference against the grantee. As clearly indicative that she was following her unaided inclination and volition, we find, according to the testimony, the old lady declaring: 'Mary Ann was good and kind to her and she didn't know how she could have got along without her, and she said she wanted her to have what property she had. She had deserved it all.' Upon the theory of the uniform kindness of said Mary Ann to her mother, which finds abundant support, and in view of the fact that her attentions had continued for so many years, and that she was the only living child, the conveyance is easily explicable, and seems entirely reasonable. While her considerate and tender care of her mother was no more than required by filial duty, yet the great infirmities of the aged woman, while rendering the duty no less imperative, imposed an onerous burden and responsibility, and the acceptance and acquittance of this duty with cheerful and persistent zeal deserve unstinted commendation and generous reward."

As was noted in the case cited, so here, the disposition made by Ana J. Smith in favor of her son was the natural and proper reward of years of service and devotion to an aged and infirm mother, a burden cheerfully assumed and patiently borne, with little, if any, co-operation on the part of his brothers and sisters, whose natural obligation to their aged and all but helpless parent was as great as his. It would, indeed, have been a matter of surprise if Mrs. Smith had not made precisely the disposition of her property that she did.

Speaking of the presumption of undue influence the court in the same case said:

"It is a circumstance, of course, inviting careful consideration to the transaction, but before it can justify the inference of undue influence there must be added, imposition, fraud, importunity or something of that kind. * * * Cases of this kind plainly turn upon the exercise of actual undue influence and not upon any presumption of invalidity. A gift from parent to child is certainly not presumed to be invalid." 13 Cal. App. 472, 110 Pac. 161.

In the same opinion the court also uses this language:

"It must be apparent, however, that if the evidence is sufficient to support the conclusion that the grantor fully understood the nature of the transaction and that the conveyance was the effect of her untrammelled and voluntary act, the questions as to consideration and independent advice become unimportant. This follows from the incontrovertible right of every one, in the absence of fraud, to dispose of his own property according to his volition. The first inquiry suggested, then, is, can a rational conclusion be drawn from the evidence that the grantor had sufficient understanding to appreciate the nature of the transaction and to realize the significance of the conveyance?" 13 Cal. App. 468, 110 Pac. 159.

The court in the case at bar found that the deed was executed for a good and valuable consideration; that the same was neither void nor fraudulently procured; that Ana J. Smith executed the deed of her own volition, and had the independent advice of persons not interested therein, and she then and there fully understood that the execution and delivery thereof was irrevocable, and she realized that she was conveying the property to A. L. Smith.

Considerable testimony was adduced as to the unsoundness of mind of the grantor, several witnesses reciting certain traits and delusions which it was alleged she had. Other than the testimony of the plaintiffs there was no evidence of these traits and delusions; while on the other hand a number of witnesses, neighbors and relatives testified that she had no such traits or delusions.

We see no reason, therefore, to interfere with the finding of the court that at the time of the execution of the deed Ana J. Smith was of sound mind and memory, and not acting under duress or influence of any kind whatever.

Taking into consideration the circumstances surrounding the home life of Ana J. Smith, and the further fact that there is nothing to indicate a frame of mind to deed the property otherwise than it was actually deeded, and drawing the inference, as was said in Mackall v. Mackall, 135 U. S. 167, 10 Sup. Ct. 705, 34 L. Ed. 84, that, "Right or wrong, it is to be expected that a parent will favor the child who stands by him, and give to him, rather than the others, his property," it would seem only natural, as already indicated, that A. L. Smith would be the favored child.

We are clearly of the opinion that the finding of the trial court is amply supported by the evidence, and we see no reason to interfere with the conclusion reached.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; KNIGHT, Justice pro tem.

TROUGHTON et al. v. EAKLE. (Civ. 2435.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 19, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 17, 1922.)

1. Vendor and purchaser — 170—Under contract making payment condition precedent, tender by purchaser not good if coupled with condition that conveyance be made before money paid.

Where a contract to sell realty provided that performance by purchasers of their covenants was a condition precedent to vendor's obligation to convey title, to put vendor in default purchasers' offer of the price must not be coupled with the condition that conveyance be made before the money passed, as purchasers had to pay before they could call on vendor to act at all.

2. Vendor and purchaser — 170—Under contract making payment condition precedent methods of putting vendor in default stated.

Where a contract to sell realty provided that performance by purchasers of their covenants was a condition precedent to vendor's obligation to convey title, if purchasers had paid the price or offered to pay and vendor refused to accept payment, or if vendor's conduct prevented the making of such an offer and purchasers had deposited in a bank in vendor's name the required amount as authorized by Civ. Code, §§ 1500 and 1511, subd. 1, purchasers would be in a position to compel performance.

3. Vendor and purchaser — 170—Offer of payment by one unable to pay held not to put vendor in default.

Where contract made payment of the price a condition precedent to the duty to convey, an offer to pay by one unable to pay until conveyance was made to a third party could not put vendor in default, in view of Civ. Code, § 1495, providing that an offer of performance is of no effect if offeror is unable to perform according to the offer.

4. Vendor and purchaser — 170—Under time of the essence provision offer to pay on day following last day stated held too late.

Where a contract for the conveyance of realty provided that time was of the essence, a tender made on the day after the last day on which payment could be made came too late.

5. Contracts — 318—Rule of strict construction against forfeitures held not to require court to resort to strained construction.

Civil Code, § 1442, providing that a condition involving a forfeiture must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it is created, does not require the court to resort to a strained construction defeating the clearly expressed intention of the parties.

6. Vendor and purchaser — 335—Party suffering forfeiture entitled to relief on making compensation.

Where under a conditional sale contract purchasers paid part of the price and remained in possession of the land two years, and then forfeited these payments by failing to make additional payments, their remedy was to proceed under Civ. Code, § 3275, providing that a party may be relieved from a forfeiture on making full compensation to the other party, except in case of grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent breach of duty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by A. F. Troughton and another against Martha A. Eakle. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank Freeman, of Willows, and Brown & Alberty, of Colusa, for appellant.

Thomas Rutledge and Seth Millington, Jr., both of Colusa, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. [1] Plaintiffs had judgment for the sum of $6,330, which they had paid defendant on a contract for the sale of real estate in Colusa county executed on September 6, 1918. The portions of said contract material to the inquiry herein are as follows:

"Said vendor (Martha A. Eakle), in consideration of the covenants, agreements, and promises of said vendees (A. F. Troughton and E. L. Lewis) hereinafter set out, agrees to sell and convey unto said vendees the said lots of land hereinabove described; and said vendor agrees to convey said above-described land to said vendees upon the performance of, and compliance with, the following agreements, covenants, stipulations, and conditions, which said agreements, covenants, stipulations, and conditions, and each of them, are hereby considered conditions precedent to the fulfillment hereof by said vendor, viz.: That said vendees shall and will pay to said vendor for the above-described land the sum of $32,000 in lawful money of the United States to be paid at the times and in the manner hereinafter set out, to wit: $1,100.00 part and parcel of said purchase price to be paid on the execution and delivery of this contract; $400 further part and parcel of said purchase price is to be paid on or before October 1, 1918; $3,000.00 further part and parcel of said purchase price is to be paid on or before October 1, 1919, together with the interest on the unpaid portion of said purchase price from the date of this agreement to October 1, 1919, at the rate of 6% per annum, to be paid on or before October 1, 1919; $3,000.00 further part and parcel of said purchase price together with interest on the unpaid portion of said purchase price from October 1, 1919, to October 1, 1920, is to be paid on or before October 1, 1920, at the rate of 6% per annum; in event the full sum of $7,500 on the purchase price of said premises, together with interest on all deferred payments to the 1st day of October, 1920, at the rate of 6% per annum, have been paid in full, said vendees are entitled to demand of and receive from said vendor and said vendor in that event shall be required to make and deliver to said vendees a grant, bargain and sale deed for the above-described property, conveying said property to said vendees free and clear of incumbrances except taxes for the years 1919 and 1920, on condition that said vendees execute and deliver to said vendor a first mortgage upon said above-described premises, for the balance of the purchase price thereof, to wit, the sum of $24,500, which amount is to be evidenced by a promissory note executed by said vendees to the order of said vendor payable five years after date, and which shall bear interest at the rate of 6% per annum, to be compounded every twelve months if not paid. * * *

"Said vendees agree to purchase the above-described land from said vendor and pay therefor the amount above mentioned at the times and in the manner and with interest on all deferred payments hereinabove set forth and in event of the conveyance to them of the land as hereinbefore provided for they further agree to make, execute and deliver to said vendor their promissory note for the sum of $24,500.00 for the remainder of the purchase price of said premises, and also securing same by a first mortgage lien upon said premises to said vendor as hereinabove provided. * * *

"It is agreed as a condition of the contract that said vendees shall and will secure the payments of both principal and interest hereinabove agreed to be paid on or before the 1st day of October, 1919, and on or before October 1st, 1920, by crop mortgages on the crops to be raised on said premises during the year 1919 and 1920. * * *

"As a further consideration for the contract of sale and purchase said vendees are to pay all state, county, and other taxes or assessments upon said real property for the year 1919 and 1920.

"Should said vendees fail to perform any and all of the foregoing covenants and agreements and conditions upon their part to be performed, they are to forfeit and lose all right in said land and all right in, under, and through this contract, and in such event said vendor is to retain all sums which may theretofore have been paid her as and for rental and for as and for liquidated damages, and it is agreed that such sums are to be so considered as rental and liquidated damages, and also in such event said vendor is hereby authorized, and it is hereby agreed that she may immediately enter upon said land and exclude all persons therefrom and take full possession of the same to the exclusion of said vendees.

"It is further covenanted, understood, and agreed that time shall be and is of the essence of this contract and of each of the provisions and conditions herein contained."

Plaintiffs did not pay the taxes for 1919, and they did not pay the money that was due on October 1, 1920.

To excuse their failure to pay said taxes they allege:

That "defendant had taken barley belonging to plaintiffs of the value of $330, for the purpose of paying the said taxes, but the defendant had willfully neglected to pay said taxes, notwithstanding that she had received the said property of plaintiffs so to do, and that plaintiffs, notwithstanding that defendant had already received more than enough money to pay said taxes, made a second offer far in excess of the amount required."

This was denied in the answer, but, as the other point is of decisive importance, we pass to its consideration.

[2] In view of the plain language of the contract, it cannot be doubted that plaintiffs could not put defendant in default without paying or offering to pay the sum of money that was due on said October 1, 1920. The parties were very careful to provide that the performance by plaintiffs of their covenants was to be a condition precedent to the obligation of defendant to convey the title. When plaintiffs paid the money or made a valid offer to do so, they could demand a conveyance, and not before. The covenants are not concurrent or reciprocal, as sometimes termed, and hence it necessarily follows that plaintiffs' payment of the money or offer to pay could not be coupled with the condition that the conveyance be made before the money was transferred. Plaintiffs' obligation was absolute and unconditional to pay before they could call upon defendant to act at all. But, if they paid according to their agreement, or offered to pay and defendant refused to accept the money, or if by the conduct of defendant plaintiffs were prevented from making such payment or offer, by depositing the money as provided by the statute (section 1500, Civ. Code), they would be in a position to compel conveyance or to recover the money already paid. This seems plain on principle and is in consonance with the authorities cited by appellant, a few of which may be noticed.

In Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac.

713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17, the court said:

"In the case at bar the payment of the final amount under the contract, at the time and in the manner agreed upon, was a condition precedent to the right of the vendee to demand a conveyance. Upon his failure to make payment the vendee committed a breach, and no affirmative act upon the part of the vendor was necessary to bring about this result. * * * The vendor, in refusing to accept the tender and to repay the money, is neither violating this contract nor rescinding it, nor treating it as at an end. He is standing squarely upon its terms. * * * The contract is made to depend upon a condition precedent. By its terms no right is to vest in the vendee until certain acts of payment have been done by him, and a court of equity no more than a court of law will relieve a vendee under such circumstances from the penalties arising from the breach of such condition, in the absence of an equitable showing to excuse his default."

In the concurring opinion therein by Mr. Justice Harrison it was said:

"Under the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant, neither could maintain an action thereon against the other without having performed all of the conditions previously to be performed by him. The plaintiff could not maintain an action for a conveyance of the land until he had paid or tendered the money which he was to pay therefor. * * * Whether the action be to enforce the contract, or to recover damages for its breach, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff in such action to show a performance on his part of all the acts required to be performed by him, before he can call upon the other to comply with his part of the agreement, or to respond in damages for a failure so to do."

The contract therein was similar to the one involved herein in that—

"Time was made of the essence of the contract, and performance by the plaintiff was made a condition precedent whereon depended the agreement of defendant to convey, and, if plaintiff failed to perform his covenants, defendant was to be released from all obligations to convey, and plaintiff was to forfeit all moneys paid and all rights under the agreement."

In Schwerin Estate Realty Co. v. Slye, 173 Cal. 170, 159 Pac. 420:

"Time was expressly made of the essence of the agreement of January 18, 1913, and failure to perform by defendants, under the terms of said contract, would work a forfeiture of all rights of the vendees leaving the sums previously paid in the possession of the vendor as liquidated damages."

The court said:

"We cannot escape from the conclusion that by failing to prove their readiness, ability, and willingness to perform their part of the contract within the time limited therein the defendants utterly failed to establish their right to any relief. * * * Under the terms of the contract no affirmative act on the part of the vendor was necessary to place the vendees in default. It expressly made failure to comply with its terms within the time limited 'by the parties of the second part' [the vendees] an automatic termination of all of the vendor's obligations in law and equity."

And quotation was made from the Glock opinion as embodying the doctrine that was applicable to the facts of the case.

Unless we are to depart radically from the terms which the parties herein deliberately adopted to express their intention, we must hold that plaintiffs were required to perform their agreement or offer to do so before they could place defendant in default.

But if their performance was made precedent and unconditional, it necessarily follows that, if they relied upon an offer of performance or tender, it must also be absolute and unconditional in order to impose upon defendant an obligation to convey. An offer to perform could, of course, be no more nor less than a legal effort to do what the contract required; that is, to pay the money unconditionally. But respondents admit that—

"The plaintiffs did not have the money themselves to make the final payment falling due October 1st, and, in order to prevent their forfeiture, made arrangements with a Miss Forgeus by which she agreed to advance the money to them for this purpose upon the condition that the respondents would convey the land to her, Miss Forgeus, making it a condition that the money should not be paid over to Mrs. Eakle except upon condition that Mrs. Eakle execute her deed."

The evidence presented by plaintiffs show, however, a more complicated situation than is thus indicated by their statement.

J. M. Stovall, the cashier of the bank of Williams, who was the custodian of the money, testified that his authority was conferred by telephone from Miss Forgeus; that she told him "to pay Mrs. Eakle $5,000 on a deed to the place"; he called Mrs. Eakle on the phone and could not get her, but on that day she came into the bank, about noon the 1st day of October; that he "made a tender of the money, and she refused it, and it was never placed to her credit, as she refused to have it transferred on the books." The following questions and answers also appear on his direct examination:

"Q. Did she give any reason for refusing? A. I don't recall. Q. Did you offer any money to her upon any condition? A. No, sir. Q. It was a straight unequivocal offer? A. Yes, sir. Q. Without any qualifications? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you specifically tell her that that was the money to cover the Troughton and Lewis payment? A. No. Q. Did she know what it was for? A. Yes; because she was talking to Mr. Troughton at the time; she knew that that was the transaction. Q. Did she say anything about executing the deed or not, or was it mentioned? A. Nothing mentioned."

Quite a different color was given to the foregoing by his testimony on cross-examination. Therein he testified that he received on said day a telephonic communication from Miss Forgeus, which she confirmed by letter a day or two after. Then followed these questions and answers:

"Q. Well, I understood you to say that the telephonic communication was that the money the $5,000 was to be given to Mrs. Eakle upon a deed to Miss Forgeus; you were transacting the business for Miss Forgeus? A. Yes, sir. Q. You were not representing Mr. Troughton or Mr. Lewis or Mrs. Eakle? A. No. Q. You were representing her entirely? A. Yes, sir. Q. This money was to be paid over to Mrs. Eakle upon title being conferred to Miss Forgeus? A. Yes; a title to Miss Forgeus. Q. So your transaction had nothing to do with any relationship between Mrs. Eakle and Mr. Troughton and Lewis at all? A. Excepting we had to have the deed.

"The Court: From what? A. From Mrs. Eakle to Miss Forgeus.

"Mr. Freeman: Q. And she would not make that deed and said you need not deposit that money for any such purpose? A. Yes, sir; she refused to have it placed to her credit."

In the redirect examination appear the following questions and answers:

"Q. On the 1st of October did you tell Mrs. Eakle anything about that deed to Miss Forgeus or did you even know about it at that time? A. She phoned to us about the deed, and as to this money, and said to pay Mrs. Eakle on the delivery of the deed. Q. What did you tell Mrs. Eakle? A. I told her there was $5,000 there, on the delivery of the deed."

In the recross-examination we find the following:

"Q. The fact is that you had this $5,000 from Miss Forgeus, and that it was her money, and it was to be applied upon a purchase of that property by her? A. Yes. * * * Q. You would not have given up this money to Mrs. Eakle until you got that deed? A. No. Q. Or to anybody else? A. No. Q. And that deed would have been to Miss Forgeus with a clear title? A. No; not a clear title at that time, because there was no mention made of a clear title in the office. Q. But it was Miss Forgeus' money? A. Yes; until the deed. Q. Until the deed to Miss Forgeus had been executed and delivered to you? A. Yes; that was her instructions."

While in the direct examination the witness speaks of a "tender" of the $5,000, there is no claim that he actually proffered the money. If he had intended to make an unconditional payment, he would, of course, have offered her the money or its equivalent. However, if from this part of his testimony it could be said that by her refusal to accept his proposal he was excused from actually producing the money or depositing it in her name, and thus a case was made out within the contemplation of section 1500 of the Civil Code, providing:

"An obligation for the payment of money is extinguished by a due offer of payment, if the amount is immediately deposited in the name of the creditor, with some bank of deposit within this state, of good repute, and notice thereof is given to the creditor"

—it is quite plain from the consideration of the whole of the testimony of the witness that a very different situation is presented. While there is an apparent conflict between his direct and cross examination, there can be no doubt that he promised to pay the money only upon condition that a deed be executed either to plaintiffs or to Miss Forgeus. As we have seen, this was not such offer as the contract required. Indeed, the fair inference from the whole of his testimony is that he insisted upon a conveyance to Miss Forgeus as a condition precedent to the payment of the money. Manifestly, appellant was under no obligation to give heed to that proposal. Her duty was to convey to plaintiffs upon their payment or unconditional offer of payment of said sum.

[3] Moreover, under section 1495 of the Civil Code:

"An offer of performance is of no effect if the person making it is not able and willing to perform according to the offer."

It clearly appears from the testimony of the witness that he could not and would not pay over the money until he got the deed for Miss Forgeus. Hence he had neither the ability nor willingness to make the payment in accordance with the contract of the parties herein. The fact is that the witness was acting for Miss Forgeus, and his chief concern was to secure for her the conveyance of the property.

Under the circumstances, whatever offer or promise was made by Mr. Stovall did not put appellant in default. At least it involved a condition which he had no right to impose. But if it could be said that an offer to pay the money if appellant would execute a deed might be regarded as satisfying the requirements of the contract, and that Mr. Stovall disregarded his instructions and made such offer, the promise was futile because of his inability to perform. Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 17, 91 Pac. 1001; Allen v. Chatfield, 172 Cal. 60, 156 Pac. 47.

It is to be observed that the complaint of plaintiffs does not allege a tender of the money on said October 1, but:

That they "deposited said sum of $3,000, together with the interest due on the unpaid portion of said purchase price from October 1, 1919, to October 1, 1920, in the bank of Williams to the credit of said defendant, and that plaintiffs were ready and willing on said 1st day of October, 1920, to execute and deliver to said defendant the said mortgage and promissory note, but the defendant refused to meet with said plaintiffs for the purpose of accepting said note and mortgage and to convey said property.

"That immediately upon the deposit of said money said defendant was notified to come and take it, and was notified that said plaintiffs were ready and willing to execute and deliver said promissory note and mortgage, but defendant refused to accept said money or said promissory note and mortgage and refused to execute and deliver said deed, and defendant willfully concealed herself so that plaintiffs could not demand said conveyance."

As we read the record, all these allegations are unsupported by the evidence. They did not deposit the money to the credit of appellant; they were not able and willing to execute the note and mortgage, since they had not made nor suitably offered to make the payment, which was a precedent condition to the execution of said instruments, and we find no evidence that defendant refused to meet with plaintiffs for said purpose, to accept the money, or to execute the deed as required by the contract.

We may add in this connection that particular emphasis is placed upon the circumstance that appellant on said October 1st went to the city of Colusa, and it is claimed that this was for the purpose of concealing herself. The proof to the contrary is that she presented herself at the bank in Williams in the forenoon, and thus afforded respondents an opportunity to make the payment and demand the conveyance, and the uncontradicted testimony of U. W. Brown, Esq., her attorney, who testified that she came to his office in Colusa about 2 o'clock in the afternoon of that day; that Troughton called Mr. Brown by telephone shortly after 2 o'clock and said he was going to Colusa, and the latter informed him that Mrs. Eakle was then in his office, and Troughton said he was coming over "to prepare and execute the papers"; that Mr. Brown went to work preparing the deed and mortgage, deed from Mrs. Eakle to Troughton and the mortgage from Troughton and his wife to Mrs. Eakle, and Troughton said he would be right over. Mrs. Eakle then came to Mr. Brown's office several times to know if Troughton had come, and the last time she was there was about 5 o'clock, and she said she was obliged to return to Williams by 6 o'clock. On Mr. Troughton's arrival there Mr. Brown asked him why he had been so long in reaching Colusa, and he said he was trying to get into communication with his wife in Woodland. Mr. Brown's veracity is unimpeached, and his testimony is not disputed, and that there was anything surreptitious or sinister in the conduct of appellant is entirely inconsistent with his statements on the witness stand.

Any payment or offer of payment on the part of plaintiffs would have been excused, of course, on principle, as well as by authority of subdivision 1 of section 1511 of the Civil Code, if appellant had concealed herself or had refused an unconditional offer of the money, but we find no such situation. We regard the only reasonable inference from the testimony to be that appellant went to Colusa for the purpose of consulting her attorney as to how she might protect her own interest and also be prepared to carry out her contract if plaintiffs met the situation, but that respondents failed to perform or offer to perform the primary obligation resting upon them, and hence appellant was not called upon to take any affirmative action.

It may be, as suggested by respondents, that if she had accepted the conditional offer, she would have received the money and the note and mortgage would have been executed, but she had the legal right to stand upon her contract and to insist that respondents comply with its terms.

[4] It may be added that respondents rely also upon what occurred the following day set forth in the complaint as follows:

"That on the 2d day of October, 1920, plaintiffs demanded of defendant the conveyance of said property and again tendered to defendant the sum of $3,000 together with the interest due on the unpaid portion of said purchase price from October 1, 1919, to October 1st, 1920, and were ready and willing and offered to the defendant to make and execute the note and mortgage agreed on in said agreement, and to deliver the same to the defendant, and to do and perform all of their agreements under the said agreement upon the like performance by the defendant and have duly performed all the conditions of said agreement on their part."

But, as we have seen, time was made of the essence of the contract, and the payment was to be made not later than October 1st. If any forfeiture occurred, it was complete on that date, and it could not be undone by any act of respondents on a later date.

Besides, it appears from the record that the offer was made on October 2d on the express condition that she would execute a deed to Troughton and the latter to Miss Forgeus before appellant should recover the money. Indeed, it is admitted by respondents that "plaintiffs were able only to pay this money to defendant upon condition that she execute her deed." Such was not the engagement of the parties, and there is no question of their right to make the unconditional payment an essential prerequisite to entitle plaintiffs to demand a deed.

[5] It is true that the law looks with disfavor upon forfeitures and has declared that "a condition involving a forfeiture must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it is created" (section 1442, Civ. Code), but this does not mean that the courts may make for the parties a different contract from what they have agreed upon or resort to a strained and unnatural construction to defeat or nullify their clearly expressed purpose or intention.

[6] But respondents urge that it "would be manifestly unjust for defendant to be permitted to keep the purchase price paid on the ground of a forfeiture," and appellant rejoins that it would be iniquitous "for plaintiffs to use defendant's land two years, and take the crops therefrom for their own use, without paying a nickel's rental or consideration therefor."

At any rate, the courts are ready upon the slightest equitable consideration to relieve parties, upon such terms as may be just, from the results of a forfeiture. The principle is embodied in section 3275 of the Civil Code as follows:

"Whenever, by the terms of an obligation, a party thereto incurs a forfeiture, or a loss in the nature of a forfeiture, by reason of his failure to comply with its provisions, he may be relieved therefrom, upon making full compensation to the other party, except in case of a grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent breach of duty."

We see no reason why such relief might not be had in the present case, as it does not fall within the exception. The plaintiffs made an effort to comply with their obligation, but, acting probably without legal advice, their effort was ineffective. Their complaint was framed, as we have seen, upon a different theory, and it would be necessary to have it amended to justify the relief that we have suggested. We perceive no valid objection to such procedure, and, if that course be taken, the court can allow whatever is just and equitable in view of all the circumstances. McDonald v. Kingsbury, 16 Cal. App. 244, 116 Pac. 380.

We think the judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

2. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 131(1)—Original oral agreement for sale taken out of statute by part payment not changed by subsequent incomplete written agreement, when there was no oral agreement for modification.

Where plaintiff and defendant entered into an oral agreement for the sale of barley which was taken out of the statute by a part payment, while such contract could be superseded by a writing expressing all the elements of a complete and perfect contract of sale, it could not be changed by an incomplete written contract of sale, where there was no oral agreement for modification.

3. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 95(1)—Contract for sale held taken out of statute by part payment.

A contract of sale in writing, as required by Civ. Code, $\S$ 1624, subd. 4, but void because the agent for the buyer did not have written authority to sign it, as required by section 2309, was taken out of the statute by part payment of the purchase price.

4. Frauds, statute of $\S$ 90(4)—Contract held taken out of statute by buyer's acceptance and receipt of part of the goods.

If a contract of sale in writing, as required by Civ. Code, $\S$ 1624, subd. 4, but void because the buyer's agent did not have written authority to sign it, as required by section 2309, was not taken out of the statute by part payment of the purchase price, because not paid on the day the contract was made, it was taken out of the statute by the buyer's subsequent acceptance and receipt of part of the goods.

5. Sales $\S$ 384(7)—Seller held entitled to recover warehouse charges paid after buyer refused to accept goods.

Where defendant buyer refused to accept the goods after they were delivered to a warehouse by plaintiff seller in accordance with the terms of the contract and the seller was required to pay warehouse charges in order to get possession of the goods so as to resell at the highest market price possible, the seller was entitled to recover the warehouse charges as an element of damage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by D. E. King and another against the Globe Grain & Milling Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. G. Van Pelt, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Scarborough, Forgy & Reinhaus, of Santa Ana, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This action was brought to recover damages for an alleged breach by defendant, a corporation, of a contract to purchase barley. Judgment passed for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

The contract upon which plaintiffs base their right of action, a copy of which is set forth in the complaint, is as follows:

"Santa Ana, Cal., May 15, 1920.

"The Globe Grain & Milling Co. agree to buy and King & Wassum agree to sell 7,000 to 8,000 sacks barley delivered to the El Toro warehouse at El Toro, Calif., as soon as possible after threshed to be paid as soon as delivered and $1,000.00 one thousand dollars to be paid immediately and applying on final payment. The price to be $3.00 per cwt. f. o. b. warehouse. Globe Grain & Milling Co., By C. W. Hutchings." (Italics ours.)

It will be noticed that under the terms of this contract plaintiffs, as sellers, are to deliver the barley "as soon as possible after threshed." Defendant set up in its answer a different writing, which it claims evidences the agreement as finally made. That writing, though dated May 1, 1920, was signed about May 25, 1920, under circumstances presently to be narrated. So far as it is material to our present inquiry, this second instrument is as follows:

"Santa Ana, California, May 1, 1920.

"King and Wassum has this day sold and the Globe Grain & Milling Co. of California has this day bought — sacks of good marketable barley now being grown or located near El Toro, to be sacked in Standard new jute bags at the purchase price of $3.00 per 100 lbs., said barley to be delivered at El Toro Whse within 100 days from the date hereof. * * * Said King and Wassum acknowledges receipt of $1,000.00 one thousand on account of purchase price of said barley. Said Globe Grain & Milling Co. agrees to pay the balance of said purchase price of said grain upon its delivery. * * * Globe Grain & Milling Co., By C. W. Hutchings, Purchaser. King & Wassum, Seller, per H. A. Wassum." (Italics ours.)

It will be noticed that according to the terms of the last-mentioned writing, the barley was to be delivered "within 100 days from the date hereof," i. e., prior to August 10, 1920. Contemporaneously with the signing of that writing by Wassum and before any barley had been delivered, defendant paid to plaintiffs the $1,000 which, under the terms of the first agreement, was to be paid immediately by defendant on account of the purchase price. Within 100 days from the date of the second writing plaintiffs delivered to defendant, at the El Toro warehouse, 298,099 pounds of barley, for which defendant paid the sum of $8,942.97. About October 12, 1920, which was as soon as possible after threshing and therefore within the time contemplated by the first instrument but more than 100 days after the date of the second instrument, plaintiffs offered defendant more barley. Defendant, claiming that all of the barley should have been delivered within the time mentioned in the second instrument, refused acceptance. Hence this suit.

C. W. Hutchings, who signed defendant's name to both writings, was an agent of defendant at Santa Ana. He seems to have had authority to purchase the grain for his principal, but his authority was not in writing.

The circumstances attending the signing of the two instruments were as follows: In May, 1920, plaintiffs were engaged in farming and raising barley near El Toro, in Orange county. About May 15th they orally agreed with Hutchings to sell to defendant all the barley then being raised by them, which was estimated to be between 7,000 and 8,000 sacks. During the oral negotiations preceding the execution of the first instrument, three points were discussed, namely: The amount to be delivered, the place of delivery and the time of delivery. After some argument it finally was agreed that plaintiffs should deliver between 7,000 and 8,000 sacks, that being the estimated yield of their growing crops; that the barley should be delivered at the El Toro warehouse; and that it should be delivered as soon as possible after threshing. These promises, thus orally agreed to, were incorporated into the first writing, which correctly reflects the oral agreement. The parties never thereafter discussed any change in the terms of their agreement. If the original agreement was ever changed or modified in any respect whatever, it was solely because the plaintiff Wassum, under the circumstances about to be narrated, signed the second writing in ignorance of its contents.

Stating the facts most favorably to plaintiffs, as we must do since the findings are in their favor, the circumstances attending the signing of the second instrument were substantially as follows: About a week or 10 days after the execution of the first instrument, or a day or two prior to May 25, 1920, Wassum, who was a farmer, met Hutchings on the street in Santa Ana and was told by the latter that a check for $1,000 was waiting for plaintiffs at the office of defendant in Santa Ana. Wassum, on May 25th, went to defendant's office and asked for the check. The person who delivered it to him, an employee of defendant, asked Wassum to sign a paper, whereupon the latter signed a document which he supposed was a receipt for the $1,000. He did not read the paper. It proved to be the second writing, the substance of which is set forth supra. Though a copy of this instrument was mailed to Wassum, he paid no attention to it, and, without reading it or knowing aught of its contents, put it away among other papers in his desk, where it remained until some time after defendant had refused to accept the barley which was offered in the month of October. Not until then did Wassum know that the paper which he had signed in defendant's office on May 25th was not a receipt for the $1,000.

Appellant's first point is that the agreement evidenced by the first writing is within the statute of frauds, that it was never taken out of the statute, and that the rights of the parties must be measured by the terms of the second instrument and not by the first. Appellant's argument runs substantially as follows: The agreement for the sale of the barley, an agreement to sell at a price exceeding $200, was within the statute of frauds, and therefore was required to be in writing (subdivision 4, § 1624, Civ. Code); an authority to enter into a contract required by law to be in writing can only be given by an instrument in writing (section 2309, Civ. Code); Hutchings had no written authority to sign either of the written agreements; therefore the first writing was insufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds; the sale was, however, taken out of the statute by the payment of the $1,000 to plaintiffs, but not before; since the second writing was signed contemporaneously with the payment of the $1,000 to Wassum, that payment must be referred to the contract evidenced by the second writing and not to the contract evidenced by the first writing; and it is therefore the second agreement, and not the first, which was taken out of the statute of frauds by the payment of a part of the purchase price, and therefore the only agreement which can be enforced against defendant is that which required plaintiffs to make delivery of all the barley prior to August 10, 1920.

The trial court found that Wassum signed the second writing through mistake; that he thought it was merely a receipt for $1,000; that there was no meeting of minds between the parties when Wassum signed the second instrument; that the first agreement was the only one that has been acted upon by the parties; and that it was not superseded by the second so-called agreement.

To maintain its contention that the payment of the $1,000 which took the agreement out of the statute of frauds was made under the contract evidenced by the second writing and not under that evidenced by the first writing, appellant must establish the validity of the second writing as a complete and perfect contract, notwithstanding the instrument was signed by Wassum in the belief that it was merely a receipt for the $1,000 paid to plaintiffs on account of the purchase price. Citing Hawkins v. Hawkins, 50 Cal. 558, appellant contends that it was the legal duty of Wassum to read the alleged receipt that was handed to him; that he was chargeable with knowledge of the contents of the writing whether he read it or not; and that, being so charged with knowledge of its contents, he assented thereto by his failure to repudiate the instrument on the ground that it did not correctly embody the previous oral agreement.

There is evidence to warrant the inference that defendant misrepresented the nature of the instrument which its employee asked Wassum to sign, and the case therefore seems to be within the doctrine enunciated in Meyer v. Haas, 126 Cal. 560, 58 Pac. 1042. In our opinion it would be an extreme case that would warrant a court in holding that a party induced, through misrepresentation as to the purport of a document, to refrain from making examination of its contents, shall, nevertheless, be deemed to have given his assent to the document before its contents are in fact known to him. All that is required is that the party who is misled into signing an instrument in ignorance of its purport shall have exercised reasonable diligence. Each case must be considered with reference to its own peculiar facts and circumstances. In this case the trial court's findings are tantamount to a finding that reasonable diligence was exercised by Wassum, and we do not think the finding should be disturbed.

[1] But however this may be, there is another reason why it must be held that the original agreement was not superseded by the second writing—the writing which was mistakenly signed by Wassum on the 25th of May under the supposition that he was signing a receipt for the $1,000. The second writing did not embody a complete contract, and for that reason alone it could not supersede the original agreement nor alter any of its terms. The second writing does not describe the subject-matter of any sale. By its terms plaintiffs do not agree to sell and defendant does not agree to buy any quantity of barley whatever. The language of the second instrument is:

"King and Wassum has this day sold and the Globe Grain & Milling Co. of California has this day bought ——— sacks of good marketable barley now being grown or located near El Toro."

There is nothing in this language which tends to show how many sacks were to be sold by plaintiffs. It might have been but two sacks, and, with just as much probability, it might have been a million sacks. The language is fatally uncertain. It describes no quantity whatever. Nor is there anything within the four corners of the instrument which tends in the slightest degree to indicate that the words "now being grown or located near El Toro" were intended to refer to the 7,000 or 8,000 sacks of barley then being grown by plaintiffs near El Toro. For aught that appears from the face of the instrument, "the ——— sacks of barley now being grown or located near El Toro" might be barley grown or owned by a third party. Without the aid of extrinsic evidence the instrument entirely fails to describe the subject-matter of a contract of sale. But, under the particular facts of this case, extrinsic evidence is not admissible in aid of the instrument, or, at any rate, it is not admissible in aid of the purpose which appellant seeks to accomplish by means of the second instrument.

[2] Under the facts of this case the original oral agreement could be superseded by the instrument which Wassum signed on May 25th only in the event that that writing, in and of itself and by virtue of its own terms, embodied all of the requisites of a complete and perfect contract of sale. The parties orally agreed, in the first instance, to the sale of 7,000 to 8,000 sacks of barley. They orally agreed to all of the terms of a complete contract of sale. That oral agreement was then reduced to writing, but the agent who signed for defendant did not have any written authority to execute the instrument. The agreement, as to defendant, was thus left as though no writing had ever been signed. Plaintiff never orally agreed to any change in the terms of their oral agreement. Thereafter Wassum signed the second instrument. Since the parties never orally agreed to any change in their original contract, that contract could not be changed by a subsequently executed writing, unless such writing, in and of itself evidenced a complete contract of sale. But, as we have shown, the second writing is not a complete contract. It describes no subject-matter of sale. It follows, therefore, that even if Wassum be chargeable with knowledge of the contents of the second instrument at the time when he signed it, that instrument would not supersede the only contract ever made by the parties, namely, the oral agreement which was negotiated by them immediately prior to the drafting of the first instrument.

It is not material that Hutchings, who drafted the second instrument may have intended to insert therein a description of the same barley that was described in the first instrument. His intention, whatever it may have been, was not communicated to plaintiffs, and therefore the only act which by any possibility can be invoked to sustain appellant's contention that the contract as originally made was altered is the bare fact that Wassum signed the second instrument—an instrument which, for reasons already stated, could not of itself alter the terms of the agreement as originally negotiated.

[3,4] From the foregoing it follows that when the $1,000 was paid by defendant the only agreement that ever had any existence was the original oral agreement, and that therefore it was that agreement which was taken out of the statute of frauds by the part payment of the purchase price. Or if, because the $1,000 was not paid at the very time when the oral agreement was entered into, that payment, alone, was insufficient to take the sale out of the statute of frauds, nevertheless defendant's subsequent acceptance and receipt of barley did take the original oral agreement out of the statute, since the only agreement as to which the minds of the parties ever met was the original oral agreement, and that, therefore, is the only agreement under which the barley delivered prior to August 10th could have been accepted and received by defendant.

From the foregoing it follows that respondents were entitled to recover damages for appellant's breach of the agreement sued upon, namely, appellant's agreement to buy the barley "as soon as possible after threshed."

[5] One other point is made: Respondents, pursuant to their contract, delivered at the El Toro warehouse the barley which appellant refused to accept. In order to regain possession, after defendant's refusal to accept the barley, so as to enable them to resell at the highest market price obtainable at the nearest market, respondents paid the warehouse charges, amounting to $76.50. The court allowed that item of expense as a part of respondents' damages. Appellant now contends that this was not a proper item of damages. No question is raised as to the reasonableness of the amount of these warehouse charges. The question is purely and simply this: Can such charges, if paid by the vendor, become a proper item of damage in any event in a suit of this character? Nor is any question raised as to the passing of title to the barley which respondents delivered to the warehouse for appellant. Both parties have argued the case upon the theory that the title to the barley on which respondents paid the warehouse charges did not pass to appellant as the vendee, and we therefore shall dispose of the case on the assumption that the title remained in the vendors.

Ordinarily where, as in the instant case, the seller has made a resale, the detriment caused by the breach of the buyer's agreement to accept and pay for the property, the title to which is not vested in him, is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer under the contract over the net proceeds of such resale. Section 3311, Civ. Code. That rule can readily be applied with justness and fairness in those cases where there has been no delivery to the buyer. Where, however, as in a case like this, the sellers have agreed to make delivery at a warehouse, the charges whereof are payable by the buyer if he accepts the goods, and where, as here, the buyer has failed to give any notice of his intention not to accept until after the sellers have made delivery to the warehouse pursuant to the requirements of their contract, we conclude that payment of the warehouse charges by the sellers, in order that they might thus regain possession so as to be in a position to make a resale, is not only an element of damage naturally and proximately resulting from the buyer's breach of his contract to accept and pay for the goods, but is such as must have been within the reasonable contemplation of the parties when making the contract. The buyer ought to have known that it would be necessary for the sellers to pay the warehouse charges if the former, without right, should refuse to accept the barley after the sellers had so far completed their contract as to make delivery to the warehouse in accordance with the terms of their obligation. The object of the remedy given to a seller is to make him whole on account of any loss suffered by the default of the buyer—to compensate him for all detriment proximately caused by the buyer's breach of his contract, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would likely to result therefrom.

Moreover, the fact that warehouse charges, eo nomine, were specifically included in the findings as an item of damage, could not increase the total amount recoverable from defendant on a resale by plaintiffs. Defendant is liable for the difference between the amount due under its contract and the net proceeds realized by plaintiffs on the resale. If plaintiffs had not paid the warehouse charges before making the resale, then it would have been necessary for them to resell the barley subject to the warehouse charges. In that event the amount realized on the resale would be less, by at least the amount due for warehouse charges, than would be the case if those charges were paid before the resale, thus increasing, by at least the amount of the unpaid warehouse charges, the difference between the price which defendant agreed to pay for the barley and the net proceeds of the resale.

The judgment is affirmed.

87 Cal. App. 771

PEOPLE v. MARTINEZ. (Cr. 866.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 23, 1922.)

1. Criminal law §372(1)—Other offenses may be proved to show inclination.

In prosecutions for illicit intercourse involving consent, evidence of similar offenses committed between the parties, both prior and subsequent to that with which defendant is charged, may be introduced after the prosecution has elected to rely on some particular act for conviction, for the purpose of showing the inclination of the parties toward each other.

2. Criminal law §678(5)—Court must instruct jury as to particular act notwithstanding failure to request election.

In a prosecution for rape of a girl under 14, where the testimony showed several acts, on any one of which the conviction could be based, it was error for the court to fail to instruct the jury that the prosecution must establish a particular act beyond a reasonable doubt before a verdict of guilty could be rendered, notwithstanding defendant's neglect to demand that the district attorney make an election.

3. Criminal law §1173(2)—Failure to instruct as to particular act relied on held not prejudicial.

Where the prosecutrix testified to several acts of intercourse with defendant, all within a few days of each other, and defendant did not deny any of the acts, the failure to instruct that the jury must find the commission of one particular act before they could convict was not prejudicial to defendant, since all were established by the same evidence, so that it was not possible that some of the jurors might have believed defendant guilty of one and others might have based their vote for conviction on belief of guilt of another act.

4. Criminal law §678(5)—In absence of express election offense first testified to is regarded as that relied on.

In the absence of an express election by the district attorney as to the act on which he would rely for conviction, the law selects the first act testified to by prosecutrix.

5. Indictment and information §176—Variance of two days in proof of date is immaterial.

Variance between an allegation in an indictment that the offense was committed on or about May 11 and proof that it was committed on May 9 was not material.

6. Criminal law §1170½(5)—Restriction of cross-examination as to details of act held not prejudicial.

Where there was no contradiction of the testimony of prosecuting witness concerning the intercourse, the refusal of the trial court on his own motion to permit cross-examination of prosecutrix as to the details of the act was not prejudicial to accused.

7. Criminal law §308—Prosecution must prove every element of offense beyond a reasonable doubt.

Accused is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved, and the burden is on the prosecution to prove every element of the crime by evidence sufficient to satisfy the minds of the jurors beyond a reasonable doubt so that a defendant without introducing any evidence to prove his own innocence will be entitled to an acquittal if the people fail to prove his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

8. Criminal law §781(6)—Instruction extrajudicial admissions should be received with great caution goes beyond statute.

A requested instruction that extrajudicial admissions of the defendant are to be received and considered with great caution goes beyond the language of Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 4, providing that on proper occasions evidence of oral admissions of a party ought to be viewed with caution.

9. Criminal law §781(6)—Refusal of instruction as to weight of extrajudicial admissions is not error.

The refusal to give an instruction in a criminal prosecution in the language of Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 4, that evidence of the oral admissions of a party ought to be viewed with caution is not error.

10. Criminal law §1178—Exceptions to refusal of instructions merely referred to will not be considered.

Exceptions to the refusal to give instructions requested by accused, presented merely by statement, that the court erred in refusing to give an instruction requested by accused as set forth on a page and line of the transcript, without setting out the language of the instructions in the brief or making any argument in support of the exceptions, will not be considered.

11. Criminal law $\S$ 1170 $\frac{1}{2}$ (5)—Exclusion of cross-examination of prosecutrix as to desire to marry defendant held not error.

The exclusion of a cross-examination of prosecutrix as to whether it was her intention to marry accused after his arrest and at the time of the preliminary examination was not prejudicial to accused, where prosecutrix had already testified on cross-examination that the reason she falsely stated her age at the preliminary examination was because she desired to get married.

12. Witnesses $\S$ 269(2)—Cross-examination regarding age of prosecutrix is not proper where she had not been directly questioned concerning it.

Where the district attorney asked prosecutrix no question as to her age, a cross-examination by accused with reference to her age and to her previous inconsistent statements regarding it was improper.

13. Criminal law $\S$ 977(3)—Imposition of sentence within maximum time, but beyond time permitted without consent, is proper in absence of objection.

Where the sentence was imposed within the maximum time prescribed by Pen. Code, $\S$ 1191, but beyond the time to which the court of its own motion and without the defendant's consent may continue the time for passing sentence, the judgment may, nevertheless, be rightfully pronounced unless defendant makes objection at the time and moves for a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Miguel Martinez was convicted of rape, and he appeals from the judgment. Affirmed.

Theodore Gottsdanker, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant was convicted of rape upon the person of a girl 14 years of age. He appeals from the judgment.

The information charges that the offense was committed "on or about the 11th day of May, 1921." The prosecutrix, whose testimony as to acts of sexual intercourse was not contradicted, related from the witness stand the story of her relations with defendant, which, put in narrative form, was substantially as follows:

"I lived with my parents on a ranch at Van Nuys, in the county of Los Angeles. In May, 1921, myself and defendant spent three days and nights together. We first went to a hotel at Zelzah, in Los Angeles county, where we spent two days and nights. We both occupied the only bed in the room. We had sexual intercourse once each night. The third day we came to the city of Los Angeles and went to a hotel in that city. We occupied the same bed and had sexual intercourse once that night. The next day we went to the courthouse in Los Angeles to get a marriage license. I told the clerk that I was 18 years old."

Though there is no very satisfactory evidence as to the date of the visit to the marriage license bureau, it seems to be conceded that it was May 12, 1921, which would make the last act of sexual intercourse testified to by the prosecutrix fall on May 11, 1921, the date specified in the information.

Defendant's counsel objected to the introduction of any evidence as to the act of sexual intercourse which took place in the city of Los Angeles on the ground that defendant was not charged with that specific act. The objection was overruled. It does not appear that defendant made any demand that the district attorney elect upon which act of illicit intercourse he would rely for a conviction.

The prosecutrix gave no testimony as to her age on her direct examination; the district attorney confining his questions to matters relating solely to the girl's illicit acts of intercourse with the defendant. The prosecution relied upon the parents to furnish the necessary evidence on the subject of their daughter's age. Though not examined as to her age on her direct examination, the prosecutrix, on her cross-examination, in response to questions put to her by defendant's counsel respecting her age, testified that she was 14 years old; that her parents told her to testify that she was 14 years old; that when she was taken to the juvenile home immediately after defendant's arrest she told the authorities there that she was 18 years of age; and that she testified before the committing magistrate that she was of the age of 18 years, or would be in the following February. Upon being asked on cross-examination to explain why she so testified before the committing magistrate, she replied:

"Because I did want to marry before 18, and I didn't have the age to get married. I told them because I wanted to get married, but I didn't have the age to get married."

Defendant's counsel then asked her this question:

"Did you also want to marry this defendant after his arrest and when you testified at the preliminary examination?"

To that question the district attorney objected on the ground that it was immaterial. The objection was sustained. That ruling is now assigned as error.

[1] It was not error for the court to permit evidence of the three separate acts of intercourse. In cases involving illicit intimacy by consent, such as adultery and statutory rape upon the person of a female under the age of 18 years, evidence of similar offenses committed between the parties, both prior and subsequent to that with which the defendant is charged, if not too remote, may be introduced after the prosecution has selected some particular act of a date certain and has elected to rely on proof of such act for conviction and has introduced evidence tending to support the selection. Such evidence of other acts is admitted for the purpose of showing that the parties are adulterously and lasciviously inclined, and that the barriers of modesty have been broken down with reference to each other. People v. Koller, 142 Cal. 621, 76 Pac. 500; People v. Harlan, 29 Cal. App. 600, 156 Pac. 980; People v. Scott, 24 Cal. App. 440, 141 Pac. 945.

[2] The district attorney did not make the election which the law requires of him. Neither did the court, when the case went to the jury, direct the jurors' minds to any particular act of intercourse with an instruction that it was incumbent upon the prosecution to establish that act by evidence beyond a reasonable doubt before a verdict of guilty could be returned against the defendant. The court's failure so to instruct the jury was error, notwithstanding defendant's neglect to demand that the district attorney make an election. People v. Castro, 133 Cal. 11, 65 Pac. 13.

[3] But it so happens that in this particular case the error was not prejudicial. The evidence presented by the prosecution respecting the illicit acts, consisting of the testimony of the girl herself and defendant's confession, was not contradicted. Defendant, who was the sole witness produced by the defense, made no attempt whatever to deny the acts of intercourse testified to by the prosecutrix. If the jury believed that defendant committed one of the acts testified to by the prosecutrix, they must equally have believed that he committed each of the other acts narrated by her, since there is nothing in the case that could possibly make her testimony as to one of these acts more or less probable than her testimony respecting the others. It is not possible, therefore, that some of the jurors were convinced beyond a reasonable doubt of the truth of the charge as to one of the offenses while other jurors voted for a conviction because they believed that it was one of the other acts which was proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

[4] Moreover, in the absence of an express selection by the district attorney of one of the acts of intercourse as the particular offense for which he would ask a conviction, the law selects the act first testified to by the prosecutrix.

"* * * The prosecuting officer, when he commences the trial of a case of this class, where he is at liberty to prove one of several different offenses under the indictment, should at least as early as the commencement of the trial inform the defense upon proof of what specific offense he intends to rely, and, if he does not, the first evidence which would tend in any degree to prove an offense shall be deemed a selection, and unless that precise offense is proven, the defendant is entitled to an acquittal." People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 169, 65 Pac. 323.

See, also, People v. Harlan, supra.

[5] The first offense testified to by the prosecutrix was the first act of intercourse at Zelzah. That act occurred on or about May 9, 1921, which was two days prior to the date laid in the information. This variance with respect to the date of the act was not material. People v. Williams, supra. Since the testimony of the prosecutrix respecting the act first testified to by her is uncontradicted and has none of the marks of inherent improbability, it follows that appellant was not prejudiced by the prosecutor's failure to make an election or by the court's neglect to instruct the jury that it was incumbent upon the people to establish, by sufficient evidence and to the satisfaction of all the jurors, a particular act of intercourse.

[6] Appellant insists that the court unduly restricted him in his cross-examination of the prosecutrix. This assignment of error calls for no extended discussion. It seems that during his cross-examination of the little girl defendant's counsel asked her if she experienced any pain when defendant inserted his private parts into her private parts. The court, of its own motion, stopped this line of examination. We fail to see how appellant could have been injured by the refusal to permit him to go into the details of the lascivious conduct to which he and this little girl gave themselves. Had there been any conflict in the evidence respecting the acts of coition, there might have been some ground for complaining of the court's refusal to permit counsel to ask the prosecutrix if she felt any pain; for, if she had answered that she felt no pain, it may be that such an answer would have had a tendency to show that there had been no penetration by defendant. But upon the record before us we fail to see how appellant could have been harmed by the court's refusal to permit him to ask the question.

[7] True, a defendant in a criminal action is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved, and the burden is upon the prosecution to prove every element of the crime by evidence sufficient to satisfy the minds of the jurors beyond a reasonable doubt; so that a defendant, without introducing any evidence to prove his own innocence, will be entitled to an acquittal if the people fail to prove his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. And though the defendant in a criminal action, for the purpose of discrediting the testimony of a witness for the prosecution and thus raise a reasonable doubt of guilt, may put to such witness any proper question on cross-examination, still, in view of the record before us, we are unable to see how, if the prosecutrix had said that she suffered no pain during any of the acts of coition testified to by her, the credibility of her testimony would have been materially shaken. The error, if error there be, is so trivial that it must be disregarded in view of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

[8] Exception is taken to the court's refusal to give the following instruction:

"You are instructed that extrajudicial admissions of the defendant are to be received and considered with great caution, and that oral admissions of a party should be viewed with caution." (Italics ours.)

In the first place, this proposed instruction goes beyond the language of subdivision 4 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which simply provides that, upon all proper occasions, the jury is to be instructed that "evidence of the oral admissions of a party [ought to be viewed] with caution," not with "great caution," as is stated in the first part of the proposed instruction. See People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 391, 77 Pac. 169.

[9] But, wholly apart from this criticism, it has been definitely decided in this state that the refusal to give an instruction in the language of subdivision 4 of section 2061 is not error. People v. Raber, 168 Cal. 316, 143 Pac. 317; People v. Ruiz, 144 Cal. 251, 77 Pac. 907; People v. Maljan, 34 Cal. App. 384, 167 Pac. 547.

[10] Exception is taken to the court's refusal to give a number of other proposed instructions, to each of which our attention is called in the following manner:

"The court erred in refusing to give an instruction asked by the defendant beginning at line [the number of the line is here inserted] of page [the number of the page is here inserted] of clerk's transcript and ending on line [number inserted] of page [number inserted] of said transcript."

The language of the requested instructions is not set forth in the brief, no authority is cited, and no argument is made beyond the bald declaration that "the court erred in refusing to give the instruction." We do not feel called upon to consider points so presented. Moore v. San Vicente L. Co., 175 Cal. 213, 165 Pac. 687.

[11, 12] The court did not err in sustaining the objection to the question propounded by defendant's counsel to the prosecutrix on her cross-examination asking her if she intended to marry defendant after his arrest and when she testified at his preliminary examination. This question was put to the prosecutrix on her cross-examination in connection with her explanation of the reason why she had testified at the preliminary examination that she was 18 years old. That explanation was that she wanted to marry the defendant before she would become 18 years of age. Her answer explaining her testimony before the committing magistrate carried with it the necessary implication that she wished to marry the defendant after his arrest and also at the time of the preliminary examination. Defendant therefore could suffer no prejudice by the court's ruling in sustaining an objection to the question asking the prosecutrix if she desired to marry the defendant after his arrest and when she testified at the preliminary examination. Moreover, the question was not proper cross-examination. It was asked as a part of the cross-examination respecting the age of the prosecutrix—a subject-matter concerning which she had said nothing on her direct examination.

[13] Finally, it is contended that the judgment was not pronounced within the time provided by statute (section 1191 of the Penal Code). The verdict was rendered August 9, 1921. At the time originally set for pronouncing judgment, August 11, 1921, defendant applied for probation. The court therefore continued to August 25, 1921, the time for passing sentence. On the last-mentioned date the court continued to September 22, 1921, the hearing on defendant's application for probation and likewise the time for pronouncing sentence. The matter came on for hearing on September 22d, and the application for probation and the time for passing sentence were continued, at defendant's request, to November 10, 1921, on which date probation was denied and sentence was pronounced. Appellant contends that the record of the proceedings had on September 22d shows that his consent to a continuance to November 10th was given solely because he was induced to believe, from remarks made by the court, that he would be granted probation if the matter were continued at his request. The minute entries show that the time for pronouncing sentence was regularly continued at defendant's request, and that judgment was pronounced within the time limit prescribed by section 1191. Assuming, for the purpose of this decision, that the verity of the minute entries may be impeached by appellant in this manner, nevertheless the fact remains that there is no basis for the contention that appellant's consent to the continuance was given under the influence of a false hope of probation held out to him by the court. At the hearing had on September 22d the court expressly stated that it did not believe this was a case for probation; and yet, in spite of that statement, defendant asked for and the court granted a continuance to November 10th. Moreover, the record does not show that at the time of passing sentence on November 10th the defendant made any objection to the pronouncing of judgment on that date, or that he asked for a new trial on the ground that the legal time for pronouncing judgment had expired. Where, as here, the judgment is pronounced within the maximum time permitted by section 1191, but beyond the time to which the court, of its own motion and without the defendant's consent, may continue the time for passing sentence, judgment, nevertheless, may be rightfully pronounced unless the defendant make objection at the time and demand that a new trial be granted on the ground that the legal time limit has expired. People v. Polich, 25 Cal. App. 464, 143 Pac. 1065; People v. Okomoto, 26 Cal. App. 568, 147 Pac. 598.

The judgment is affirmed.

MARTIN v. BURRIS. (Civ. 2443.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 22, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 20, 1922.)

1. Action —46—Determination of rights of parties may be joined with action for cancellation of joint adventure contract.

A cause of action for the cancellation of a joint adventure contract under Civ. Code, § 3412, may properly be joined with a prayer for determination of the rights and obligations of the parties under the contract, and their interests in the properties acquired prior to its termination.

2. Joint adventures —1—Notice held one for cancellation, and not statutory rescission.

A notice, given by one party to a joint adventure contract to the other that the contract was terminated and the rights of the other thereunder forfeited was not a notice of statutory rescission, but rather a cancellation or termination of the contract.

3. Joint adventures —4(1)—Partnership —21—Breach of contract does not forfeit rights thereunder except as provided by the contract.

A breach of a joint adventure or partnership contract by one of the parties does not work a forfeiture of the rights of that party acquired under the contract prior to the breach, except to the extent provided by the contract.

4. Joint adventures —2—Forfeiture for nonpayment of installments on contract does not apply to nonpayment of advances.

Where a joint adventure contract provided that defendant should pay certain installments on the contracts for property thereafter to be acquired, and should repay to plaintiff a proportion of payments previously made by plaintiff, a provision for the forfeiture of defendant's interest in certain properties to be acquired under the contract on default by him in the payment of his proportion of the purchase price does not entitle plaintiff to a forfeiture of defendant's interest in the properties for defendant's failure to pay his proportion of payments made by plaintiff, since a condition involving forfeiture must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it was created under Civ. Code, § 1442.

5. Joint adventures —4(1)—Wrongful acquisition and transfer of conflicting claim does not cause forfeiture.

Where one of the parties to a joint adventure agreement acquired an interest in a mining claim which conflicted with one of the claims covered by the agreement, and thereafter transferred his interest in the claim so acquired to another, including in the transfer the portion of the joint adventure claim covered by the conflict, his act, however wrongful, did not work a forfeiture of his interest in the joint adventure claim.

6. Joint adventures —4(1)—Defaulting party holds rights acquired subject to claims of the other.

Though a party to a joint adventure agreement who defaults in performing his part of the agreement does not thereby forfeit his interests in the property previously acquired under the agreement, he holds such interests subject to the claims of the other party to the contract accruing by reason of the default.

7. Joint adventures —5(1)—In suit for cancellation, court should settle all matters in one accounting.

In a suit for cancellation of a joint adventure agreement, the court should settle all matters between the parties arising out of the agreement by one accounting in the same manner in which partnership affairs are settled on dissolution, and not merely cancel the agreement and leave the settlement of the rights of the parties thereunder to future litigation.

8. Joint adventures —4(1)—Notice of rights to property already acquired held not to estop cancellation.

Where defendant had defaulted in the performance of his joint adventure agreement with plaintiff, a notice given by plaintiff to the purchasers from defendant of a claim which conflicted with one of the joint adventure claims, whereby plaintiff claimed an interest in that claim, did not estop plaintiff from thereafter canceling the joint-adventure contract because of defendant's default, since his claim of interest in property acquired under the agreement was not inconsistent with his right to cancel.

9. Appeal and error —1172(1)—Judgment can be reversed only as to part affected by error.

Where the error affects only the determination of the rights of the parties after the cancellation of the joint adventure agreement, and the judgment canceling the agreement was supported by the evidence, that part of the judgment canceling the agreement can be affirmed, and the judgment reversed in other respects, with directions to adjudicate the rights of the parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mono County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by J. D. Martin against George B. Burris for rescission of contract and for damages. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

Welles Whitmore, of Oakland, for appellant.

John D. Murphey, of Berkeley, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The complaint alleges the execution of a contract on November 17, 1916, by the terms of which the parties associated "themselves together for the purpose of acquiring, disposing of and working mining properties in the Masonic Mining District in the county of Mono"; that certain mining properties were acquired pursuant to the agreement; that the plaintiff performed all the terms of the agreement on his part; that the defendant failed to perform any of the terms thereof, and endeavored to prevent performance by plaintiff, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $10,000; that on the 29th day of June, 1918, plaintiff rescinded the contract and declared the same to be ended and terminated, and duly notified defendant of such rescission and termination. Plaintiff prayed for judgment for damages in the sum of $10,000; for the rescission, cancellation, and annulment of the contract; for the forfeiture of defendant's rights thereunder, and of all his rights in and to the properties acquired by plaintiff under the agreement and adjudging plaintiff to be the owner thereof, and for general relief.

[1] The defendant demurred to the complaint on various grounds, and the court overruled his demurrer. The principal grounds urged on appeal against the complaint are that it does not state a cause of action for rescission, and that several causes of action are improperly joined in one count. It may be doubted whether the complaint attempts to state a cause of action for the rescission of the contract in the statutory sense of that term. It clearly states a cause of action, however, for the cancellation of the contract. Civ. Code, § 3412; Bradley v. Gas Control Co., 102 Cal. 627, 36 Pac. 1011. The relief prayed for does not have the effect of making the complaint state independent causes of action. On canceling the contract it is proper for the court to determine the rights and obligations of the parties thereunder and their interests in the properties acquired prior to its termination.

In his answer the defendant denies the alleged failure of performance and wrongful conduct on his part, and alleges failure of performance by plaintiff, and prays for damages and general relief.

The decree, among other things, adjudges that the contract was, on the 29th day of June, 1918, "fully rescinded, canceled and terminated, and was thereafter of no further force and effect." There was no evidence as to the amount of damages, if any, suffered by either party, and the court declined to make any finding on the question. The court did not adjudge the rights and obligations of the parties relative to the properties acquired under the contract by either party prior to plaintiff's termination thereof on June 29, 1918.

[2] In his brief appellant says:

"The judgment in this case rescinds the contract, at an arbitrary date, but does not determine the rights of the parties. It opens the way for much future litigation, by setting a post around which litigation may revolve."

The notice of June 29, 1918, referred to in the complaint and in the transcript of the evidence as a notice of rescission, is not such in fact. The notice does not contain the word "rescind" or any equivalent term, but provides:

"You are hereby notified that * * * the undersigned hereby declares said contract terminated and all of your rights thereunder forfeited."

By the decree it is adjudged that the contract was by the plaintiff "rescinded, canceled and terminated, and was thereafter of no further force and effect." Construing the word "rescinded" as used in the complaint and in the decree, with reference to the context, it seems clear that the word was not used to indicate a statutory rescission, but rather a cancellation or termination of the contract. Pfeiffer v. Norman, 22 N. D. 168, 133 N. W. 97, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 891.

[3] On sufficient evidence, the court found that the defendant had broken his agreement in such material respects as to justify the termination thereof by the plaintiff on June 29, 1918. The defendant had failed to repay plaintiff the sums advanced by the latter in the former's behalf, as provided for by the contract. He had failed to pay his proportion of the installments which had become due on certain options. He had refused to convey to plaintiff many mining claims located by defendant. He had entered into an agreement to purchase a one-half interest in the Chemung claim, and refused to convey the same to plaintiff, but had conveyed his interest therein to another. He had, however, rendered valuable services in securing other options and in managing the operation of some of the properties acquired. Whether the joint enterprise constituted a partnership or a joint adventure, the defendant's breach of the agreement justified the plaintiff's termination thereof, but did not work a forfeiture, except as provided by the contract, of his interest in the assets acquired prior to the notice of termination. Kimball v. Gearhart, 12 Cal. 28, 48; Lanpher v. Warshawer, 28

Cal. App. 457, 152 Pac. 933; McDonough v. Saunders, 201 Ala. 321, 78 South. 160, 11 A. L. R. 419; Parish v. Bainum, 202 Ill. App. 563; Iman v. Inkster, 90 Neb. 704, 134 N. W. 265; Botsford v. Van Riper, 33 Nev. 191, 110 Pac. 705; First National Bank v. Rush (Tex. Com. App.) 210 S. W. 521; Kaufman v. Catzen, 81 W. Va. 1, 94 S. E. 388, L. R. A. 1918B, 672.

[4] The contract provides for the forfeiture of defendant's interest in certain properties on default by him in the payment of his proportion of the purchase price thereof. It is recited therein that options had been taken in the defendant's name for the purchase of a one-half interest in the Red Rock claim, a two-thirds interest in the Lake View, and the entire interest in the Perini claims. There is evidence to the effect that the option on the Perini claims was allowed to lapse by mutual consent, and it need be given no further consideration. The plaintiff advanced the initial payment on the other options, and defendant in the contract agreed to repay plaintiff one-fourth of the sum so advanced within 90 days after the execution of the agreement. The contract further provided that plaintiff should pay three-fourths and the defendant one-fourth of the deferred installments as they became due, their interests in the property to be in the same proportion. Relative to the foregoing options, but not as to other options to be acquired, the contract provided:

"That in the event of either of the parties hereto failing to make any payment upon any option or agreement to purchase at the time and place specified therefor in said agreements or any agreement hereafter to be made in reference thereto, in that event the other party is hereby authorized to make such payment and shall succeed to all the right, title and interest of every kind and character of the delinquent party of, in and to the properties named in any of said options which shall have become delinquent by reason of the nonpayment of any installments thereon."

Manifestly, this provision was not intended to apply to failure of repayment to plaintiff of the sums advanced by him toward the purchase of the claims mentioned prior to the execution of the contract. It is, by its terms, limited to "any payment upon any option or agreement to purchase at the time and place specified therefor in said agreements," and, of course, defendant's obligation to repay plaintiff for such advances is not specified in such options or agreements to purchase. "A condition involving a forfeiture must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it is created." Civ. Code, § 1442. "A forfeiture can never take place by implication, but must be effected by express, unambiguous language." Cullen v. Sprigg, 83 Cal. 56, 64, 23 Pac. 222.

The defendant failed to pay any part of the deferred installments which became due on the Red Rock option, and the plaintiff paid $1,000 on the first deferred installment and made a new arrangement with the owners for subsequent payments. The evidence seems to justify the conclusion that by such failure the defendant forfeited his interest in the Red Rock claim.

The evidence does not show that either party made payment of any deferred installment of the purchase price of the Lake View claim. Under such circumstances, the defendant did not forfeit his interest therein.

As to other properties to be acquired, the contract provided:

"That any and all property situate in said Masonic mining district, secured by either the party of the first part or the party of the second part hereto or in the name of any other person whatever through the instrumentality of the parties hereto and for the benefit of either of them, except as hereinbefore provided, shall be the property of the parties hereto and the ownership of the same shall be in the following proportions, to wit: Three-fourths interest in and to all such property shall belong to said party of the first part herein, J. D. Martin, and one-fourth interest in and to all such property shall belong to the party of the second part herein, George B. Burris."

The contract further provided that all options and purchases secured by the defendant should be taken in his name, but that he should transfer them to plaintiff, who should "have the sole and entire management of said properties." The contract provided that the plaintiff would advance the money necessary to pay for such options and "purchases negotiated" by defendant as might meet with the plaintiff's approval, the defendant to repay plaintiff one-fourth thereof, but such repayments to be made "only out of the profits arising or accruing from the properties secured to said parties by reason of this agreement."

In September, 1917, the plaintiff purchased the Atlanta and January claims for the sum of $600, and took a deed therefor in his own name.

Operating under the contract, and apparently by the efforts of both parties, in December, 1916, an option was secured in the name of plaintiff from Mox Smith for the purchase of the Snowshoe and other mining claims. Plaintiff paid Smith $250 on the execution of the option. The option contract recited that plaintiff was then the owner of the New York mining location in Masonic district, and provided that as soon as "possible and practicable" the plaintiff was to "commence the operation of said mine for the purpose of developing, surveying, excavating, mining and milling the ore bodies contained therein and will prosecute said work diligently and expeditiously," and that if, "prior to August 1, 1917, ore shall be discovered and exposed or blocked out in said New York mine or mining location, the assayed value of which in the aggregate tonnage shall exceed, after deducting the reasonable cost of mining and milling ores in said Masonic district, the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, * * * then and in that event" plaintiff was to pay Smith $1,500 on August 1, 1917; and that like payments under similar conditions were to be made every six months up to August 1, 1919, at which time the remainder of the purchase price was to be paid. Plaintiff testified:

"This Mox Smith agreement-contract was made after the contract between me and Mr. Burris and was under the agreement. * * * Part of the consideration for Mox Smith giving the option was that I was to go to work on the New York."

Plaintiff expended about $12,000 pursuant to the terms of the option contract. The defendant was an experienced miner, while plaintiff was not. The plaintiff testified that he followed the defendant's advice in working the New York claim, and that the defendant worked there "30 or 40 or 50 or 60 days"; that "he went up there some time in December, 1916," and "ceased his superintendency, or ceased work on the New York * * * about March, 1917." There is no evidence that defendant failed to perform any of the terms of the contract applicable to the Mox Smith option. No returns were received from the operation of the New York or from any properties acquired under the contract between the parties hereto.

Mox Smith died, and on the 9th day of December, 1918, the plaintiff entered into an agreement with the administrator of the Smith estate by the terms of which the original option was annulled and canceled, the purchase price reduced, a half-interest in the property recognized to be in a third person, and an option given plaintiff to purchase the other half interest. Relative to this second agreement the court found:

"That the plaintiff had entered into a new and modified contract with the administrator of the estate of Mox Smith, deceased, and that in this respect the plaintiff was working wholly within the terms of the contract of November 17, 1916."

Notwithstanding plaintiff's testimony as to defendant's services in connection with the Mox Smith option, the court found that defendant had failed to perform any of the terms and conditions of the Smith option or of the contract of November 17, 1916, and had forfeited all "right or interest" in the option and the property described therein. The decree adjudges:

"That neither of the parties to this action has any right, title, or interest in and to any property acquired by the other by reason of said contract or agreement since said 29th day of June, 1918."

Construing this provision of the decree in the light of the finding that the plaintiff "entered into a new and modified contract with the administrator of the estate of Mox Smith, deceased," as to the purchase of the property described in the original option and the further finding, or conclusion, that defendant had forfeited all his rights in and to such property, it may be said that defendant's rights in such property are adjudged to be forfeited. It does not appear upon what theory this provision in the decree can be sustained.

[5] It seems that the Chemung location overlaps that of the Snowshoe, and that, after defendant had acquired a half-interest in the former, he caused it to be conveyed to a third person, and included in the conveyance the overlapping strip between the disputed boundary lines. This act, however wrongful, did not, under the authorities cited, work a forfeiture of his interest in the Snowshoe and other claims embraced in the Smith group.

[6] In any case in which a contract of joint adventure is canceled after property has been acquired thereunder, it is eminently proper to adjudicate the rights of the parties in the property so acquired. In this case the pleadings raised the issue of property rights under the contract, and the judgment should determine them, instead of leaving the question open for future litigation. The defendant is not entitled, of course, to a one-fourth interest in the properties acquired, freed from the obligations assumed by him in his contract with the plaintiff, but his interest in the assets of the venture is burdened by such obligations. In the settlement he must be charged with the sums due the plaintiff for advances made and for the value of plaintiff's interest in any properties wrongfully transferred by defendant to persons other than plaintiff.

[7] As said in Berg v. Mead, 115 App. Div. 288, 100 N. Y. Supp. 792:

The court should take "a general accounting of all transactions between the parties to the agreement, so that in one proceeding there could be a final accounting and winding up of the affairs of the joint adventure." "A joint adventure * * * is similar to a partnership, and, being of a similar nature, the right to an accounting of profits in accordance with the agreement therefor and the obligations growing out of such agreement between the parties are governed by the same rules of law. * * * Whether the parties were technically partners or not, an accounting was necessary to determine their respective rights." Butler v. Union Trust Co., 178 Cal. 195, 198, 172 Pac. 601, 602.

See, also, Keyes v. Nims, 43 Cal. App. 1, 184 Pac. 695; Jackson v. Hooper, 76 N. J. Eq. 185, 74 Atl. 130; Hedges v. Mountjoy, 164 App. Div. 444, 149 N. Y. Supp. 869; Saunders v. McDonough, 191 Ala. 119, 67 South. 591. As in the case of the dissolution of a partnership, if the assets cannot be equitably divided, or if for any other reason it becomes necessary to a proper adjustment of the rights of the parties, the property acquired, prior to the termination of the contract by the plaintiff's notice thereof, should be sold, and the net proceeds distributed in accordance with the interests of the parties.

Since special provision is made in the contract for the forfeiture of the interests of either party in the Red Rock, Lake View, and Perini claims in the event of specified defaults, if it be found that any such default has occurred in relation to any one of such claims, the decree should so adjudge.

[8, 9] October 31, 1917, after the defendant had acquired and transferred to other persons an interest in the Chemung and other claims, a notice was executed by plaintiff and served on defendant and recorded in the office of the county recorder of Mono county, by which notice plaintiff claimed an interest under the contract of November 17, 1916, in the property so acquired and transferred by defendant. It is argued by appellant that, since all of his breaches of the contract had been made prior to October 31, 1917, the plaintiff is estopped by the notice from thereafter terminating the contract. It is not perceived that any element of an estoppel is shown by such notice. If the plaintiff was entitled to an interest in such claims at the time they were acquired by defendant, then, as between the parties, his interest therein still exists, notwithstanding the cancellation of the contract, and the position assumed by the plaintiff in his notice of claim to the property is in no wise inconsistent with that taken at the trial or in the notice of cancellation. The cancellation of the contract did not in any manner affect the rights of either party in the assets theretofore acquired. As to the other grounds urged for a reversal, it is sufficient to say that they are without substantial merit.

"No good reason appears why the new trial that must be had should not be limited to the matters in regard to which error has been shown. * * * It is a plain duty of appellate courts to facilitate to the extent of their capacity as speedy a disposition of litigation as is consistent with the doing of complete justice between the parties." Collins v. Ramish, 182 Cal. 360, 368, 188 Pac. 550, 553; Rudneck v. Southern California Metal & Rubber Co., 184 Cal. 274, 193 Pac. 775.

The judgment canceling and terminating the contract between the parties as of the date of June 29, 1918, is not only supported by the evidence, but it does not appear on what evidence the court could have decided otherwise.

That part of the judgment adjudging and decreeing that the agreement of November 17, 1916, was on the 29th day of June, 1918, canceled and terminated is affirmed. In other respects the judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to try the other issues raised by the pleadings and adjudicate the rights of the parties in and to any and all property in which the parties acquired an interest under the agreement of November 17, 1916, prior to June 29, 1918.

(57 Cal. App. 659)

DOVER et al. v. ARCHAMBAULT.
(Civ. 3886.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 12, 1922.)

1. Highways ⇨ 175(1)—Automobilist driving on left side of highway negligent.

Under Vehicle Act, § 20a, providing that on all occasions the driver of any vehicle upon the public highway shall travel on the right side thereof, unless the road ahead on the left-hand side is clear and unobstructed for at least 100 yards, an automobilist, driving on the left side of the highway, resulting in a collision with another automobile, was guilty of negligence in so doing.

2. Pleading ⇨ 364(6)—Granting motion to strike from answer charge of negligence of plaintiff's driver proper when answer denied negligence.

In an action for personal injuries resulting from a collision between automobiles on a highway, the motion of plaintiff to strike from answer the charge of negligence of plaintiff's driver was proper, where in a previous part of the answer defendant had sufficiently denied negligence in the operation of his automobile.

3. Negligence ⇨ 93(1)—Automobile driver's negligence not chargeable to rider without control of vehicle.

An answer alleging that the driver of the automobile in which plaintiff was riding negligently drove it against defendant's car, unaccompanied by any statement of fact showing that plaintiff controlled, or was entitled to control, the operation of the automobile, cannot be construed as a plea of contributory negligence on plaintiff's part.

4. Highways ⇨ 184(2)—Evidence held to show contributory negligence of guest in automobile injured in a collision.

In an action for personal injuries to a guest in an automobile caused by a collision, evidence held not to show her contributory negligence.

5. Trial ⇨ 252(8)—Charge as to last clear chance held properly refused.

In an action for personal injuries caused by the collision of automobiles on a highway, the refusal of defendant's requested charge on the doctrine of last clear chance was properly refused, because it assumed that the injured plaintiff was operating the automobile, whereas there was no such evidence.

6. Negligence ⚡83—Last clear chance doctrine stated.

The doctrine of last clear chance to avoid an injury arises only in favor of the person injured, and for the purpose of sustaining the liability of defendant where notwithstanding plaintiff's negligence the defendant in face of the apparent danger carelessly or recklessly caused the injury.

7. Trial ⚡250—No charge needed on contributory negligence not pleaded or proven.

In an action for personal injuries caused by the collision of automobiles on a highway, where contributory negligence was not pleaded or proven, it was proper to fail to charge thereon.

8. Trial ⚡253(4)—Instruction on imputed negligence held not to exclude issue of contributory negligence.

In an action by one riding in an automobile for injuries by a collision, an instruction that, if the driver was guilty of negligence contributing proximately to the injuries, such negligence cannot be imputed to plaintiff, unless plaintiff exercised control over the operation of the car, held not objectionable as taking from the jury the issue of plaintiff's own negligence.

9. Trial ⚡252(8)—Requested charge as to negligence held properly refused.

In an action for personal injuries caused by the collision of automobiles on a highway, a requested charge by defendant that if the preponderance of evidence establish that plaintiffs ran their automobile into defendant's automobile, that as a matter of law the jury should find for defendant, was properly refused, as assuming that there was evidence tending to prove that plaintiffs owned and operated the car, whereas there was no such evidence.

10. Trial ⚡261—Offered instructions that cannot properly be given without modification sufficient ground for refusal.

Where instructions offered are such that they cannot be properly given without modification, that of itself constitutes a sufficient ground for refusing them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Margaret Dover and another against Joseph Archambault. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Richards, Heaney & Price, of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

Wm. G. Griffith, of Santa Barbara, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover damages incurred by reason of negligence of the defendant in the operation of an automobile, whereby the defendant's automobile collided with another automobile in which the plaintiff Margaret Dover was riding, and whereby personal injuries were received by her. The accident occurred May 9, 1920. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant appeals therefrom.

At the time of the accident Mrs. Dover was riding in a Ford automobile, owned and driven by one H. A. Palmaymesa. She was riding, with three other persons, as a guest of Palmaymesa, and they were driving in an easterly direction on the state highway between Goleta and Santa Barbara. The plaintiff John Dover was not there. Immediately before the accident, a stage which was driving westerly, ahead of the defendant, stopped to allow a passenger to get off. Another automobile, in front of the defendant, stopped behind the stage. Thereupon the defendant turned his automobile to the left side of the road, and attempted to pass the next automobile and the stage. At the same time the Ford car of Palmaymesa was passing the stage on the south side of the road. According to the testimony, which is amply sufficient to establish the facts, defendant continued to move westerly until the collision occurred. The defendant attempted to prove that he stopped his car, and that the Ford car continued to move forward and ran into the automobile of the defendant. As the evidence is conflicting on this point, we must assume, as the verdict implies, that this testimony on behalf of the defendant is not in accordance with the facts. There is evidence from which the jury was justified in determining that Palmaymesa, as soon as he saw the defendant's car, slowed down to a low rate of speed and turned his car south so that part of it was off the paved highway, and left between his car and the stage a space sufficient to have permitted the defendant to pass. Nevertheless, defendant's automobile struck the front of the Ford car.

[1] There appears to be no doubt that the defendant was guilty of negligence. Section 20(a) of the Vehicle Act provides that—

"On all occasions the driver or operator of any vehicle in or upon any public highway shall travel upon the right half of such highway unless the road ahead on the left-hand side is clear and unobstructed for at least one hundred yards ahead. * * * Stats. 1919, p. 215. "There was no error in the instruction of the court informing the jury that one who operated his vehicle in violation of an express provision of the law was guilty of negligence in so doing. The proposition is thoroughly settled." Mathes v. Aggeler & Musser Seed Co., 179 Cal. 697, 701, 178 Pac. 713, 715.

[2] Appellant contends that the court erred in granting the plaintiffs' motion to strike out from the answer of appellant the following sentence:

"And in that behalf this defendant avers that if the plaintiffs or either of them was injured at the time and place as stated in their complaint that it was by and through the negligence of said H. A. Palmaymesa, who at said time and place negligently drove his said automobile on to the automobile of this defendant, which was rightfully standing still in said highway and not moving at all in any direction, at the time of said accident."

[3] We think that the order was correct. In a previous part of his answer the defendant had sufficiently denied negligence in the operation of his automobile. The language above quoted added nothing to that denial. It cannot be construed as a plea of contributory negligence on the part of Mrs. Dover, for it is not accompanied by any statement of fact showing that she controlled, or was entitled to control, the conduct of Palmaymesa in the operation of his automobile.

[4] Appellant further contends that the plaintiffs should not recover because the evidence shows that the accident was caused by the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, Mrs. Dover. Assuming that the issue was before the jury, we cannot see that the evidence was such as to require a verdict in favor of the defendant upon that issue. This is true because the evidence is sufficient to sustain a finding that Palmaymesa was not negligent in the premises; and further because, even if he had been negligent, there is no evidence that Mrs. Dover was responsible for his negligence. The circumstances were not such that his negligence could be imputed to her. Tousley v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 457, 462, 137 Pac. 31. So far as the conduct of Mrs. Dover is concerned, there is no merit in the contention of appellant that it was her duty to have the car stopped so that she might leave it before the collision occurred. She did not see the defendant's car until it was within 50 feet of the car in which she was riding. Only a few seconds could have elapsed until the collision occurred. The jury was well justified in believing that she had no opportunity to save herself from the injury.

[5, 6] It is contended that the court erred in refusing to give the so-called "last clear chance" instruction requested by appellant. This offered instruction was as follows:

"Ninth: One who has the last clear opportunity to avoid injuring another must do so, and if you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant, just before the collision of his car and plaintiff's car on the 9th of May, 1920, stopped his car, and the plaintiffs made their car collide with the defendant's car, and that the injuries to the plaintiffs respectively alleged in the complaint were thereby inflicted, I charge you that your verdict should be for the defendant."

This instruction was properly refused. It omitted any suggestion of negligence on the part of the plaintiffs. It assumed that there was some evidence that the plaintiffs were operating the Ford car, whereas there was no such evidence. Further it may be observed that the occasion for applying the doctrine of the rule of discovered opportunity or "last clear chance" to avoid an injury arises only in favor of the person injured, and for the purpose of sustaining the liability of the defendant, where, notwithstanding the plaintiff's negligence, the defendant, in face of the apparent danger, has carelessly or recklessly caused the injury. Spear v. United Railroads, 16 Cal. App. 637, 659, 117 Pac. 956.

[7] It is contended that the court erred in giving the fifteenth instruction, which reads as follows:

"15. If you believe from the evidence in this case that the defendant was guilty of negligence in operating and driving his automobile on the occasion alleged in the complaint, and that the alleged accident was proximately caused by such negligence, then I charge you that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover of the defendant such damages as under the evidence would compensate them for the detriment proximately caused thereby, not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of $10,129.15."

Appellant suggests that this instruction is erroneous because it omits any statement of the condition that, in order to recover, the plaintiffs must have been free from negligence causing the injury. If the defense of contributory negligence had been pleaded by the defendant, or if the evidence presented in support of the plaintiffs' cause of action had been sufficient to sustain a finding of contributory negligence, it would have been appropriate to submit that question to the jury. But where the defense is not pleaded, and where the facts in support of such defense have not been developed by the evidence presented by the plaintiff, it is not error for the court to ignore that defense in presenting the case to the jury. Kenny v. Kennedy, 9 Cal. App. 350, 99 Pac. 384; Hall v. City and County of San Francisco (Cal. Sup.) 206 Pac. 459.

[8] The court gave the following instruction:

"9. The court instructs you that if you believe from the evidence that H. A. Palmaymesa was guilty of negligence contributing proximately to the injuries of the plaintiff Margaret Dover such negligence cannot be imputed to the plaintiffs in this action, unless you further believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, Margaret Dover, exercised control over the said H. A. Palmaymesa in his operation of the car in which she was riding."

Appellant contends that this instruction is erroneous, in that it took from the jury the issue of the plaintiffs' own negligence. We cannot see that the instruction had that effect, even if such issue had existed.

[9, 10] Appellant contends that the court erred in refusing the eighth instruction requested by the defendant, reading as follows:

"Eighth: If you find from a preponderance of the evidence in this case that the plaintiffs ran their automobile, in which they were riding on the 9th of May, 1920, into the defendant's automobile, as testified to by the witnesses for the defendant, I charge you that as a matter of law your verdict should be for the defendant, and you should so find in your verdict."
